TERRORISM NEWS:

Wrongly Accused Man Settles Bomb Suit (AP)

By Sarah Skidmore
AP, November 30, 2006

PORTLAND, Ore. - The federal government has agreed to pay an Oregon lawyer $2 million to settle part of a lawsuit he filed after the FBI misidentified a fingerprint and wrongly arrested him in the 2004 Madrid terrorist bombings.

"The pain and torture and humiliation that this (case) has caused my family is hard to put into words," Brandon Mayfield said after the settlement was announced Wednesday.

Mayfield was arrested in May 2004 on the basis of a fingerprint found on a bag of detonators in Madrid that was mistakenly matched to him after the March 11, 2004, train bombings that killed 191 people and wounded more than 1,500. Mayfield was jailed on a material witness warrant but was released after the FBI acknowledged the fingerprint was not his.

Mayfield, who was detained for two weeks, and his wife, Mona, maintained that he was arrested because of his Muslim faith.

"We are Muslims. We are American. We are patriotic," Mona Mayfield said. "We are unhappy with the current administration stripping away our rights."

The local FBI office said it was proud of its work in the case, and disagreed Mayfield's religion was a factor because it was discovered after the fingerprint identification, said agent Robert Jordan.

"If a similar investigation was being conducted, and we were provided a fingerprint identification, we would do exactly what we did in the case of Mr. Mayfield," Jordan said. "Of course we regret what happened to Mr. Mayfield, but again, we are proud of what we did here."

The government did not admit liability or fault but issued a formal apology to Mayfield as part of the settlement, said Justice Department spokeswoman Tasia Scolinos.

The FBI has since adopted suggestions for improving its fingerprint identification process "to ensure that what happened to Mr. Mayfield does not happen again," Scolinos said.

Two internal Justice investigations cleared the FBI and prosecutors of wrongdoing, she said. A December 2005 review by the department's Office of Professional Responsibility found that federal prosecutors who handled the investigation acted appropriately.

A month later, Justice Inspector General Glenn A. Fine concluded that Mayfield's faith was not the reason the FBI began its investigation, and that the agency did not misuse provisions of the USA Patriot Act.

The government acknowledged in the settlement that it "performed covert physical searches of the Mayfield home and law office, and it also conducted electronic surveillance targeting Mr. Mayfield at both his home and law office," according to a news release from Mayfield's attorney, Elden Rosenthal.

The settlement allows Mayfield to continue to pursue his challenge of the USA Patriot Act, Rosenthal said. Mayfield claims the act violates the Fourth Amendment because it allows government searches without probable cause that a crime has been committed.

"I look forward to the day the Patriot Act is declared unconstitutional, and all citizens are safe from unwarranted arrest and searches by the federal government," Mayfield said in a statement.

FBI Settles Case Against Lawyer For $2 Million (BVND/MCT)

By Marisa Taylor
The Belleville News Democrat, November 30, 2006

WASHINGTON - Two years ago the FBI branded Oregon attorney Brandon Mayfield a terror suspect, secretly searched his house and eavesdropped on his conversations with his family and co-workers.

DOJ_NMG_0100005

On Wednesday, Justice Department officials agreed to pay Mayfield $2 million to settle one part of his lawsuit for his wrongful arrest in connection with the 2004 Madrid train bombings that killed 191 people.

Mayfield, a former Army officer, also got a formal apology. And the settlement allows him to continue his legal challenge to the USA Patriot Act, which Mayfield charges violates the Fourth Amendment by permitting government searches without demonstrating probable cause that a crime has been committed.

"The United States acknowledges that the investigation and arrest were deeply upsetting to Mr. Mayfield, to Mrs. Mayfield and to their three young children," said Tasia Scolinos, a Justice Department spokeswoman, in a prepared statement. "And the United States regrets that it mistakenly linked Mr. Mayfield to this terrorist attack."

Mayfield believed he was singled out because of his Muslim faith. FBI agents, however, insisted that his arrest was based on a faulty fingerprint identification that linked him to the attack.

Either way, Mayfield's arrest is one of the FBI's most embarrassing episodes in its five-year campaign to detect terrorist cells inside the United States.

The case also cast doubt on the accuracy of the FBI's troubled fingerprint-identification program and raised questions about sweeping anti-terror measures passed by Congress in the wake of the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks.

Mayfield, 40, was detained for two weeks after agents matched the print of his left index finger with one found on a bag of detonators connected to the Madrid attack.

Spanish authorities, however, were pursuing other suspects. They warned the FBI that their own tests hadn't matched Mayfield's fingerprints with the evidence.

Despite the conflicting reports, FBI agents received approval for "sneak and peak" searches and eavesdropping on his home and office from a secret federal court, authorized by the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, Mayfield's lawsuit alleges.

On May 6, 2004, FBI agents arrested him as a material witness. While in prison for two weeks, Mayfield said, agents threatened him with the death penalty.

Mayfield said he wasn't notified of the searches or the eavesdropping until after he was released. Initially, he thought that his home had been burglarized.

Justice Department Inspector General Glenn A. Fine later found that "contrary to public speculation" the FBI didn't use new provisions of the Patriot Act for the surveillance or searches.

Instead, the report found that the Patriot Act allowed agents to share information with other law enforcement and intelligence officials.

The inspector general's office also concluded that Mayfield's religion wasn't a "sole" cause of the arrest, but likely contributed to the failure "to sufficiently reconsider the identification after legitimate questions about it were raised."

Justice Department officials deny that religion played any part in his arrest.

But Mayfield called any other conclusion "ridiculous." Agents repeatedly cited his religion and ties to the Muslim community in documents given to a federal judge to support his arrest, he said.

Mayfield said that he wouldn't have settled if he'd been barred from pursuing his constitutional challenge to the Patriot Act.

"I am happy with the settlement," he said. "It allows us to move forward with the most important thing, which is the challenge to the Patriot Act. And even though there are pitfalls, I am confident we can win those challenges."

Since the arrest, FBI officials said they've made "significant" changes to the fingerprint identification program to prevent a future mistake.

Ore. Lawyer Settles Suit Over Madrid Bombings (USAT)

By Kevin Johnson, Usa Today

USA Today, November 30, 2006

Gets $2 million, apology from U.S. government

WASHINGTON — An Oregon lawyer erroneously linked to the Madrid train bombings received a written apology and $2 million from the federal government Wednesday.

The monetary settlement involving Brandon Mayfield comes more than two years after he was detained by U.S. authorities who had misidentified a fingerprint lifted from the scene of the Madrid bombings, which killed 191 people in March 2004.

“The United States acknowledges that the investigation and arrest were deeply upsetting to Mr. Mayfield, to Mrs. Mayfield and to their three children,” the government said in a written statement.

It said the FBI has taken steps to ensure that similar errors are not repeated.

Despite the agreement, Mayfield said he would continue to press a separate legal action challenging the USA Patriot Act. He said provisions of the law, which allows the government broader surveillance authority, represented “unwarranted violations” of privacy in his case.

“The power of the government to secretly search your home or business without probable cause, under the guise of a terrorist investigation, must be stopped,” Mayfield said in a written statement.

Mayfield, a convert to Islam, also alleged that investigators went after him because of his faith. “The U.S. government targeted me and my family because of our Muslim religion,” he said.

The Justice Department said that was untrue. Spokeswoman Tasia Scolinos said the department's inspector general concluded earlier this year that Mayfield was not targeted because of his religion and found that the FBI had not misused provisions of the Patriot Act.

Investigators in the United States and in Spain were drawn to Mayfield by a fingerprint lifted from bags of detonators found at the scene of the Madrid attacks.

Investigators also learned that Mayfield had represented a member of a group of Oregon residents implicated in an effort to support the Taliban. Mayfield's legal representation involved a child-custody issue, separate from the criminal case.

The FBI said in a written statement that its fingerprint analysis had been based on a digital image of the prints provided by Spanish authorities and not the actual prints.

Mayfield was held under the material-witness law, which allows the government to detain indefinitely people who are believed to have knowledge of terrorist plots and who might flee if they are not in custody.

The government does not often issue public apologies and monetary settlements in cases of mistaken identity.

U.S. Settles Suit Filed By Ore. Lawyer (WP)

By Dan Eggen

The Washington Post, November 30, 2006

The U.S. government agreed yesterday to pay $2 million to settle a lawsuit filed by an Oregon lawyer who was arrested and jailed for two weeks in 2004 after the FBI bungled a fingerprint match and mistakenly linked him to a terrorist attack in Spain.

Under the terms of the settlement filed yesterday in U.S. District Court in Portland, the government also issued an unusual apology to Brandon Mayfield for the "suffering" caused by his wrongful arrest and imprisonment. It acknowledged that the ordeal was "deeply upsetting" to Mayfield and his family.

Mayfield will be able to continue pursuing his legal challenge to the constitutionality of the USA Patriot Act anti-terrorism law, which was used to obtain his personal records while he was under investigation.

The payment is a clear embarrassment for the FBI, which arrested Mayfield as a material witness in May 2004. FBI examiners had erroneously linked him to a partial fingerprint on a bag of detonators found after terrorists bombed commuter trains in Madrid in March, killing 191 people. The bureau compounded its error by stridently resisting the conclusions of the Spanish National Police, which notified the FBI three weeks before Mayfield was arrested that the fingerprint did not belong to him.

Mayfield's lawsuit alleged that his civil rights had been violated and that he was arrested because he is a Muslim convert who had represented some defendants in terrorism-related cases.

The settlement includes payments of $1.9 million to Mayfield and $25,000 each to his wife and three daughters, according to court documents. The amount is more than twice what the U.S. government agreed to pay earlier this year to Wen Ho Lee, a U.S. nuclear scientist who alleged that officials violated privacy laws by identifying him as a suspect in a spying investigation.

The government has also agreed to destroy all material obtained during electronic surveillance of Mayfield and clandestine searches of his home and office.

The case has become a potent symbol for civil liberties advocates who argue that it shows how easily the government can abuse its powers to detain alleged terrorism suspects under relaxed standards of probable cause.

Mayfield said in a statement yesterday that he was threatened with the death penalty while in custody, that he and his family were targeted "because of our Muslim religion," and that he looks forward "to the day when the Patriot Act is declared unconstitutional."

"The power of the government to secretly search your home or business without probable cause, under the guise of an alleged terrorist investigation, must be stopped," Mayfield said.

Justice Department spokeswoman Tasia Scolinos issued a statement emphasizing that the FBI was not aware of Mayfield's Muslim faith when he was first identified as a suspect and that investigators "did not misuse any provisions of the USA Patriot Act." Scolinos also said the FBI has implemented reforms to avoid a similar mistake in the future.

A report released in March by Justice Department Inspector General Glenn A. Fine found that although Mayfield's religion was not a factor in his initial identification, it contributed to the FBI's reluctance to reexamine its conclusions after challenges from Spanish police.

Fine also found that the FBI used expanded powers under the Patriot Act to demand personal information about Mayfield from banks and other companies, and that the law "amplified the consequences" of the FBI's mistakes by allowing other government agencies to share flawed information.

On March 11, 2004, terrorists later linked to al-Qaeda detonated bombs on several commuter trains in Madrid. The FBI assisted Spanish police by comparing latent fingerprints found nearby on a bag of detonators against its massive fingerprint database, which includes prints from former U.S. soldiers. Mayfield served in the U.S. Army.

Two FBI examiners and a unit chief eventually narrowed the fingerprint match to Mayfield. Spanish police conducted their own analysis and concluded that the print was not Mayfield's. The FBI disputed that finding, dispatching an examiner to Madrid to press its case. Mayfield was arrested three weeks later amid media leaks about the ongoing investigation.

The FBI, which did not comment on yesterday's settlement, has repeatedly said that there were unusual similarities between Mayfield's fingerprints and the one found on the bag of detonators, which was eventually identified as belonging to an Algerian national named Ouhnane Daoud. FBI officials also have denied that Mayfield's status as a Muslim convert influenced investigators' treatment of him.

$2 Million, Apology Settle FBI Fingerprint Error Case (LAT)

By Sam Howe Verhovek, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, November 30, 2006

SEATTLE — A misidentified fingerprint cost federal taxpayers $2 million Wednesday and led to an unusual formal apology to Brandon Mayfield, a Muslim lawyer in Oregon whom the FBI says it wrongly named as a suspect in the 2004 Madrid train bombings.

The federal government "regrets that it mistakenly linked Mr. Mayfield to this attack," according to the apology issued by the Justice Department. It added that the FBI had implemented measures to "ensure that what happened to Mr. Mayfield and the Mayfield family does not happen again."

But Mayfield, who under the settlement can still proceed with a legal challenge to the controversial Patriot Act, said the nightmare he endured could happen to someone else.

"I look forward to the day the Patriot Act is declared unconstitutional and all citizens are safe from unwarranted arrest and searches by the federal government," Mayfield said in a statement.

Mayfield was detained in May 2004 after federal officials matched his fingerprint to one found on a bag of detonators in Madrid after the March 11, 2004, commuter train bombings that killed 191 people.

Two weeks later, however, Spanish police said the print belonged to an Algerian man, and the U.S. government said it had made a mistake.

The case highlighted the error potential for fingerprint matching, which some experts say is unacceptably high.

"This is a tip-of-the-iceberg phenomenon," said Simon A. Cole, a professor of criminology, law and society at UC Irvine and author of "Suspect Identities: A History of Fingerprinting and Criminal Identification."

"The argument has always been that no two people have fingerprints exactly alike," Cole said. "But that's not what you need to have an error. What you need is for two people to have very similar fingerprints, and that's what happened here."

Michael Cherry, president of Cherry Biometrics, an identification-technology company, said misidentification problems could grow worse as the U.S. and other governments add more fingerprints to their databases.

"I really believe there are a lot more Mayfields out there," Cherry said. "We just don't know about these cases because the Spanish police don't always get to oversee them. We simply don't have an identification standard that fits with today's times."

In a report on the Mayfield case in January, the Office of the Inspector General, the Justice Department's internal watchdog, said FBI experts had overlooked "important differences" between Mayfield's prints and those of the Algerian man, and had essentially ignored information from Spanish police that pointed to the other suspect.

"We believe that the FBI laboratory's overconfidence in the skill and superiority of its examiners prevented it from taking the [Spanish report] as seriously as it should have," Inspector General Glenn A. Fine said in a summary of that report.

The Justice Department reiterated its contention that mistakes in fingerprint identification were extremely rare.

"The inspector general made suggestions for improving the FBI's fingerprint identification process, and the FBI has adopted many of those suggestions," said Tasia Scolinos, director of public affairs for the Justice Department.

Mayfield, a former Army lieutenant and a convert to Islam, said Wednesday that the government had "targeted me and my family because of our Muslim religion."

But Fine, in his report, concluded that Mayfield's faith was not the reason the FBI came after him, and he said agency officials had not misused the Patriot Act, which Congress passed after the 2001 terrorist attacks.

DOJ_NMG_0100008

President Bush and other defenders of the act say it is an important anti-terrorism tool, but critics say it has handed the government too much surveillance and wiretapping power and tramples on civil liberties. Mayfield's challenge contends the act violates the constitutional guarantee against unreasonable government searches.

U.S. Will Pay $2 Million To Lawyer Wrongly Jailed (NYT)

By Eric Lichtblau

The New York Times, November 30, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 29 — The federal government agreed to pay $2 million Wednesday to an Oregon lawyer wrongly jailed in connection with the 2004 terrorist bombings in Madrid, and it issued a formal apology to him and his family.

The unusual settlement caps a two-and-a-half-year ordeal that saw the lawyer, Brandon Mayfield, go from being a suspected terrorist operative to a symbol, in the eyes of his supporters, of government overzealousness in the war on terrorism.

"The United States of America apologizes to Mr. Brandon Mayfield and his family for the suffering caused" by his mistaken arrest, the government's apology began. It added that the Federal Bureau of Investigation, which erroneously linked him to the Madrid bombs through a fingerprinting mistake, had taken steps "to ensure that what happened to Mr. Mayfield and the Mayfield family does not happen again."

At an emotional news conference in Portland announcing the settlement, Mr. Mayfield said he and his wife, an Egyptian immigrant, and their three children still suffered from the scars left by the government's surveillance of him and his jailing for two weeks in May 2004.

"The horrific pain, torture and humiliation that this has caused myself and my family is hard to put into words," said Mr. Mayfield, an American-born convert to Islam and a former lieutenant in the Army.

"The days, weeks and months following my arrest," he said, "were some of the darkest we have had to endure. I personally was subject to lockdown, strip searches, sleep deprivation, unsanitary living conditions, shackles and chains, threats, physical pain and humiliation."

Fingerprint examiners at the F.B.I. erroneously linked Mr. Mayfield to the terrorist bombings in Madrid through a mistaken identification of a print taken from a plastic bag containing detonator caps that was found at the scene of the bombings. The bombings, on March 11, 2004, killed 191 people and left 2,000 injured in the deadliest terrorist attack in Europe since World War II.

Despite doubts from Spanish officials about the validity of the fingerprint match, American officials began an aggressive high-level investigation into Mr. Mayfield in the weeks after the bombings. The fact that he had represented a terrorism defendant in a child-custody case in Portland spurred further interest in him. Using expanded surveillance powers under the USA Patriot Act, the government wiretapped his conversations, conducted secret searches of his home and his law office and jailed him for two weeks as a material witness in the case before a judge threw out the case against him.

The settlement includes an unusual condition that frees the government from future liability except in one important area: Mr. Mayfield is allowed to continue a lawsuit seeking to overturn parts of the Patriot Act as a violation of the Fourth Amendment protection against unreasonable search and seizure.

Several legal experts said they considered the settlement significant because of the public apology and the substantial payment.

"You almost never see something like this," said Peter Neufeld, co-director of the Innocence Project, a legal clinic in New York City. "It's extraordinary, but the harm caused him was extraordinary. What I really think it speaks to is just how clearly the U.S. government crossed the line when it went after Mayfield."

Suzanne Spaulding, a former lawyer with the Central Intelligence Agency who specializes in national security law, said that the terms of the settlement allowing Mr. Mayfield to continue his lawsuit over the Patriot Act were also significant.

"You've got to think that the Justice Department did not want to make that concession," she said. "That and the two million dollars are further evidence that they were vulnerable and that he clearly had some significant leverage in these negotiations."

Justice Department officials said they were confident that the legal foundation of the Patriot Act, including the surveillance and search provisions challenged by Mr. Mayfield, would hold up in court.

Although the F.B.I. has acknowledged serious missteps in the case, an investigation by the Justice Department inspector general released this year concluded that the government did not misuse its expanded counterterrorism powers under the Patriot Act and that Mr. Mayfield's Muslim faith was not the reason he was initially investigated. Still, Mr. Mayfield continued to assert Wednesday that he and his family were a target "because of our Muslim religion."

"Our freedom of religion in this country is a sacred right," he said, "and the exercise of one's beliefs in a lawful manner should never be a factor in a government's investigation of any citizen."

In Washington, the settlement was applauded by Representative John Conyers Jr., the Michigan Democrat who is expected to become the chairman of the House Judiciary Committee in January.

"The Mayfield case cries out for checks and balances on what has been, at times, an overzealous pursuit of innocent Americans," Mr. Conyers said. "I am heartened that Mr. Mayfield has received this small measure of justice."

Lawyer Wrongly Arrested In Bombings: 'We Lived In 1984' (CNN)

By Henry Schuster And Terry Frieden

CNN.com, November 30, 2006

PORTLAND, Oregon (CNN) -- The U.S. Justice Department said Wednesday it is paying $2 million and apologizing to an Oregon lawyer wrongly accused of being involved with the 2004 train bombings in Madrid, Spain.

Brandon Mayfield was arrested in Portland on a material witness warrant in May 2004, less than two months after the bombings.

According to an FBI affidavit at the time, his fingerprint was identified as being on a blue plastic bag containing detonators found in a van used by the bombers.

The FBI's fingerprint identification was wrong, however, and Mayfield was released several days later.

The bombings of four commuter trains March 11, 2004, killed 191 people and wounded more than 1,800.

Mayfield charged he was a victim of profiling because the Portland-area attorney was a Muslim convert.

He and his family later sued the U.S. government for damages.

"We lived in 1984," Mayfield told reporters Wednesday. "I'm talking about the George Orwell, frightening brave new world in which Big Brother is constantly watching you."

"I, myself, have dark memories of stifling paranoia, of being monitored, followed, watched, tracked," he said, choking back emotion.

"I've been surveilled, followed, targeted primarily because I've been an outspoken critic of this administration and doing my job to defend others who can't defend themselves, to give them their day in court, and mostly for being a Muslim."

The government refused, he said, to tell him where they put their cameras and surveillance devices, leaving his family wondering if their private conversations and intimate moments were on display.

"The days and weeks and months following my arrest were some of the hardest and darkest that myself and my family have ever had to endure," he said.

"And all because of this government's ill-conceived war on terror. ... What I really want is for this not to happen to anyone else."

Wednesday's settlement includes not only a $2 million payment and an apology, but also an agreement by the government to destroy communications intercepts conducted by the FBI against Mayfield's home and office during the investigation.

The written apology reads:

"The United States of America apologizes to Mr. Brandon Mayfield and his family for the suffering caused by the FBI's misidentification of Mr. Mayfield's fingerprint and the resulting investigation of Mr. Mayfield, including his arrest as a material witness in connection with the 2004 Madrid train bombings and the execution of search warrants and other court orders in the Mayfield family home and in Mr. Mayfield's law office."

A Justice Department statement released Wednesday said Mayfield was not targeted because of his Muslim faith and that the FBI had taken steps to improve its fingerprint identification process "to ensure that what happened to Mr. Mayfield does not happen again."

"Mr. Mayfield and his family felt it was in their best interest to get on with their lives," said Mayfield's attorney, Elden Rosenthal.

"No amount of money can compensate Mr. Mayfield for being held as a prisoner and being told he faced the death penalty [for the Madrid bombings]."

Mayfield said his suit was not about money.

"It's about regaining our civil rights, our freedom and most important, our privacy," he said.

He and his attorneys said the settlement will allow him to continue the portion of his lawsuit challenging the constitutionality of the Patriot Act.

Mayfield contends that his home was searched under provisions of the Patriot Act.

Oregon Lawyer Wrongly Arrested After Madrid Bombings Settles Lawsuit For $2 Million (AP)

By Anne M. Peterson, Associated Press

AP, November 30, 2006

PORTLAND, Ore. – A lawyer the FBI wrongly arrested after the 2004 Madrid terrorist bombings because of a misidentified fingerprint has settled part of his lawsuit against the U.S. government for $2 million.

Brandon Mayfield, who was detained for two weeks in 2004, maintained that he was arrested because of his Muslim faith.

"Not only does my detention as a material witness in the Madrid bombing underscore the fallacy that fingerprint identification is reliable, I hope the public will remember that the U.S. government also targeted me and my family because of our Muslim religion," he said in a statement Wednesday.

The local FBI office said Wednesday that it was proud of its work in the case – other than the fingerprint error.

"If a similar investigation was being conducted, and we were provided a fingerprint identification, we would do exactly what we did in the case of Mr. Mayfield," said agent Robert Jordan. "We are very proud of what we did here, but we recognize that our laboratory made a mistake."

Justice Department spokeswoman Tasia Scolinos said the FBI has since adopted suggestions for improving its fingerprint identification process "to ensure that what happened to Mr. Mayfield does not happen again."

The U.S. formally apologized to Mayfield as part of the settlement, Scolinos said.

Two internal Justice investigations cleared the FBI and prosecutors of wrongdoing, she said. A December 2005 review by the department's Office of Professional Responsibility found that federal prosecutors who handled the investigation acted appropriately.

A month later, Justice Inspector General Glenn A. Fine concluded that Mayfield's faith was not the reason the FBI began its investigation, and that the agency did not misuse provisions of the USA Patriot Act.

Mayfield was arrested in May 2004 on the basis of a fingerprint found on a bag of detonators in Madrid that was mistakenly matched to him after the March 11, 2004, train bombings that killed 191 people and wounded more than 1,500. Mayfield was jailed on a material witness warrant but was released after the FBI acknowledged the fingerprint was not his.

The government acknowledged in the settlement that it "performed covert physical searches of the Mayfield home and law office, and it also conducted electronic surveillance targeting Mr. Mayfield at both his home and law office," according to a news release from Mayfield's attorney, Elden Rosenthal.

The settlement allows Mayfield to continue to pursue his challenge of the USA Patriot Act, Rosenthal said. Mayfield claims the act violates the Fourth Amendment because it allows government searches without probable cause that a crime has been committed.

"The Patriot Act is decidedly not patriotic," Rosenthal said. "We will vigorously pursue this constitutional challenge to the highest courts in the country."

Mayfield Settles For $2 Million (OREG)

By Bryan Denson, The Oregonian

The Oregonian, November 30, 2006

A Portland-area man, who sued the U.S. over his treatment in a bombing case, tells of ordeal

Brandon Mayfield, the Portland-area lawyer wrongly linked to the deadly Madrid, Spain, train bombings of 2004, accepted a $2 million settlement Wednesday in his lawsuit against the federal government, setting up a legal showdown over the constitutionality of the USA Patriot Act.

The United States will pay the convert to Islam $1.9 million for the emotional toll he suffered from two weeks of imprisonment as a material witness to a crime he knew nothing about, with another $100,000 going to his wife and three children for their suffering.

The government also agreed to destroy all materials seized from Mayfield's home and office. And it agreed to issue the 40-year-old lawyer another apology for FBI foulups that matched him to a fingerprint found in Madrid, leading to his investigation as a possible terrorist.

At a news conference Wednesday in a downtown Portland high-rise, the lean, bespectacled lawyer likened his ordeal to an Orwellian nightmare.

"I am talking about the George Orwell frightening brave new world in which Big Brother is constantly watching you, complete with 24-hour surveillance, thought control and doublespeak," Mayfield said. "Where war means peace. Freedom is slavery. Ignorance is strength. Where torture is morality. And an act that strips you of your civil rights could be called a Patriot Act."

Mayfield and his wife, Mona, said the $2 million settlement will help pay their lawyers and put their children through college. But they said the money could never make them whole for what they described as illegal violations of their privacy.

"To this date," Mayfield said, "the government has refused to tell us where they placed their electronic listening devices and cameras, leaving myself and family to forever wonder if they were listening to our most private conversations, watching our most intimate interactions."

The Mayfields hired celebrity lawyer Gerry Spence of Wyoming, prominent Portland civil rights attorney Elden Rosenthal and Newport attorney Michele Longo Eder, to sue federal officials, contending that he was targeted because he is a Muslim. The lawsuit also challenged the constitutionality of a provision of the USA Patriot Act.

Mayfield said he would continue to pursue his challenge to key provisions of the 2001 law, including one that allows searches without requiring the government to show probable cause that a crime has been committed.

The lawyer was taken into custody by federal agents in May 2004 and detained for two weeks as a material witness in the Madrid bombings. But he acknowledged that he and his family felt they had been watched well before the arrest, including the day they found dirty shoe prints on a clean carpet in their home, a place in which shoes were never worn.

"The government agents came into my home," said Mona Mayfield. "They bugged my home. They tapped my phone lines and terrorized my family -- and simply because we're Muslim."

Robert Jordan, the special agent in charge of the FBI in Oregon, disputed the contention that Mayfield was targeted because of his faith. He pointed out that the event triggering the investigation was a fingerprint found in a bag of detonators in Madrid; only later did the FBI learn that the lawyer was Muslim.

"If the same fingerprint identification came in again, we would do the exact same thing," Jordan said. "Not only did we do nothing wrong here, but everything we did was premised on a fingerprint identification. Our investigation was extremely thorough and extremely professional."

"But the investigation," Jordan acknowledged, "was built on sand, because the investigation was predicated on this fingerprint that the (FBI) lab later determined they were wrong about."

Two weeks after Mayfield's arrest, Spanish investigators linked the fingerprint to an Algerian national. Mayfield was released from custody the same day.

The Mayfield case prompted reforms of FBI fingerprint analysis procedures, Jordan said. Agents are now more circumspect in the manner by which they take fingerprint data, which must now be corroborated by an independent investigator, he said.

Jordan publicly apologized to Mayfield when the FBI acknowledged the fingerprint error in May 2004. But Wednesday, by agreement of the government and Mayfield's lawyers, it was the U.S. Department of Justice's turn to apologize.

"The United States acknowledges that the investigation and arrest were deeply upsetting to Mr. Mayfield, to Mrs. Mayfield, and to their three young children," the Justice Department wrote, "and the United States regrets that it mistakenly linked Mr. Mayfield to this terrorist attack."

Wednesday's settlement amounts to part one of Mayfield's case against the U.S. government. The settlement allows the lawyer to continue his lawsuit challenging the constitutionality of the Patriot Act provision that put him under secret surveillance.

Prior to enactment of the Patriot Act, government agents could, under the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, get a judge's approval for wiretaps and other surveillance only if they could show their primary purpose was to investigate a foreign agent as part of a matter of national security.

The Patriot Act changed that law, said Rosenthal. Government agents can now get permission for the secret surveillance by saying their investigation is partly rooted in an international terrorism case.

"Here Mr. Mayfield fell right in the cross hairs," Rosenthal said. "They were investigating the crime of international terrorism, and without presenting probable cause to anybody that Mr. Mayfield could be connected to the crime, they got all these warrants."

Mayfield is challenging the law on grounds that it violates constitutional search-and-seizure constraints.

Constitutional law professor Carl Tobias, a professor at the University of Richmond, said he was leery of a challenge to the Patriot Act on grounds that it allowed flimsy pretexts for government snooping. "But that doesn't mean you shouldn't try," he said.

Rosenthal said lawyers for Mayfield and the government will set up a briefing schedule in the next week or two. The case is expected to be argued before U.S. District Judge Ann Aiken early next year.

Spence told reporters Wednesday that the Patriot Act should worry all Americans.

"We have some secret agents," he said on a conference line from Jackson Hole, Wyo., "who file secret papers that we can never see. And they're filed in a secret proceeding, and no right is given to the citizens . . . And out of those secret papers comes a secret order. And then people come secretly to your house, and they secretly break into your house. And they secretly put in listening devices.

"So that secretly the entire lives of these people become the property -- not of us, not of the parties, not of the citizens -- but our private lives become the property of the United States government. . . . So that this becomes their asset.

"They've stolen the most sacred part of our lives."

Mayfield Settlement Still Leaves A Lot To Be Settled (POREG)

The Oregonian, November 30, 2006

It was just possible, at Wednesday afternoon's news conference to announce a partial settlement in Brandon Mayfield's case against the U.S. government, to reassure oneself that the system worked.

After all, the Beaverton attorney -- who was arrested and held and had his office and home secretly searched and monitored following a fingerprint misidentification -- is receiving $2 million and an apology from the government that abused his rights and his family.

But the experience of the case, and the procedures and the laws involved, argue that the system is still a ways from working. Just how far will be considered by another Mayfield lawsuit, challenging the constitutionality of parts of the U.S.A. Patriot Act, and new congressional judiciary committees likely to take a more challenging view of expanding claims of government power.

Mayfield, an active Muslim convert, was arrested in May 2004 after Spanish officials reported a computer match of his fingerprint with one found on a bag of detonators after a massive terrorist train bombing in Madrid. The match turned out to be false, and Spanish investigators doubted it well before the fingerprint was matched to a Moroccan militant and Mayfield was released.

But by then, Mayfield had been held for two weeks as a material witness on charges that could bring the death penalty, and his home and office were searched -- with cameras and microphones installed -- under sections of the Patriot Act allowing the government to act in secret and give him no opportunity to challenge the actions.

Mayfield's experience, pointed out his attorney Gerry Spence, was based on "secret papers that we can never see, and out of those papers came a secret order, and then people come secretly to your house, and they secretly break in."

Any government will always make mistakes, and this outcome shows that the U.S. government can still be held accountable. Robert Jordan, special agent in charge of the Portland FBI, insisted Wednesday that aside from the fingerprint misidentification, "We are very proud of what we did here."

But a cloak of secrecy makes it hard to check government power or defend citizens' rights, to know just how much Mayfield's Muslim identity overwhelmed doubts about the evidence that the Spanish raised very early in the process. It makes it impossible for Mayfield to know, even now, what the FBI learned about him and who else might know it now.

"There's a part of me that walked into the Multnomah County Detention Center," said Mayfield, "that never walked out."

You could sit in the news conference Wednesday and conclude that the system worked.

But you'd also conclude that it needs to work better.

Gonzales Pledges Warrantless Wiretaps Will Continue (KQXT)

By Jim Forsyth

KQXT-FM, San Antonio, November 30, 2006

Exclusive interview with 1200 WOAI news

The strongest defense to date of the controversial warrantless surveillance program from Attorney General Alberto Gonzales. As the Justice Department's inspector general opens an investigation into the effort, Gonzales told WOAI radio in his hometown of San Antonio that it is an 'effective and important program' and he's confident it will eventually be upheld in the courts.

The entire interview will air Thursday morning at 6:20 and 7:10 on San Antonio's First News.

Gonzales also pledged to correct any 'shortcomings' in the program that may be identified by the IG's probe.

Gonzales said the program to wiretap conversations between people in the United States and people overseas that the government suspects of being involved in terrorism is 'most definitely' continuing despite a ruling of a federal judge in Detroit that the program is unconstitutional, and loud complaints about it from Democrats in Congress. Justice Department IG Glenn Fine notified Rep. Zoe Lofgren (D-Calif) Tuesday that he has opened an investigation into the department's handling of the program, but not into whether the program itself is legal.

"Even those who have been critical of the President's authority to do this, except for maybe one person in Congress, nobody has suggested that the program stop," Gonzales said. "I think people understand that it is an effective program. The Director of the CIA has testified that it has been a very effective program in protecting America. It's for that reason, while questions have been raised about the legal authorities of the President, we do believe that the President has the authority to authorize surveillance of the enemy at time of war, and that authority comes from the authorization by Congress to use military force which came shortly after the September 11th attacks."

Gonzales, however, rejected demands from Lofgren and other Congressional Democrats, to order Fine to probe not just the implementation of the warrantless surveillance program, but its legality as well.

"He doesn't have the expertise or authority to do that, quite frankly. It is the job for the lawyers within the Department of Justice to determine if something is legal. We have reviewed this program, and in our judgment it is lawful."

Gonzales also said the American people want the program to continue, saying 'the American people want their government to ascertain why someone in the U.S. is talking to Al-Queda.'

Gonzales declined to say whether the warrantless surveillance program will continue if the current lame duck Congress or the Democrat dominated Congress that takes office in January fails to pass legislation pushed by the White House which would grant statutory legality to the program.

"We'll continue to work with Congress," he said. "I know the next Congress will be committed to doing everything it can to protect America, and we will just work together and try to find the best way to do that. The program is important, and we're going to have to find a way to help it continue."

A Crack In The Stone Wall (NYT)

The New York Times, November 30, 2006

It was one of the more outrageous moments in the story of the Bush administration's illegal domestic wiretapping. Almost a year ago, Congressional Democrats called for a review of the Justice Department's role in the program. But the department investigators assigned to do the job were unable to proceed because the White House, at President Bush's personal direction, refused to give them the necessary security clearance.

Now the president, for reasons we can't help thinking might have something to do with this month's elections, has changed his mind. The White House will give Justice Department inspectors the required clearance, and a review will go forward.

That's all to the good, as long as the investigation is not intended to pre-empt any efforts by the new Democratic majority to conduct its own Congressional review of the wiretap program. The Justice Department inquiry will hardly do the full job.

The department's inspector general, Glenn Fine, has already said that the question of whether the program was legal is beyond his jurisdiction. Instead, he will investigate whether department employees followed the rules governing the program — rules that were established in a secret executive order signed by the president in October 2001.

Whether or not Justice Department employees followed the rules they were given may have bearing on their individual performance evaluations, but it will tell us very little else. Since the rules Mr. Bush established under his secret order will presumably stay secret, the investigation will not even help us to understand just how far from established legal standards he strayed when he authorized the government to eavesdrop on Americans' international calls and e-mail without a court-issued warrant.

The Justice Department inquiry also will do nothing to fix the biggest problem with Mr. Bush's eavesdropping program, which is that — once again — he ignored existing law and instead tried to create a system outside the law, resting on his dangerously expansive claims of executive power.

If Mr. Bush had wanted to conduct the wiretapping within the law, he could have quite easily done so, using the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act. That law, written after the Watergate scandal and the eavesdropping abuses of the Vietnam era, created a special court to approve applications for domestic surveillance. The court operates in secret, and has rarely denied the authorities' requests. Even in the post-9/11 era, it should have met the administration's needs. And if there was a problem, Congress had shown itself ready and willing to amend the law.

Mr. Fine, who has proved himself willing to criticize administration operations before, could still provide an important — if limited — service. He says, for instance, that he will examine how information gleaned from the wiretaps was used to pursue criminal cases. That inquiry should be useful for those who have been wondering whether the enormous amount of information collected significantly helped antiterrorism efforts, or simply complicated them with a flood of unmanageable data.

The investigation might also help Congress understand whether FISA needs updating — something the administration has been loath to discuss as long as it has been able to end-run the court. Senator Dianne Feinstein, who has introduced a bill aimed at making it easy for the government to get quick court approval of wiretaps on those suspected of terrorism or spying, has already said that nothing she has heard in secret briefings suggests that anything the administration needed could not have been conducted under FISA.

The question of the wiretap program's constitutionality is now making its way through the courts and should ultimately be decided by the Supreme Court. Congress should not be satisfied with Mr. Fine's very limited investigation. It should mount its own independent inquiry into how the war on terror, and American civil liberties, are being affected by an eavesdropping program about which we have been told so little.

Terrorist Case Against Denver Family Ended (DENP)

By Bruce Finley, Denver Post Staff Writer

Denver Post, November 30, 2006

A federal judge on Wednesday declared the end of the government's four-year case against a Denver Pakistani-American family once targeted by the FBI as terrorists.

Family members whose lives were turned upside down simply wept. "We've lost everything," longtime Colorado restaurateur Abdul Qayyum said.

Chief U.S. District Judge Lewis Babcock accepted plea deals with federal prosecutors who dropped and reduced immigration charges they pursued after their terrorism case fizzled against Qayyum, his daughter Saima Saima, wife Chris Warren and nephew Irfan Kamran.

Now only Haroon Rashid, Saima's husband, is jailed. Federal prosecutors dropped all charges against him, too. But Rashid, jailed for more than two years, still faces deportation after a misdemeanor assault on a gang member who hassled his family.

A federal appeals court on Nov. 20 temporarily blocked Rashid's deportation pending an appeal to the U.S. Supreme Court.

FBI agents targeted this family of naturalized U.S. citizens from the Pakistan-Afghanistan borderlands based on secret evidence after the 9/11 attacks. U.S. Attorney General John Ashcroft trumpeted the case as aggressive action against terrorists.

"When the attorney general of the United States declares your family terrorists," the result is damage "far beyond anything this court can do," defense attorney Ray Moore told Babcock during one of two emotional hearings Wednesday.

The family suffered financially as their restaurant in Castle Rock closed. Children faced teasing; mothers grew deeply depressed.

Babcock acknowledged that the long, hard case was trying on everyone involved. "Sometimes these things take too long. ... This is one of those cases where it just took time to get it right."

The immigration charges FBI agents pursued after allegations of links to al-Qaeda evaporated in 2004 involved statements family members made about a relative to get him a visa to enter the U.S. In multiple plea deals made final Wednesday, Qayyum pleaded guilty to one charge of making a false statement to a federal agent. He received a sentence of one year's probation.

And Kamran, a father of four, pleaded guilty to a petty offense after prosecutors dropped two felony charges. All charges were dropped against Warren and Saima.

"The most important thing that hurt me emotionally was when they pointed guns at my kid and he was shivering" during a raid, Kamran said.

Yet "I still haven't changed my mind about this country," he said. "I'm still positive. There are still a lot of people with good values."

Federal prosecutors defended their actions.

"I don't know if there was any excess in this case. It was done just like any other case would be," Assistant U.S. Attorney David Gaouette said.

Now defense attorneys say they're trying to make sure family members' names aren't on federal terrorist watch lists.

Alleged CIA Torture Victim Speaks Out (AP)

By Desmond Butler

AP, November 30, 2006

WASHINGTON - Khaled el-Masri, who claims the CIA kidnapped and tortured him, recounted his story on Capitol Hill on Wednesday and said he hoped he could help prevent others from suffering a similar fate.

The Kuwaiti-born German citizen said he had brought his story to Washington to encourage greater oversight of CIA activities and force the U.S. government to acknowledge what happened to him.

"I really want to raise awareness in the Congress so that they can bring some pressure to bear and make changes," el-Masri said in German after he briefed Senate aides.

A federal appeals court in Richmond, Va., heard arguments Tuesday by el-Masri's lawyers urging the judges to reinstate his lawsuit against a former CIA director, George Tenet, and others.

Discussing the case, el-Masri told reporters, "What really matters to me is that I would like to know why this was done to me, and I want an explanation and an apology."

DOJ_NMG_0100015

He added, "I think that we can all benefit from what happens in my case, including others who are still in prison in other parts of the world without the rule of law."

El-Masri alleges he was kidnapped while trying to enter Macedonia for a vacation on Dec. 31, 2003. He claims he was flown to a CIA-run prison known as the "salt pit" in Kabul, Afghanistan, where he was beaten and sodomized with an object during five months in captivity.

"The conditions that I was confronted with were not fit for a human," he told reporters. He said his food was barely edible and the water putrid.

"It was like water you left in an aquarium for years," he said. "When you took one sip, the taste stayed in your mouth for hours."

The CIA has refused to comment on el-Masri's allegations, which have put a spotlight on the intelligence agency's secret program to deliver suspected terrorists for interrogation in foreign countries. The practice has been heavily criticized by human rights groups.

El-Masri's suit was dismissed in May when a judge ruled that a trial could harm national security by revealing details about CIA activities.

El-Masri said that despite the setback, he had confidence in the courts and the U.S. justice system. He previously was denied entry into the United States when he arrived to publicize the filing of his suit last year, according to the American Civil Liberties Union, which has supported his case. In recent weeks, he was issued a visa.

ACLU lawyer Ben Wizner told the appeals court on Tuesday that el-Masri was "the public face of a publicly acknowledged program" whose basics generally have become known. Thus, the lawyer said, the case could be considered without exposing government secrets.

Justice Department lawyer Greg Katsis argued that the government properly invoked its state secrets privilege to protect information outlined in a classified affidavit that Judge T.S. Ellis III read before dismissing the suit

El-Masri's allegations also are the subject of a German parliamentary investigation that is trying to clarify when German government officials became aware of el-Masri's case and whether German security services participated in interrogations in Afghanistan.

The appeals court usually takes several weeks to issue its ruling.

Terror Watch: Showdown Over Padilla (NSWK)

Accused terrorist Jose Padilla wants to describe how he was treated in a military brig. The government is trying to keep him quiet.

A looming court fight over claims that one-time enemy combatant Jose Padilla was “tortured” by the U.S. military is threatening to create new difficulties for one of the Bush administration’s most high-profile terrorism cases.

In a motion last week, the Justice Department asked a federal judge to block any public testimony about the circumstances of Padilla’s interrogations during the more than three years he was detained and interrogated in a military brig in South Carolina. For most of that time, Padilla, a 35-year-old Brooklyn-born U.S. citizen who was raised in Chicago, was held incommunicado, unable to meet with his lawyer or any other visitors.

Even permitting Padilla’s lawyers to raise the issue of his alleged mistreatment, prosecutors argued, may “inflame the jury” and invite “jury nullification”—the term used to describe what happens when rebellious jurors declare a defendant not guilty, no matter what the evidence, because they are so offended by the government’s conduct. (The prosecutors also say there is “not a shred of record evidence” to back up Padilla’s claims that he was tortured and asserted that the “conditions of his confinement were humane and designed to ensure his safety and security.”)

But defense lawyers are convinced that given the seriousness and the specificity of Padilla’s claims of mistreatment—many of which involve the use of aggressive interrogation techniques virtually identical to those the Pentagon has confirmed using at Guantánamo—the judge in his case, Marcia Cooke, may have little choice but to order a pretrial hearing on his allegations.

Padilla’s lawyers say they will soon file “additional material” to back up their torture claims. And if Cook grants them a hearing, it could open the door for the first time to questioning in a U.S. courtroom about controversial interrogation methods that were used against one of the most sensitive detainees in U.S. government custody. Padilla's fate is all the more important because his incarceration by the U.S. military was directly ordered from the White House by President Bush.

The matter could prove even more awkward because, according to a source close to Padilla’s defense team—who asked not to be identified talking about sensitive matters—any hearing could end up requiring the Pentagon to turn over highly classified video and audiotapes allegedly made of Padilla's interrogation sessions at the U.S. military brig in Charleston, S.C. The content of the tapes has been the subject of recent discussion among lawyers in the case, the source said.

Cmdr. J. D. Gordon, a Pentagon spokesman, declined to comment on the existence of any secret tapes made of Padilla's interrogation sessions. "We don't comment on cases that are under litigation," he said. Asked about interrogation tapes, Anthony Natale, one of Padilla's defense lawyers, said: "It would be unlawful for me to make any comment about that matter." The court docket in Padilla's case shows that a number of recent motions have been filed in the case under seal in order to avoid public disclosure of material that remains classified.

Padilla's story first became public on June 9, 2002, when Attorney General John Ashcroft announced in a press conference from Moscow that the former Chicago gang member had been apprehended a month earlier coming into the country because he had plans to carry out a radiological "dirty bomb" attack on behalf of Al Qaeda. That same day, President Bush signed an extraordinary order declaring that Padilla, who converted to Islam while living in Florida, was "closely associated with Al Qaeda" and was "an enemy combatant" in the war on terror. Padilla was then removed from the criminal justice system, stripped of his constitutional rights—including the right to consult with his lawyer—and dispatched to the military brig.

But last year, in what was widely seen as an attempt to avoid a potentially adverse U.S. Supreme Court ruling on the constitutionality of President Bush's actions, Padilla's case was abruptly transferred back to a regular criminal court, where he was indicted on charges that he was part of a North American "jihad" cell that supported Islamic extremists overseas. The indictment made no mention of any plans to set off a "dirty bomb"; law-enforcement officials have since acknowledged that the supposed dirty-bomb attack, which was based on claims made by other Al Qaeda detainees, never got beyond the talking stage anyway.

But the Justice Department's efforts to criminally prosecute Padilla have run into repeated problems. Judge Cook dismissed the most serious conspiracy count against him, removing the possibility that he will receive a life sentence. The case took a further unexpected turn last month when Padilla's lawyers filed a highly detailed 20-page motion alleging that all the criminal charges against him should be dismissed because of "outrageous government conduct," including a claim that he was forcibly administered mind-altering drugs in an effort to get him to provide information about his alleged Al Qaeda accomplices.

Among the specific allegations made in the motion were claims that Padilla was kept in a state of "complete sensory deprivation," confined for months at a time in a "tiny cell" where the temperatures were manipulated to "extremely cold" levels and "noxious fumes" were introduced, causing his eyes and nose to run. Loud clanging noises were repeatedly heard making it impossible for him to sleep, the motion stated. Padilla himself was hooded, forced to stand in uncomfortable stress positions and kept "shackled and manacled with a belly chain," the motion further states. He was also threatened with being forcibly removed from the United States to another country, including the U.S. Naval Base at Guantánamo as well as threatened with being cut with a knife and having alcohol poured on his wounds, it says.

"Often, he had to endure multiple interrogators who would scream, shake and otherwise assault Mr. Padilla," the motion states. "Additionally, Mr. Padilla was given drugs against his will, believed to be some form of lysergic acid diethylmamide (LSD) or phencyclidine (PACP) to act as a sort of truth serum during his interrogations."

Gordon, the Pentagon spokesman, said in response: "The government in the strongest terms denies Padilla's allegations of torture—allegations made without support and without citing a shred of record evidence. It is our policy to treat all detainees humanely."

But at least some of the allegations in Padilla's motion mirror claims that were first made by FBI agents and lawyers for detainees held at Guantánamo and which were later confirmed by the U.S. military. An investigation ordered by Gen. Bantz J. Craddock, commander of the U.S. Southern Command, found last year that military interrogators at Guantánamo did in fact subject some detainees to yelling and loud noises, disrupt their sleep patterns, lower the temperatures in their cells to make them uncomfortable—all in an effort to "lower their resistance" and get them to provide interrogators with more information. The report found that in 2002, Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld himself approved sleep deprivation as an authorized technique to use against one particularly high-value detainee, a Saudi prisoner named Mohammed Qahtani who was suspected of being the 20th hijacker in the 9/11 attacks. Rumsfeld also approved the use of adjusting the air conditioner to extremely cold levels in the interrogation of a second Guantánamo detainee, the report found.

It is still far from clear that, even if Judge Cook orders a hearing on Padilla's claims, it will make a difference to the outcome of his case. Prosecutors have argued that because they are not planning on using any evidence derived from Padilla's interrogations, the circumstances of how he was treated make no legal difference. Cook would essentially have to find that the treatment of Padilla "shocks the conscience" of the court—a heavy legal burden—for the case against him to be dismissed.

But defense lawyers may have hinted at the ultimate significance of their claims in a portion of their motion last month, when they referred to the "psychological damage" done to Padilla as a result of the aggressive methods used against him. Natale, Padilla's lawyer, said the defense will expand on this reference in a court filing that may be filed by the end of the week.

One possibility is that Padilla's lawyers will ask that he be deemed incompetent to stand trial, said the source close to Padilla's defense team who declined to be identified. In court hearings and in private meetings, the source said, Padilla has shown signs of being withdrawn, unable to communicate or respond when questions about what happened to him arise. "It's almost like you're dealing with a turtle," the source said.

Federal Judge Rules Bush Executive Order Invalid (WT)

By Jerry Seper, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, November 30, 2006

President Bush lacks the constitutional authority to designate groups and persons as terrorists under a post-September 11 executive order, according to a federal judge in Los Angeles.

U.S. District Judge Audrey B. Collins, in a challenge brought by the Washington, D.C.-based Center for Constitutional Rights on behalf of the Humanitarian Law Project, said a Sept. 24, 2001, executive order naming 27 groups and persons as "specially designated global terrorists" (SDGTs) allowed no way for those designated to challenge the ruling.

In a 45-page ruling, Judge Collins said the executive order "contains no definable criteria" to constrain the president's use of it, and, as a result, "is unconstitutionally vague on its face." She said the order is subject only to Mr. Bush's "unfettered discretion."

The judge also said the order "contains no definable criteria for designating individuals and groups as SDGTs," and improperly gives the secretary of the Treasury the power to impose penalties for "mere association" with the groups.

The ruling, made public on Tuesday, came in a lawsuit in which the Humanitarian Law Project, through the Center for Constitutional Rights, sought to support the nonviolent work of two groups designated as terrorist: The Kurdistan Workers Party, the main Kurdish political party in Turkey, and the Liberation Tigers of Tamil Eelam, a rebel group fighting for a separate homeland for Tamils in Sri Lanka.

"This law gave the president unfettered authority to create blacklists, an authority President Bush then used to empower the secretary of the Treasury to impose guilt by association," said David Cole, a Center for Constitutional Rights board member.

"The court's decision confirms that even in fighting terror, unchecked executive authority and trampling on fundamental freedoms is not a permissible option," he said.

The Justice Department said the agency thought Judge Collins had erred in her decision.

Days after the September 11 attacks, Mr. Bush invoked his authority under the International Emergency Economic Powers Act and issued Executive Order 13224, declaring that the "grave acts of terrorism" and the "continuing and immediate threat of future attacks" on the United States constituted a national emergency.

He blocked all property and interests in property of 27 groups and persons, each of whom were identified as terrorists. He also authorized the secretary of the Treasury, in consultation with the secretary of state and the attorney general, to designate additional terrorist groups and persons under the order.

Judge Collins did let stand some sections of the order that penalize those who provide "services" to designated terrorist groups, including humanitarian aid and rights training.

A former Los Angeles prosecutor nominated to the federal bench in 1994 by President Clinton, Judge Collins is the first judge to declare any section of the USA Patriot Act as unconstitutional. In a January 2004 decision, she declared unconstitutional a Patriot Act provision that forbid giving advice or assistance to groups identified as foreign terrorist organizations by the U.S. government.

In that ruling, she said the provision was too vague to enforce and violated the Constitution's First and Fifth amendments, which protect freedom of speech and defendants from self-incrimination, respectively. Congress revised the act last year in response to her rulings and the case was sent back to District Court. The matter is still being litigated.

Al-Qaida Said To Be Operating In Somalia (AP)

By George Gedda

AP, November 30, 2006

Al-Qaida militants are operating with "great comfort" in Somalia, providing training and assistance to a radical military element loyal to the Islamic group that controls most of southern Somalia, a senior State Department official said Wednesday.

Jendayi Frazer, who heads the department's Africa bureau, said a priority U.S. goal is the capture of three militants wanted for the bombings of U.S. Embassies in Kenya and Tanzania in 1998 and a hotel in Kenya in 2002. The three are from Sudan, Kenya and the Camoros Islands, located off Africa's east coast.

"We're continuing to work with all sides in Somalia to try get those terrorists turned over and to prevent Somalia from becoming a safe haven," Frazer told a small group of reporters.

She emphasized that the al-Qaida presence goes well beyond the three suspects.

The administration has looked on with anxiety as Islamic militants, operating under the umbrella of the Union of Islamic Courts (UIC), have expanded their zone of influence in the country while marginalizing a secular government that lacks authority despite the backing of the United Nations and the United States.

The secular authority, known as the transitional federal government, is based in the western Somali town of Baidoa, unable to expand its reach further.

The administration supports the creation of an African force, totaling a battalion or two, to train and protect the transition government. The goal is to establish a balance in Somalia that would convince the Islamists that a military victory is impossible, thus creating conditions for a negotiated settlement between the two.

The African Union and the Intergovernmental Authority on Development, a seven-nation East African group, originally proposed deployment of an African force in Somalia.

The Islamists said in June they had no interest in forming a government but their actions since then suggest otherwise, the administration believes. The rise of the UIC over the past six months has alarmed non-Muslim countries throughout East Africa and generated fears of armed conflict throughout the region.

From the outset, the United States has supported a dialogue between the Islamists and the transition government.

In a statement Tuesday night, the State Department said the "continued military expansion by the UIC has prevented this dialogue from moving forward and has created the need for deployment of a regional force.

"The force will deter further aggression against the transition government, create the required space for dialogue and stabilize the situation."

The only country that has volunteered troops for the African force thus far is Uganda.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Democrats Reject Key 9/11 Panel Suggestion (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman

The Washington Post, November 30, 2006

It was a solemn pledge, repeated by Democratic leaders and candidates over and over: If elected to the majority in Congress, Democrats would implement all of the recommendations of the bipartisan commission that examined the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001.

But with control of Congress now secured, Democratic leaders have decided for now against implementing the one measure that would affect them most directly: a wholesale reorganization of Congress to improve oversight and funding of the nation's intelligence agencies. Instead, Democratic leaders may create a panel to look at the issue and produce recommendations, according to congressional aides and lawmakers.

Because plans for implementing the commission's recommendations are still fluid, Democratic officials would not speak for the record. But aides on the House and Senate appropriations, armed services and intelligence committees confirmed this week that a reorganization of Congress would not be part of the package of homeland-security changes up for passage in the "first 100 hours" of the Democratic Congress.

"I don't think that suggestion is going anywhere," said Rep. C.W. Bill Young (R-Fla.), the chairman of the Appropriations defense subcommittee and a close ally of the incoming subcommittee chairman, Rep. John P. Murtha (D-Pa.). "That is not going to be their party position."

It may seem like a minor matter, but members of the commission say Congress's failure to change itself is anything but inconsequential. In 2004, the commission urged Congress to grant the House and Senate intelligence committees the power not only to oversee the nation's intelligence agencies but also to fund them and shape intelligence policy. The intelligence committees' gains would come at the expense of the armed services committees and the appropriations panels' defense subcommittees. Powerful lawmakers on those panels would have to give up prized legislative turf.

But the commission was unequivocal about the need.

"Of all our recommendations, strengthening congressional oversight may be among the most difficult and important," the panel wrote. "So long as oversight is governed by current congressional rules and resolutions, we believe the American people will not get the security they want and need."

Now Democrats are balking, just as Republicans did before them.

The decision will almost certainly anger commission members, as well as families of victims of the Sept. 11 attacks, many of whom have pressed hard for implementation of the recommendations.

DOJ_NMG_0100019

"The Democrats pledged to implement all the remaining 9/11 reforms, not some of them," said former representative Timothy J. Roemer (D-Ind.), who served on the commission.

Carie Lemack, whose mother was in one of the jets that hit the World Trade Center, echoed that sentiment: "It wasn't a Chinese takeout menu, the 41 recommendations. You have to do all of them."

Democratic leadership dust-ups this month severely limited the ability of House Speaker-elect Nancy Pelosi (Calif.) to implement the commission's recommendations, according to Democratic aides.

Pelosi strongly backed Murtha for House majority leader, only to see him soundly defeated by Rep. Steny H. Hoyer (Md.). That chain of events made it difficult for her to ask Murtha, a longtime ally, to relinquish control of the intelligence budget from his consolation prize, the chairmanship of the Appropriations defense subcommittee, according to Democratic sources.

Likewise, a controversy over the choice of a new chairman of the House intelligence committee proved to be a factor in the decision. The Sept. 11 commission urged Congress to do away with traditional term limits on the intelligence committees to preserve continuity and expertise, a recommendation the House implemented in 2003. But in her search for a reason to drop the committee's most senior Democrat, Jane Harman (Calif.), from the panel, Pelosi fell back on the tradition of term limits. She has decided to pass over the intelligence committee's second-ranking Democrat, Alcee L. Hastings (Fla.), as well.

To the Sept. 11 commission, the call for congressional overhaul was vital, said former New Jersey governor Thomas H. Kean (R), the commission's co-chairman. Because intelligence committee membership affords lawmakers access to classified information, only intelligence committee members can develop the expertise to watch over operations properly, he said. But because the panels do not control the budget, intelligence agencies tend to dismiss them.

"The person who controls your budget is the person you listen to," Kean said.

Those people, the appropriators, do not seem to care much, he said. The intelligence budget is a small fraction of the nearly $500 billion overseen by the armed services committees and the appropriations panels' defense subcommittees. Kean said that Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), an Armed Services Committee member, told the Sept. 11 commission that if his panel spends 10 minutes considering the intelligence budget, it has been a good year.

"We think this is extremely crucial," Kean said of a reorganization shifting budget authority to the intelligence committees. But, he added, there are "a lot of old bulls in both parties who just don't want to do it."

In 2004, the Senate tried to reach a compromise on the issue, proposing to create intelligence subcommittees under the House and Senate appropriations committees. The appropriators would maintain most of their power, but at least distinct panels would have to watch over intelligence spending.

The idea went nowhere in the House. To make it work, total spending on intelligence would have to be declassified, another commission recommendation that Congress has rejected. Besides, Young said, an intelligence subcommittee effectively exists in the form of the Appropriations defense subcommittee chairman and ranking member, who have taken serious interest in intelligence spending.

Democratic aides yesterday chose to talk up what they will do in the opening hours of the 110th Congress. Plans are not complete, but the incoming Democratic majority is likely to expand efforts to stop the proliferation of nuclear, chemical and biological weapons; ensure the interoperability of communications equipment so first responders can communicate more effectively; develop a comprehensive screening system for air cargo; and establish a civil-liberties board to protect the public against intelligence agencies expanding their reach.

Analysis: New Animal Rights Terror Law (UPI)

By Shaun Waterman, Upi Homeland And National Security Editor

United Press International, November 30, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 29 (UPI) -- A new law that comes into force this week gives federal authorities expanded powers to prosecute animal rights militants -- as the State Department is warning that their activities eclipse terrorism as a day-to-day security problem for U.S. companies in Western Europe.

Bush signed S 3880, the Animal Enterprise Terrorism Act, without fanfare at the White House Monday morning, before flying to the Baltic for a NATO summit.

The bill is designed to make it easier for the FBI and Justice Department to wire-tap and prosecute animal rights extremists who mount campaigns of low-level criminal harassment against animal researchers both in the commercial and educational sectors.

Animal rights campaigners and their supporters say it will chill legal protest, and accuse lawmakers of ramming the bill through during the waning days of the lame-duck congress. But supporters retort that there were hearings in both the House and Senate last year and that the ACLU dropped objections to the new law after amendments it backed were incorporated by the bill's authors.

A State Department security briefing earlier this month for U.S. companies with overseas operations highlighted the threat from animal rights extremists as a major one in Western Europe and the United States.

"Although incidents related to terrorism are most likely to make the front page news, Animal Rights Extremism is what's most likely to affect your day-to-day business operations in Western Europe," read the speaker's notes for a PowerPoint presentation at the Overseas Security Advisory Council's annual briefing Nov. 15.

The presentation goes on to warn that extremist groups like the Animal Liberation Front "cause fear and distress, major property damage, and in some instances ... physical injury, and often put lives at risk."

Victims of one campaign have been assaulted with baseball bats, had their homes and cars vandalized, obscene messages painted in their street, late night telephone calls threatening the lives of their family and non-stop bullhorn protests in front of their homes.

But figures in the presentation suggest that the number of attacks in Britain and worldwide has fallen over the past two years.

The Association of the British Pharmaceutical Industry reported a drop off in the number of reports from its member companies of animal rights "incidents" -- defined to include threats, demonstrations and home visits by protestors, as well as property damage and the use of incendiary devices. From a high of 1,600 in 2004, the number fell to 1,400 last year, and only just over 400 were reported in the first half of 2006.

The association attributed this "sea change" to new legislation and an increased focus by British law enforcement, the presentation said.

Figures in the presentation from the Foundation for Biomedical Research, a U.S. advocacy group that supports medical experiments on animals, suggested that the same decline was mirrored worldwide. Their figures -- of illegal attacks by animal rights groups -- showed a drop from 100 in 2003, to 90 in 2004 and just over 80 the following year.

The presentation cautioned that the statistics "don't give the whole picture."

"Anecdotal evidence and reporting furnished by a broad cross-section of (U.S. companies) and by ... London's Metropolitan Police suggest that although street protests are down, ... site visits and autonomous acts of vandalism are on the rise throughout the region," say the speaker's notes.

Foundation for Biomedical Research President Frankie Trull told United Press International that many universities and other academic institutions in the United States had swung behind the bill after protests against one UCLA researcher culminated over the summer in an arson attack against his home.

"This is the kind of thing that we hope will now stop" because of the new law signed Monday, she said.

But Will Potter, a freelance journalist and animal rights sympathizer, said the bill would chill legitimate protest by campaigners, but not discourage real extremists.

"These people have shown that they are not going to stop doing these actions," he said, pointing out that immediately following the successful prosecution and jailing of campaigners against a research firm in New Jersey earlier this year, other militants had staged a break in a laboratory in Massachusetts, and dedicated their action to their jailed comrades in an internet communiqué.

"They will not be deterred," he said.

The new law strengthens existing federal legislation, which protects animal researchers and other businesses using animals from "physical disruption." The act signed Monday expands federal offenses under the law to cover campaigns of threats and intimidation that might financially cripple a company without any "physical disruption;" and increases penalties.

It also expands the law to cover so-called secondary and tertiary targets -- companies who do business with animal enterprises, like their bankers or stockbrokers -- and individual employees, neither of which were protected by the 1992 law.

Federal law enforcement officials say the new powers will enable them to launch investigations, including electronic surveillance of telephones, web sites and e-mail, against small groups of militants who are exploiting loopholes in the existing legislation.

Extremists "know what their rights are," according to the State Department presentation, "and as such, commit acts of nuisance that come right up to the line (of legality) without crossing it."

But it is precisely this kind of controversial, envelope-pushing -- but still legal -- campaigning tactics, like noisy but peaceful demonstrations at the homes of research company executives, which Potter says will be chilled by the new law.

"All this talk of 'terrorism' is sending a message.... It is making a lot of people very nervous," he said.

FEMA Told To Resume Storm Aid (WP)

By Spencer S. Hsu

DOJ_NMG_0100021

The Bush administration unconstitutionally denied aid to tens of thousands of Gulf Coast residents displaced by hurricanes Katrina and Rita and must resume payments immediately, a federal judge ordered yesterday.

U.S. District Judge Richard J. Leon said the Federal Emergency Management Agency created a "Kafkaesque" process that began cutting off rental aid in February to victims of the 2005 storms, did not provide clear reasons for the denials, and hindered applicants' due-process rights to fix errors or appeal government mistakes.

"It is unfortunate, if not incredible, that FEMA and its counsel could not devise a sufficient notice system to spare these beleaguered evacuees the added burden of federal litigation to vindicate their constitutional rights," Leon, a D.C. federal judge, wrote in a 19-page opinion.

"Free these evacuees from the 'Kafkaesque' application process they have had to endure," he wrote.

The decision again casts a spotlight on the fate of the poorest members of the diaspora created by the 2005 disasters in New Orleans and along the Louisiana and Mississippi coasts. The hurricanes forced a search for housing that was one of their least visible but most far-reaching consequences.

According to FEMA, of the 720,590 households that have received rental assistance, only 33,889 families remained eligible for aid as of Oct. 19. An additional 108,088 families, mostly homeowners, are still in FEMA-provided trailers and mobile homes. As a rule of thumb, analysts estimate each household includes nearly three people.

FEMA expects fewer than 4,700 of 2.6 million applicant families to exceed a $26,200 cap on all forms of post-disaster aid by March, when an 18-month statutory cutoff takes effect.

Advocates for storm victims say FEMA has resisted providing details about its programs to them or to applicants and has whittled down rolls by imposing obstacles to obtaining aid that is mandated under federal disaster laws. Administration defenders say that FEMA adopted tougher rules to combat fraud, and that plummeting rolls are a sign that victims have recovered and are moving on.

Yesterday, FEMA spokesman Aaron T. Walker would not say how many people are affected by Leon's decision, how much has been paid to them or how much is owed. He cited "ongoing litigation" and a possible appeal.

"FEMA's emergency sheltering initiative was conceived as a compassionate but short-term solution to shelter evacuees," Walker said in a written statement. "FEMA is considering the Court's order in consultation with the Department of Homeland Security and the Department of Justice, determining how the agency will proceed."

The case affects at least 11,000 families, said Robert W. Doggett, a lawyer with Texas Rio Grande Legal Aid. Doggett and the Public Citizen Litigation Group filed suit Aug. 31 for the Association of Community Organizations for Reform Now (ACORN), an anti-poverty group.

The case was brought on behalf of storm victims cut off beginning Feb. 22 from the smaller of two post-Katrina FEMA rental assistance programs, known as Section 403 aid.

FEMA phased out the program, under which cities such as Houston, Dallas and other public entities paid landlords directly for 60,000 apartments to house evacuees and were reimbursed by the federal government.

Instead, FEMA required evacuees to reapply for its larger Section 408 program, which provides households with rental cash for three months at a time pending recertification. Applicants must provide written proof that they made pre-hurricane rental payments and that their income had dropped or rent had increased since the storm. They also must document a plan for securing permanent housing, among other requirements. About 22,195 households still receiving rental aid transferred from the 403 program.

Leon ordered that FEMA restore benefits to evacuees who were ruled ineligible to make the switch and provide three months' payments. The agency must offer details on why applicants were cut off and how they can fix their applications or appeal FEMA's decision. Both programs expire in March.

Assuming a monthly rent of $800 for a two-bedroom apartment, the cost to extend aid if every family is located would be about $20 million.

According to Leon, FEMA issued "ambiguous and unintelligible" computer-generated denial letters that included "only a cryptic code and a phrase such as 'Ineligible-Other' " to explain why benefits were denied. Recipients were referred to a vague "Applicant Guide," which in turn referred them back to the "specific reason" in the letter.

Several evacuees told the court they received "contradictory and confusing" answers when they called FEMA for explanations. Plaintiffs "are unable to address, let alone intelligently appeal, decisions they cannot understand," Leon wrote. "Guessing by an applicant from among several explanations for ineligibility does not serve the fundamental purposes of due process."

ACORN spokesman Kevin Whelan called on FEMA to comply quickly with the ruling, adding: "It's certainly possible the new Congress will take a look at some of this."

Judge: Resume Katrina Payments (USAT)

By Mimi Hall

USA Today, November 30, 2006

WASHINGTON — A federal judge on Wednesday ordered FEMA to resume payments to thousands who lost homes to Hurricane Katrina, calling the agency's policies confusing and "Kafkaesque."

U.S. District Judge Richard Leon found that the Federal Emergency Management Agency (FEMA) failed earlier this year to explain to aid recipients why they suddenly had to reapply or were no longer eligible for emergency assistance.

Leon ruled that FEMA's letters to evacuees explaining the process were vague and the application process confusing. He ordered FEMA to resume payments until it either allows evacuees to appeal or better explains its actions.

"It is unfortunate, if not incredible, that FEMA and its counsel could not devise a sufficient notice system to spare these beleaguered evacuees the added burden of federal litigation to vindicate their constitutional rights," Leon wrote.

Charles Jackson, a spokesman for the Association of Community Organizations for Reform Now, which filed the lawsuit on behalf of the evacuees, said his group was "ecstatic" about the ruling. He said it would affect up to 11,000 families.

FEMA spokesman Aaron Walker defended the agency. By law, he said, the emergency housing assistance program is designed as a short-term solution to shelter evacuees. Those who apply and qualify can receive additional longer-term assistance through a separate program, he said.

Wednesday's ruling was the second win for Katrina evacuees this week. On Monday, a federal judge in Louisiana ruled that homeowners might be entitled to more insurance for flood damage because some policies excluding water damage were ambiguous.

FEMA Ordered To Restore Evacuees' Housing Aid (NYT)

By Shaila Dewan

The New York Times, November 30, 2006

FEMA has to restore housing assistance and pay back rent to thousands of Hurricane Katrina evacuees who had been deemed ineligible for long-term housing assistance, a federal judge ruled yesterday.

The judge, Richard J. Leon of Federal District Court for the District of Columbia, wrote that the agency also had to improve an appeals process that evacuees had long said was confusing, contradictory and amounted to an arbitrary denial of help.

"It is unfortunate, if not incredible, that FEMA and its counsel could not devise a sufficient notice system to spare these beleaguered evacuees the added burden of federal litigation to vindicate their constitutional rights," Judge Leon wrote.

The suit was brought by Acorn, a housing advocacy group that runs the Katrina Survivors Association. Michael Kirkpatrick, a lawyer with Public Citizen who represented Acorn, said that as many as 11,000 families could be affected based on numbers that the Federal Emergency Management Agency provided in court papers.

A spokesman for the agency, Aaron Walker, said it had not decided whether to seek a stay of the decision.

Last spring, the agency began notifying thousands of families given emergency shelter that they did not qualify for long-term help with rent and utility payments. That surprised many families who had been given housing vouchers valid for a year.

For months, families who had lost everything struggled to understand why they had been rejected and how to appeal that decision.

In a process that Judge Leon called Kafkaesque, families received notification letters with "reason codes" instead of actual reasons, were given different information each time they called the agency help line or found that the agency had erroneously determined that their house had "insufficient damage" or that someone else in their household (often a roommate) had already applied for assistance.

Mayor Bill White of Houston, where many evacuees fled from the Gulf Coast, was so outraged that he sent building inspectors to New Orleans to certify that the evacuees' houses were uninhabitable.

"Some families were told, 'Reason for denial: Other,' and there's no explanation for what 'other' means," Mr. Kirkpatrick said.

Some families received two letters with two different codes.

The judge said that the lack of clarity deprived evacuees of their rights of due process, pointing out that the agency had conceded that thousands of families had been incorrectly ruled ineligible.

In a statement after the decision, Mr. Walker of FEMA continued defending the process, saying the agency had given applicants 60 days to appeal and had listed the requirements.

"Additionally," Mr. Walker wrote, "FEMA established a team dedicated to handling appeals on an expedited basis and initiated calls to applicants in an effort to help them understand what documentation was needed to process their case."

The transfers of families from emergency housing to long-term help began last spring. Mayor White repeatedly persuaded the agency to delay evictions while it reviewed each family's file.

The families who managed to stay in apartments financed by the agency until the end of August are entitled to the reinstatement of rent payments and reimbursement for three months' back rent, the judge said.

All families deemed ineligible, no matter when, will receive more thorough explanations of the reasons and how to appeal their cases.

Judge Orders FEMA Payments To Katrina Victims (LAT)

By Nicole Gaouette And Ann Simmons

The Los Angeles Times, November 30, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Condemning the bureaucracy at the Federal Emergency Management Agency as "Kafkaesque," a federal judge Wednesday ordered the government to immediately resume housing payments to Gulf Coast residents who lost their homes to Hurricane Katrina.

Barely six months after Katrina ravaged the region, FEMA ended benefit payments to several thousand families still in temporary housing and unable to return to their homes.

U.S. District Judge Richard J. Leon said the agency had violated the evacuees' rights by not adequately explaining why it was ending the benefits, making it difficult for storm victims to appeal the decisions.

"It is unfortunate, if not incredible, that FEMA and its counsel could not devise a sufficient notice system to spare these beleaguered evacuees the added burden of federal litigation to vindicate their constitutional rights," he wrote.

Leon ordered the agency to explain its actions, restore short-term benefits to evacuees who had been cut off and give them the two months of housing payments they would have received after payments finally stopped in August 2006. The ruling affects 11,000 families, mostly in Louisiana and Texas.

The judge cited letters from FEMA that gave contradictory explanations for decisions. He also described FEMA's practice of conveying its decisions "cryptically ... by a code or phrase" decipherable only after evacuees obtained a separate pamphlet explaining the codes.

The judge quoted one evacuee telling of her efforts to get her benefits restored:

"The reasons I have been given for the termination are not what is in the documents, and/or the reasons change each time I call," Carmen Handy wrote to the court. "Every time I call back, the person answering the call knows nothing about what the previous person told me."

FEMA's critics in Congress used the opportunity presented by the ruling to call for changes.

"While this is a victory for the thousands who lost their homes during Hurricane Katrina, it is also a reminder that the system is still in desperate need of reform," said Rep. Bennie Thompson, D-Miss., the incoming chairman of the House Homeland Security Committee, which oversees FEMA. "It is unacceptable to force overburdened victims to navigate through bureaucratic red tape to find out whether they will ever have a place to go home to."

Under FEMA's transitional housing program for victims of Hurricane Katrina and Hurricane Rita, evacuees were entitled to financial assistance either for 18 months or to a maximum of $26,200.

After Katrina hit on Aug. 29, 2005, FEMA began providing victims with short-term housing assistance. In February 2006, it attempted to transfer eligible evacuees to a longer-term assistance program, which required recipients to meet certain criteria, but denied thousands of their applications, according to Leon's ruling. After a 30-day notice period, FEMA cut their short-term benefits as well.

Stephen Bradberry, head organizer for the New Orleans chapter of the Association of Community Organizations for Reform Now, an advocacy group that filed the lawsuit, said the ruling "allows families more time to try and take care of their affairs. And it will buy more time to put pressure on the government to step up to the plate and handle its responsibilities."

FEMA press secretary Aaron Walker said the agency's "emergency sheltering initiative was conceived as a compassionate but short-term solution to shelter evacuees. By law, sheltering assistance can be provided for only a limited period of time."

He added that FEMA had always intended to transfer eligible evacuees to the long-term benefits program.

"However," he said, "some individuals and households do not qualify."

Housing advocates said the agency's decisions about eligibility were arbitrary at best.

"They classified people on the basis of what kind of aid they got and what their perceived status was going forward. If you didn't fit a category you were cut off, and the appeals process was a joke," said Sheila Crowley, president of the National Low Income Housing Coalition.

Given the scale of the disaster, she said, FEMA's 18-month limit on aid is inadequate.

DOJ_NMG_0100024

"That is predicated on the assumption that it takes a community 18 months to recover from a disaster. That doesn't apply in this case. There's still no place for people to go," Crowley said.

FEMA Ordered To Resume Katrina Payments (AP)

By Matt Apuzzo

AP, November 30, 2006

The Bush administration must immediately resume housing payments for thousands of people displaced by Hurricane Katrina, a federal judge said Wednesday, heaping more criticism on the government's handling of the 2005 disaster.

U.S. District Judge Richard J. Leon's ruling sharply criticized the Federal Emergency Management Agency for illegally cutting housing funding and subjecting storm victims to a convoluted application process he called "Kafkaesque."

It is the second court victory for Katrina victims this week. A federal judge in Louisiana said Monday that many homeowners might be entitled to more insurance money for flood damage.

In the Washington case, Leon said FEMA mishandled the transition from a short-term housing program to a longer-term program this spring and summer.

FEMA, which was criticized in the wake of the storm for responding too slowly, defended itself in a statement released Wednesday night. FEMA said it sent letters outlining the program changes, explaining why some people were ineligible and describing the appeal process.

Leon, however, said those letters contained only program codes and agency jargon and didn't explain anything. Some evacuees got multiple letters with conflicting information, he said, leaving families unable to understand why their aid was being cut.

Until FEMA explains itself and allows victims to appeal, Leon said the government must keep making housing payments.

"It is unfortunate, if not incredible, that FEMA and its counsel could not devise a sufficient notice system to spare these beleaguered evacuees the added burden of federal litigation to vindicate their constitutional rights," Leon wrote.

In his ruling, Leon cited statements submitted by evacuees describing the ordeal.

"The reasons I have been given for the termination are not what is in the documents and/or the reasons change each time I call," said Carmen Handy, an evacuee whose statement was cited. "Every time I call back, the person answering the call knows nothing about what the previous person told me."

Leon's ruling came in a case brought in August by the Association of Community Organizations for Reform Now, which said more than 11,000 families would be affected. FEMA did not immediately have data on how much the ruling would cost and said it was considering its legal options.

ACORN spokesman Charles D. Jackson said the agency was trying to spread word about the ruling through the scattered communities of evacuees, some of whom were left homeless by FEMA's decisions.

In Louisiana, U.S. District Judge Stanwood Duval Jr. sided with New Orleans homeowners who argued that the language in some insurance policies that excluded water damage was ambiguous. He said a suit against The Allstate Corp., The St. Paul Travelers Companies Inc. and other insurers could go forward.

Duval said the policies did not distinguish between floods caused by an act of God — such as excessive rainfall — and floods caused by an act of man, which would include the levee breaches following Katrina's landfall on Aug. 29, 2005.

If successful, this suit could cost insurers $1 billion in Louisiana alone, industry officials said, and could lead to similar suits elsewhere. Insurers pledged to appeal.

The ruling was hailed by Xavier University, a historically black college in New Orleans that was inundated by six feet of water when nearby levees gave way. Xavier sued Travelers after the company only paid for a fraction of more than $50 million in damage to the school.

"When you pay for as much insurance as you can, you never dream that this kind of a catastrophe wouldn't be covered," said school President Norman Francis. "This ruling gives us a glimmer of hope."

Bush, Al-Maliki Meet In Jordan (USAT)

By David Jackson And Bill Nichols

USA Today, November 30, 2006

AMMAN, Jordan — President Bush and Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki began high-stakes talks early today, in the wake of last-minute scheduling changes and a parliamentary walkout in Baghdad.

DOJ_NMG_0100025

The two leaders had breakfast a day after the abrupt cancellation of a scheduled opening meeting that was also to have included Jordan's King Abdullah II, the host of this summit. A more formal meeting between Bush and Maliki was scheduled for later today.

Al-Maliki is under pressure at home, where 30 Iraqi lawmakers and six Cabinet members loyal to anti-U.S. Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr walked out of the parliament Wednesday to protest the Bush meeting.

The Bush administration has urged al-Maliki's fledgling government to take action against militias responsible for escalating violence. Al-Maliki has struggled to exert control over security forces and reduce sectarian violence.

White House counselor Dan Bartlett said the cancellation of the three-way meeting with Bush, al-Maliki and Abdullah was not a snub. But Charles Peña, an analyst with the Independent Institute, said pressure from anti-U.S. forces in Iraq and the publication of a classified memo from national security adviser Stephen Hadley criticizing al-Maliki may have prompted the Iraqi leader to send Bush a message by skipping the meeting.

The memo is “the sort of thing that leaders get upset about,” Peña said.

White House spokesman Tony Snow would not comment on the memo, which was published in The New York Times, but did not question its authenticity. The state of Iraq “suggests Maliki is either ignorant of what is going on, misrepresenting his intentions or that his capabilities are not yet sufficient to turn his good intentions into actions,” said Hadley's memo, according to the Times.

In Iraq, the walkout by al-Sadr's bloc positions the cleric to potentially bring down al-Maliki's government in a “clever bit of political brinksmanship,” said Vali Nasr, a Shiite expert at the Naval Postgraduate School in Monterey, Calif. Al-Sadr's bloc left open the possibility of rejoining or leaving al-Maliki's coalition government, Nasr said.

U.S.-Iraq Summit Abruptly Canceled (AP)

By Tom Raum

AP, November 30, 2006

President Bush's high-profile meeting with Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki on Wednesday was canceled in a stunning turn of events after disclosure of U.S. doubts about the Iraqi leader's capabilities and a political boycott in Baghdad protesting his attendance.

Instead of two days of talks, Bush and al-Maliki will have breakfast and a single meeting followed by a news conference on Thursday morning, the White House said.

The abrupt cancellation was an almost unheard-of development in the high-level diplomatic circles of a U.S. president, a king and a prime minister. There was confusion — and conflicting explanations — about what happened.

Bush had been scheduled to meet in a three-way session with al-Maliki and Jordan's King Abdullah II on Wednesday night, and had rearranged his schedule to be in Amman for both days for talks aimed at reducing the spiral of violence in Iraq.

The last-minute cancellation was not announced until Bush had already come to Raghadan Palace and posed for photographs alone with the king.

White House counselor Dan Bartlett denied that the delay was a snub by al-Maliki directed at Bush or was related to the leak of a memo written by White House National Security Adviser Stephen Hadley questioning the prime minister's capacity for controlling violence in Iraq.

"Absolutely not," Bartlett said." He said the king and the prime minister had met before Bush arrived from a NATO summit in Latvia. "That negated the purpose to meet tonight together in a trilateral setting."

A senior administration official, who spoke with U.S. Ambassador to Iraq Zalmay Khalilzad, basically echoed Bartlett's account.

The Jordanians and the Iraqis jointly decided it was not the best use of time because they both would be seeing the president separately, said the official.

Members of the Jordanian and Iraqi delegations contacted Khalilzad, who called Air Force One and spoke with Bush and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, giving them a heads-up, the official said.

However, Redha Jawad Taqi, a senior aide of top Shiite politician Abdul-Aziz al-Hakim who also was in Amman, said the Iraqis balked at the three-way meeting after learning the king wanted to broaden the talks to include the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

DOJ_NMG_0100026

Two senior officials traveling with al-Maliki, who spoke on condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the information, said the prime minister had been reluctant to travel to Jordan in the first place and decided, once in Amman, that he did not want "a third party" involved in talks about subjects specific to the U.S.-Iraqi relationship.

With Maliki already gone from the palace, Bush had an abbreviated meeting and dinner with the king before heading early to his hotel.

The cancellation came after the disclosure of a classified White House memo, written Nov. 8 by Hadley. In one particularly harsh section, Hadley asserted: "The reality on the streets of Baghdad suggests Maliki is either ignorant of what is going on, misrepresenting his intentions or that his capabilities are not yet sufficient to turn his good intentions into action."

Administration officials did not dispute the leaked account, saying that on balance the document was supportive of the Iraqi leader and generally portrayed him as well-meaning.

The president "has confidence in Prime Minister Maliki," said Bush spokesman Tony Snow, who added that al-Maliki "has been very aggressive in recent weeks in taking on some of the key challenges."

The memo recommended steps to strengthen the Iraqi leader's position, including possibly sending more troops to defend Baghdad and providing monetary support for moderate political candidates for Iraq's parliament.

The Iraqi prime minister also faced political pressure at home about the summit. Thirty Iraqi lawmakers and five cabinet ministers loyal to anti-American cleric Muqtada al-Sadr said they were boycotting Parliament and the government to protest al-Maliki's presence at the summit.

Bartlett said that Wednesday night's three-way meeting had always been planned as "more of a social meeting" and that Bush and Maliki on Thursday would have a "robust" meeting on their own.

The president was expected to ask the embattled Iraqi prime minister how best to train Iraqi forces faster so they can shoulder more responsibility for halting the sectarian violence and, specifically, mending a gaping Sunni-Shiite divide. There are about 140,000 U.S. troops in Iraq, and Bush is under unrelenting pressure from Democrats and many Republicans to start bringing them home.

Some analysts suggested that the memo might actually help more than damage al-Maliki, showing distance between him and Bush.

Jon Alterman, former special assistant secretary of state for Near Eastern affairs, said the memo's doubts about al-Maliki "seemed calculated to steel his spine."

"This memo reads to me more like a memo to Prime Minister al-Maliki than to President Bush," said Alterman, now with the Center for Strategic and International Studies. "It has his entire to-do list as well as a list of what he'll get if he agrees."

In Washington, Sen. Jack Reed, D-R.I., called on Bush to appoint a high-ranking special envoy to work with the Iraqi government on disbanding militias, including all Iraq's factions in the nation's political process and equitably distributing resources such as oil revenue.

"Steps have to be taken now," he said.

Bush's meeting with al-Maliki is part of a new flurry of diplomacy the administration has undertaken across the Middle East. Hadley's memo suggests that Secretary of State Rice should hold a meeting for Iraq and its neighbors in the region early next month and also that the U.S. could step up efforts to get Saudi Arabia to help. It was written just weeks before Secretary of State Dick Cheney was dispatched to Saudi Arabia.

Senior administration officials, speaking on the condition of anonymity because the document is still classified even though published, said that many of the concerns raised by Hadley have been or are being rectified in the month that has passed since his trip to Baghdad.

US Sends More Troops Into Baghdad (FT)

By Sharmila Devi, Guy Dinmore And Roula Khalaf

Financial Times, November 30, 2006

More US and Iraqi troops are to be deployed in Baghdad, US commanders said on Wednesday, in an effort to shore up the weakened Iraqi prime minister as he prepares to meet George W. Bush in Amman on Thursday.

Officials insisted that Nouri al-Maliki – who is weakened by mounting disaffection in Washington while his own government fragments – and the US president would hold long talks on Thursday morning even though a three-way summit with Jordan's King Abdullah was called off on Wednesday night.

A senior US official denied that Mr Maliki had snubbed the president following the leak to the New York Times of a memo written by Stephen Hadley, national security adviser, who expressed strong doubts about the Iraqi prime minister's intentions and ability to control sectarian violence.

One of Mr Hadley's main recommendations in his November 8 memo was that Mr Maliki should shake up his cabinet by appointing technocrats and end his "political strategy" with Moqtada al-Sadr, the radical cleric whose militia are accused of violence against Sunni Arabs.

Mr Maliki left a political storm behind him at home. Shia lawmakers and cabinet ministers led by Mr al-Sadr suspended their participation in government institutions in protest at the summit. The boycott by the five Sadrist ministers and 30 lawmakers may not cause lasting damage but it piles the pressure on Mr Maliki.

Iraqi officials say the prime minister is looking for a faster handover of security to Iraqis and discussion on an agreement to regulate the presence of the 160,000-strong multinational forces.

In Washington, General Peter Pace, chairman of the joint chiefs of staff, said all ideas were under review but meanwhile General George Casey, commander of US forces in Iraq, had decided to send two battalions – about 1,200 troops – to the capital.

Gen Pace expressed his support for sending more Iraqi forces to Baghdad. He said the Iraqi and US political leadership was discussing where they should be drawn from and what "cultural flavour" – Shia or Sunni – the units should have in their deployment.

US officials played down suggestions of US displeasure with Mr Maliki, as the consequences of the leaked memo reverberated around their capitals.

Abdelaziz al-Hakim, one of Mr Maliki's main Shia rivals and a coalition partner, has been invited by the White House to Washington next week.

Separately, Mr Bush, dining on Wednesday night with King Abdullah, ruled out US engagement with Syria at this moment, a US official said.

Sadr Casts A Shadow Over Bush-Maliki Meeting (WP)

By Sudarsan Raghavan

The Washington Post, November 30, 2006

BAGHDAD, Nov. 29 -- When President Bush meets Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki in Amman, Jordan, on Thursday, it will be clear that the real power in Iraq rests with radical cleric and militia leader Moqtada al-Sadr.

In one swift maneuver Wednesday, Sadr cast a shadow over the diplomacy in Amman and issued a reminder of his growing influence in Iraq when a bloc of his party's lawmakers and cabinet members suspended their participation in the government to protest Maliki's decision to meet with Bush in Jordan.

The move raises concerns about the ability of Maliki and Iraq's fragile unity government -- beset by political paralysis, feuding rivalries and corruption -- to survive. If Sadr decides to prolong his departure from government, it could lead to deeper crisis in a nation already divided by sectarian strife.

Sadr is bringing pressure to bear on Maliki to not give in to demands by the United States on security matters. They include the U.S. drive to dismantle Iraq's Shiite militias, of which Sadr runs the largest and most violent, the Mahdi Army.

Shiite leaders, including Sadr and Maliki, want the United States to cede more operational control of Iraq's security forces. At the same time, Sadr appears to be sending a clear message to Washington, analysts and Iraqi politicians say, as tensions are growing between Sadr and U.S. military forces, which routinely stage raids inside his Baghdad stronghold of Sadr City.

"It was a way to make both Maliki and Washington understand that he holds a lot of cards," Vali Nasr, an expert on Shiite politics, said of the walkout from parliament.

Sadr's popularity and confidence are rising. The latest boost came last week, in the aftermath of a barrage of car bombs, mortars and missiles that battered the Shiite slum of Sadr City. More than 200 were killed in the attacks, the single deadliest assault against Iraqis since the U.S.-led invasion in 2003. A day after those attacks, powerful politicians allied with Sadr vowed to pull out of the government if Maliki met with Bush.

On Wednesday, they kept their promise. In a statement, the 30 lawmakers and five cabinet ministers loyal to Sadr launched the boycott. It is not clear what this will mean for the future of Iraq's government and the country.

Nasar al-Rubaie, president of Sadr's bloc in parliament, cautioned that its action did not mean it was pulling out of the government. "The suspension does not mean our withdrawal from the political process," Rubaie said.

He added that the Sadr allies would discuss in coming days how long they would stay out. "It's an indefinite suspension," he said.

Hasan Suneid, an Islamic Dawa party parliament member and close aide to Maliki, played down the significance of the Sadr bloc members' action, describing it as "a sort of protest."

"They need to show their political attitude against the meeting of Maliki and Bush," Suneid said. "The suspension is very normal for any parliament member, and it could last for three or four days."

Whether it was intended or not, Sadr's action also could boost Maliki's influence with the U.S. president, analysts and politicians said. "This will put him in a strong position with Mr. Bush," said Saleh Mutlaq, leader of the Iraqi National Dialogue Party, the second biggest Sunni Muslim party in parliament. "Then, the pressure on Maliki to dissolve the militias will be reduced."

Maliki needs Sadr's support to survive politically. He has preferred political dialogue to military confrontation in dealing with Sadr, even as pressure mounts from U.S. generals and lawmakers for tougher action. The prospect of dismantling such militias as the Mahdi Army is becoming more difficult with every attack and every bombing by Sunni Arab insurgents, which make more Shiites turn to the Mahdi Army for protection.

Many Shiites, including such leaders as Maliki, believe the U.S. military is unfairly targeting Shiite militias instead of focusing its efforts on taking down the Sunni insurgents.

"I think the Sadr City attacks make them feel they are being targeted by the Americans," Ali Dabbagh, an Iraqi government spokesman, said of the lawmakers' pullout from the government. "They want to show they are against the Americans."

Sadr has plenty of incentives to remain inside the Iraqi government. His efforts to wage a guerrilla war to drive out the U.S. forces, including brutal confrontations in Najaf and Fallujah in 2004, nearly decimated his militia forces. Afterward, he opted for a political approach, capitalizing on the popularity he had reaped for fighting the U.S. occupiers. In government, he controls key ministries such as health and education, allowing him to build his base and his militia by channeling vital services and jobs to his supporters.

Sadr has also appeared to savor his role as political kingmaker and religious leader. He has made public comments seeking to rein in violence by what he considers rogue elements of his Mahdi Army. He is widely believed to model his movement on Lebanon's Hezbollah, which has both an armed wing and a political wing that participates in government.

He leads the second largest army in Iraq, after the U.S. military. His support ranges from southern Iraq, where Shiites dominate, to Sadr City in Baghdad. "If there's going to be a new election, he will be the biggest beneficiary," Nasr said.

If Sadr decided to remain outside and the government weakened or collapsed, it would set back U.S. efforts to bring stability to Iraq and the region, Nasr said. So would any American escalation of tensions with Sadr, he added.

"We are already bogged down with Sadr's army without even waging a war with him," Nasr said.

Dabbagh said the Bush administration needs to do more to engage Sadr and treat him as a politician rather than a militia leader.

"They want to be recognized," Dabbagh said, referring to Sadr and his followers. "They want to show they are also a player in Iraq and they should be taken care of and recognized."

Mahmoud Othman, a Kurdish legislator, warned that Bush administration officials should tread cautiously with Maliki in the wake of Sadr's boycott.

"They should be very careful," Othman said. "Before putting pressure on Maliki, the United States should give him more authority, so he will be more capable. If they pressure him too much now, it may backfire."

U.S.-Iraq Summit Put Off Until Thursday (AP)

President Bush's high-profile meeting with Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki on Wednesday was canceled in a stunning turn of events after disclosure of U.S. doubts about the Iraqi leader's capabilities and a political boycott in Baghdad protesting his attendance.

Bush-Maliki Meeting Canceled; Lawmakers Withdraw From Posts (MCT)

By Hannah Allam And William Douglas

McClatchy Newspapers, November 30, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0100030

AMMAN, Jordan - A scheduled dinner meeting between President Bush and Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki was canceled Wednesday, hours after 36 Iraqi politicians loyal to militant Shiite Muslim cleric Muqtada al-Sadr withdrew from their government posts and denounced Bush as "the world's biggest evil."

The White House denied that the delay was a snub by the Iraqi leader and insisted that "robust" talks would continue as planned on Thursday, despite the political turmoil in Baghdad and the leak of an administration memo detailing U.S. concerns about Maliki's ability to control sectarian violence.

The cancellation was clearly a surprise, however, and coupled with the withdrawal of the Sadrists who are a key part of Maliki's political base, it underscored how volatile Iraq has become as violence has reached record levels.

At least 57 bodies were found scattered around Baghdad on Wednesday, and there were reports of widespread violence around the country, including a raid by Sunni insurgents on the police station in Baqouba, apparently in an effort to cement control of that city north of the capital.

The U.S. military announced the deaths of two more American soldiers: One died on Wednesday from "wounds sustained due to enemy action" in western Anbar province; the other was killed on Tuesday by a roadside bomb in northern Salahuddin province.

Meanwhile, in Washington, the high-level Iraq Study Group, co-chaired by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III and retired Democratic congressman Lee Hamilton, wrapped up three days of consultations Wednesday and announced that it will present its recommendations to Congress, the White House and the public on Dec. 6.

Experts close to the panel said the five Republican and five Democratic commissioners have reached a consensus and will present what one called "a candid, frank assessment" of the deteriorating situation in Iraq. The panel appears unlikely, however, to recommend a deadline to begin withdrawing U.S. troops from Iraq, though its final recommendation on that issue isn't known.

Administration officials were at a loss to offer a single version of why the Maliki-Bush dinner was canceled. One senior administration official insisted that the dinner had never been planned, but a schedule given to reporters traveling with the president on Tuesday listed a 7:45 p.m. meeting among Bush, Maliki and Jordan's King Abdullah II, followed by an 8:35 p.m. dinner.

Spokesmen for King Abdullah said that the schedule had been changed to give the king more time to meet with Bush on Jordanian issues. They said that Abdullah had met with Maliki earlier in the day.

Whatever the reason, the cancellation heightened the drama surrounding Thursday's planned Maliki-Bush session, which roiled Iraq's delicate political balance even before it took place.

In a stinging rebuke to Maliki, the Sadr supporters - six Shiite Cabinet ministers and 30 legislators - said that any meeting with Bush was against the will of the Iraqi people. They said their boycott of the government was open-ended.

"This is an objection to the policy of an Iraqi government that insists on importing solutions from foreign countries when all the crises we face are because of the presence of the occupation forces," said Bahaa al-Araji, one of the Sadr-allied lawmakers. "There is no need to open paths for U.S. and regional forces to get involved in our affairs, especially if it means giving these forces the authority to run our security policy."

The Sadr forces have been crucial allies for Maliki, and their decision to withdraw from the government put the prime minister, already considered weak, in the difficult position of having to reject his Iraqi supporters to avoid humiliating Bush, even as administration officials leaked a secret memo questioning Maliki's competence and leadership abilities.

White House counselor Dan Bartlett denied that the leaked document, which was published by The New York Times on Wednesday, played a role in the dinner's cancellation.

"Absolutely not," he said. "No one should read too much into this, except for the fact that they (Bush and Abdullah) had a good meeting."

The Sadrists' anti-American remarks were ominous reminders that they remain opposed to the presence of U.S. forces in Iraq. Sadr forces clashed openly with American forces twice in 2004.

Al-Araji said the Sadrists weren't out to topple Maliki's government, just to "register objections" to the meeting. The boycotting politicians would present Maliki with a set of unspecified demands upon his return from Jordan, al-Araji said.

Many Sadrists said they were infuriated by Maliki's decision to meet with Bush after recent U.S. military raids on their stronghold of Sadr City in Baghdad. They also accused Maliki of bowing to U.S. pressure with reported plans to expand the number of American troops in Baghdad.

"This is not a visit. It's a summons," said Maha Adil Mahdi, a legislator from the Sadrist bloc. "It's an insult to the people of Sadr City. They bombed the city, and people were in a sea of blood, but then when they call him, he goes."

Maliki's top aides were out of the country with the prime minister and couldn't be reached for comment.

Both U.S. and Iraqi forces appear increasingly powerless to halt the escalating insurgent and sectarian violence in Baghdad and other provinces.

Ten civilians were injured in separate mortar attacks in the Shoala and Shurta neighborhoods, where Sunni insurgents are battling Shiite militias for supremacy.

A homemade bomb exploded at a bus stop in Baghdad, killing two Iraqi civilians and injuring four others, including two policemen, the interior ministry announced. Three car bombs were detonated in other attacks on patrols and checkpoints in the capital, killing two civilians and one policeman. Eight civilians and nine officers were wounded, police said.

Large-scale gun battles and other violence broke out in areas north of Baghdad, according to Iraqi security officials in Salahuddin province. Four policemen were killed and six were wounded in a car bombing in Tikrit, the hometown of Saddam Hussein.

In Samarra, police said, 10 carloads of gunmen ambushed a police checkpoint, killing two policemen and injuring three others. The attackers seized some police weapons, but were driven off by intervening U.S. troops. A curfew was imposed on the city shortly after the attack.

Residents of Baqouba in Diyala province said that Sunni insurgents are working to cement their control of the city, which is mostly shuttered after several days of intense fighting. As many as 50 attackers armed with mortars, machine guns and rocket-propelled grenades stormed the main police station from three sides Wednesday, Iraqi security officials said. Five gunmen were killed at the scene; no other casualties were reported.

A health ministry official in Diyala, whose name was withheld for security reasons, said the Baqouba hospital's morgue could no longer cope with the unidentified bodies that are piling up after the recent spasm of violence. Health officials on Wednesday gave local residents two days to claim 19 bodies before they were buried in unmarked graves.

The official said he's received reports of additional corpses being consumed by dogs because Baqouba's streets remain too dangerous for recovery crews.

Youssef in Amman; and McClatchy special correspondents Mohammed al Awsy, Shatha al Awsy, Laith Hammoudi and Zaineb Obeid in Baghdad contributed to this report. Iraq's Premier Abruptly Skips A Bush Session (NYT)

By Sheryl Gay Stolberg And Edward Wong

The New York Times, November 30, 2006

AMMAN, Jordan, Nov. 29 — Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki of Iraq and King Abdullah II of Jordan abruptly backed out of a meeting with President Bush on Wednesday, leaving the White House scrambling to explain why a carefully planned summit meeting had suddenly been cut from two days to one.

The decision occurred on a day that a classified White House memorandum expressing doubts about Mr. Maliki was disclosed and after Iraqi officials loyal to a powerful Shiite cleric said they were suspending participation in the Maliki government because he had ignored their request to cancel the Bush meeting entirely.

The president and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice were already aboard Air Force One, on the way to Amman from Riga, Latvia, where they had been attending a NATO summit meeting, when they received the news by telephone from the United States ambassador to Iraq, Zalmay Khalilzad. The White House insisted Mr. Bush was not upset and had not been snubbed.

"Absolutely not," said Dan Bartlett, counselor to the president.

With the Wednesday night meeting with the king canceled, Mr. Bush and Mr. Maliki still intend to have breakfast together here Thursday. A senior White House official said that after the king and Mr. Maliki had held a productive private meeting earlier in the day, they had decided that a three-way session with Mr. Bush was not "the best use of time."

In Baghdad, the immediate effect of the walkout by officials loyal to Moktada al-Sadr, the anti-American Shiite cleric, was unclear. But the departure of the Sadr followers — 30 Parliament members and six ministers — raises questions about the viability of the fragile coalition government, made up of feuding blocs of religious Shiites, religious Sunni Arabs, Kurds and secularists.

The day's events underscore the delicate task Mr. Bush and Mr. Maliki face as they head into Thursday's meeting. As tensions rise in Iraq, friction has grown between the leaders, despite Mr. Bush's insistence that he has faith in Mr. Maliki.

Each man is under pressure at home to extract concessions from the other. Mr. Maliki is facing demands from Mr. Sadr for the Iraqi government to wrest control of security forces from the Americans, and the boycott places more pressure on the prime minister to do just that.

Mr. Bush, for his part, must demonstrate to an uneasy American public that he is taking control of the increasingly violent situation in Iraq. Democrats, triumphant in a midterm election that was widely viewed as a referendum on the war, are pressing for a troop withdrawal and demanding that Mr. Bush send a message to Mr. Maliki that the troops' presence is not open-ended. A bipartisan commission will make recommendations on Iraq next week.

The White House tacked the hastily planned trip to Amman onto Mr. Bush's swing through the Baltics so he could meet Mr. Maliki on safe ground. But the careful orchestration leading up to the Bush-Maliki summit meeting — including a news conference in Estonia on Tuesday where Mr. Bush promised to press the Iraqi prime minister on his strategy for stability — was upended when The New York Times published the classified assessment of Mr. Maliki in Wednesday's issue.

The document, written by the national security adviser, Stephen J. Hadley, said that while Mr. Maliki seemed to have good intentions when talking with Americans, "the reality on the streets suggests Maliki is either ignorant of what's going on, misrepresenting his intentions or that his capabilities are not yet sufficient."

Publication of the memorandum just as Mr. Bush was to see Mr. Maliki left the White House struggling to put a positive spin on the news on a day when it had hoped to highlight a decision by NATO members that would lift some restrictions on troops operating in Afghanistan.

"The president has confidence in Prime Minister Maliki," Tony Snow, the White House press secretary, told reporters in Riga, where the president's aides seemed clearly worried about how the document would affect the talks.

Later, after Mr. Maliki canceled, senior officials insisted the document had nothing to do with it. "The president and Prime Minister Maliki will have a very robust and lengthy dialogue tomorrow morning," Mr. Bartlett said in Amman, adding, "No one should read too much into this."

But it was impossible not to read some palace intrigue into the scrubbing of such a meeting, especially when it involved a White House known for its meticulous planning.

As Bush aides tried to provide an explanation for the cancellation — before conceding that Mr. Maliki and the king had called the session off — they at one point went so far as to suggest it had been put on the schedule erroneously. Mr. Snow was still talking about photo opportunities for the meeting when Air Force One landed in Amman — after Mr. Bush had already received word from the ambassador.

The president was not received warmly here. Hundreds of Jordanians held a rare sit-in at Jordan's Parliament house on Wednesday morning, while up to 500 marched through the streets Wednesday afternoon, holding banners calling Mr. Bush a criminal and a murderer. Many carried photographs of Saddam Hussein.

"We see his arrival here as an insult to the martyrs killed by U.S. weapons," said Bassim Qiswani, head of Jordan's Doctors Syndicate as he marched toward the prime minister's office. "Bush created all these problems, and now he wants the Arabs to fix them."

Mr. Bush is indeed trying to reach out to moderate Arab nations to alter the dynamic in the Middle East. He dined Wednesday night with King Abdullah, where the two leaders and their aides discussed Israeli-Palestinian relations and Syria's involvement in Lebanon.

According to a senior administration official who attended the dinner, Iraq was not a primary focus of the meal. But the king and the president also met privately; it was unclear if they discussed Iraq out of earshot of their aides.

Although Mr. Bush is under pressure to engage Syria as well as Iran in direct talks aimed at bringing stability to Iraq, the official said the president "made clear his view that this is not the time for engagement with Syria because the Syrian government always seems to see any such form of engagement as a gesture of approval, or as a way of getting off the hook for actions that it is taking."

The president's trip to Jordan comes as Secretary Rice is going to Israel on Thursday to see Prime Minister Ehud Olmert. It also comes amid a new wave of sectarian violence in Iraq. Last week, more than 200 people died in bombings and mortar strikes in a Shiite district of Baghdad, the deadliest attack since the American invasion. A bloody Shiite reprisal followed.

That prospect seemed heightened by Wednesday's boycott. At the urging of senior ayatollahs, the religious Shiite bloc that dominates the government is expected to stay together despite the walkout. But the balance of power within it would change drastically if Mr. Sadr were to prolong the walkout.

Baha al-Aaraji, a leader of the Sadr legislators, said the organization had two conditions for rejoining the government: that Mr. Maliki wrest more control of the Iraqi security forces from the Americans and increase their number, and that the government provide more electricity, gas and other basic services.

In recent months Mr. Sadr has chafed as American and British forces have been conducting more operations across the capital and southern Iraq aimed at undermining his populist militia.

Mr. Sadr, in his early 30s, is arguably the most powerful politician in Iraq because Mr. Maliki is beholden to him for his support in staving off the prime minister's Shiite rivals, and because Mr. Sadr controls a militia that, numbering in the tens of thousands, is regarded by many of the majority Shiites as a protector against Sunni extremists. Mr. Hadley's memorandum said that the Americans must press Mr. Maliki to “bring his political strategy with Moktada al-Sadr to closure and bring to justice” any Mahdi Army members who “do not eschew violence.”

Mr. Sadr’s mercurial nature makes it difficult to predict what will happen next. Mr. Sadr has incentives to return to the government — he is protected from American pressure by Mr. Maliki, and he is able to play the role of statesman, even meeting with foreign leaders in neighboring countries.

Bush administration officials consider Mr. Sadr to be one of the most vexing problems facing Mr. Maliki. Though American commanders have been urging the prime minister to turn against Mr. Sadr and his militia, Mr. Maliki has found it impossible to betray his Shiite compatriot. That task grows exponentially more difficult each time a car bombing by Sunni Arabs wipes out dozens of Shiites in a marketplace or mosque, spurring the Shiites to turn to the Sadr militia, called the Mahdi Army, for revenge and protection.

One Shiite official close to the Sadr organization said that the current walkout was simply stagecraft intended to play to anti-American sentiments here.

“They’re just doing that to show their supporters that they are against any deals or contact with Americans,” said the official, who spoke on the condition of anonymity because of a fear of reprisal by the Sadr loyalists. “It’s pointless. It’s just for show.”

“They will cancel their suspension in a week or so,” the official predicted. “It’s a very stupid act.”

Attacks Continue Across Iraq

BAGHDAD, Nov. 29 — Bombings across Baghdad left at least four people dead and five wounded on Wednesday, and another five were killed in Diyala Province after insurgents killed a store owner and planted a bomb in his shop, according to the Interior Ministry and the American military.

A marine was killed Wednesday in combat in Anbar Province, and a soldier was killed Tuesday by a roadside bomb in northern Iraq, the military said. The Air Force declared a pilot, Maj. Troy Gilbert, missing after his F-16 crashed northwest of Baghdad on Monday. The Air Force is conducting tests on human remains at the site.

Bush Meets Maliki, Stands Firm On Iraq (LAT)

By Peter Wallsten And Solomon Moore

The Los Angeles Times, November 30, 2006

AMMAN, JORDAN — President Bush and Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri Maliki convened for breakfast this morning, the day after an abrupt cancellation of their initial meeting embarrassed the White House and hinted at diplomatic tensions between the two countries.

The cancellation followed the disclosure of a White House memo questioning Maliki's ability to pacify his country and came after a Shiite bloc announced a boycott of the Baghdad government.

Bush and Maliki also met privately today and then held a joint news conference before the president's return to Washington. Bush and Maliki said they agreed to speed the training of Iraqi security forces, and they pledged to continue cooperation between the U.S. and Iraq to stem violence.

"I told the prime minister that our goal in Iraq is to strengthen his government and support his efforts to build a free Iraq," Bush said.

But Wednesday's developments threatened to spoil a summit that administration officials had hoped would demonstrate progress in devising strategies for stemming civil strife in Iraq.

White House officials spent the day on the defensive, insisting they had faith in Maliki despite the harsh content of the leaked memo and struggling to explain why a meeting that had been on the president's calendar for days was suddenly scrubbed.

Senior Bush aides offered at least four explanations for the cancellation — finally dispatching a more junior official to tell reporters late Wednesday that Maliki and Jordan's King Abdullah II had decided mutually that a three-way conversation was not necessary.

The Jordanian and Iraqi leaders had met earlier in the day and sent word of their decision to Bush as the president flew to Amman from a North Atlantic Treaty Organization summit in Latvia.

White House officials insisted the schedule change was not a snub in response to the memo, disclosed Wednesday by the New York Times, nor was it related, they said, to a government boycott in Iraq by Shiite legislators affiliated with anti-American cleric Muqtada Sadr.

"No one should read too much into this," said Dan Bartlett, a Bush advisor.

Bush and Abdullah met privately for 30 minutes before joining their aides for a dinner lasting more than an hour. They discussed the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, Lebanon and Syria but did not focus on Iraq, officials said.

Despite recent assurances from Bush and his aides that the president would use his meetings in Amman to ask tough questions of Maliki about the Iraqi leader's plans to stem the violence, Bartlett said the initial gathering had been foreseen as "more of a social meeting anyways."

"Look, they were not going to be doing a full-detail discussion in a [three-way] setting about Iraq and the future of Iraq and the strategy anyway. That just wouldn't be appropriate," Bartlett said.

Still, the surprising change of plans suggested more was at work than a scheduling matter among friends.

Bush rarely deviates from plans — and officials acknowledged that they departed Latvia with the understanding that he would meet with Maliki that night.

The Jordanians and Iraqis offered different explanations for the cancellation.

A royal court source said Abdullah and Bush met longer than expected and had to cancel the meeting with Maliki. The source said Maliki could be using the delay, which was requested by Abdullah, for political advantage in calming the Sadr movement.

"The king and Maliki saw each other for an hour and a half this afternoon, and Maliki's meeting Bush tomorrow," the source said. "The king and Bush were supposed to talk for an hour and a half, but the meeting went longer because of discussion about the Palestinian issue. This was a matter of rescheduling, nothing else. It wasn't Maliki's decision."

The source suggested that Maliki might be claiming that he canceled the meeting as a way to appease hard-line Sadr supporters who have boycotted the government in protest of his meeting with Bush.

The Sadr loyalists denounced Bush as "the biggest representative of evil in the world" and his meeting with Maliki as a "provocation and insult to the feelings of the Iraqi people."

Other Iraqi politicians, however, dismissed the gesture as political posturing aimed at Sadr's militant base, millions of mostly impoverished Shiites in Baghdad and southern Iraq.

The boycott appears to fall short of Sadr's threat last week to withdraw from the government.

His movement controls 30 seats in parliament and several ministries, enough to topple the prime minister if they were to quit the government.

All told, a day that the White House had hoped might showcase Bush taking charge in Iraq just weeks after voters rebuked his policies turned ugly for the administration.

The internal memo, written Nov. 8 by national security advisor Stephen Hadley, hinted at rising tensions between Washington and Baghdad.

"His intentions seem good when he talks with Americans, and sensitive reporting suggests he is trying to stand up to the Shia hierarchy and force positive change," the memo says of Maliki, according to a text posted on the New York Times website. "But the reality on the streets of Baghdad suggests Maliki is either ignorant of what is going on, misrepresenting his intentions or that his capabilities are not yet sufficient to turn his good intentions into action."

The disclosure of Hadley's memo was potentially more troublesome because it appeared to contrast with what Hadley had said as recently as Tuesday: that Maliki's government was "doing pretty well in a very difficult situation."

Administration officials said the memo was a "hard look, a probing look" at the conditions in Iraq but should not be interpreted as a criticism of Maliki.

"The president has confidence in Prime Minister Maliki, and the administration is working with the prime minister to improve his capabilities in terms of dealing with the fundamental challenges in Iraq," said White House spokesman Tony Snow.

The memo was drafted about a week after Hadley visited Baghdad and the day after Republicans suffered sweeping losses in congressional elections dominated by public dissatisfaction with Bush's policies in Iraq.

The memo also suggests urging Saudi Arabia to "take a leadership role in supporting Iraq by using its influence to move Sunni populations in Iraq out of violence into politics, to cut off any public or private funding provided to the insurgents or death squads from the region and to lean on Syria to terminate its support for Baathists [followers of Saddam Hussein] and insurgent leaders."

The mention of Saudi Arabia could explain why Vice President Dick Cheney paid a surprise visit to Riyadh, the Saudi capital, last week for what Hadley called a "very confidential conversation."

Iraq Cancels Meeting After 'Ignorant' Memo (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, November 30, 2006

AMMAN, Jordan -- Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki abruptly canceled the first round of face-to-face meetings scheduled here last night with President Bush, just hours after publication of a classified memo from the president's top security aide that says the Iraqi leader is either "ignorant," devious or incapable of governing right now.

The White House said the events were not related, said the cancellation was not a snub, and said the two men will have enough time together this morning, when they have a working breakfast and meeting planned.

"No one should read too much into this," said Dan Bartlett, senior counselor to Mr. Bush.

The meeting had been scheduled to include Mr. Bush, Mr. al-Maliki and Jordan's King Abdullah II. Yesterday evening, though, the meeting was reduced to a one-on-one between the president and the king, who were also scheduled to have dinner later.

The cancellation and the leaked memo by National Security Adviser Stephen J. Hadley set off a day of "background" briefings by White House officials who refused to be named but tried to explain the ups and downs of diplomacy.

An administration official told reporters Mr. al-Maliki and King Abdullah, after holding their own bilateral talks, decided "they did not feel it was necessary" for Mr. Bush to meet them together. They had Zalmay Khalilzad, the U.S. ambassador to Iraq, call Mr. Bush, flying on Air Force One from Latvia, to tell him they wanted to cancel the meeting. The president agreed, the official said.

The Associated Press quoted Iraqi officials here with Mr. al-Maliki saying the Iraqi leader canceled the meeting because he didn't want King Abdullah to be a part of U.S.-Iraq discussions.

The president only recently tacked this trip on to the end of his journey to Latvia for the NATO summit, with the White House announcing last week Mr. Bush wanted face-to-face time with Mr. al-Maliki. Mr. Hadley said there "is really no substitute for the two men getting together, sitting across a table and talking face to face."

But the canceled meetings reduce the amount of face-to-face time substantially.

The memo, obtained by the New York Times and printed in yesterday's editions, offers a stark assessment of Mr. al-Maliki.

"The reality on the streets of Baghdad suggests Mr. Maliki is either ignorant of what is going on, misrepresenting his intentions, or that his capabilities are not yet sufficient to turn his good intentions into action," Mr. Hadley wrote Nov. 8, after an Oct. 30 trip to Iraq to meet with Mr. al-Maliki.

That third explanation is the administration's chosen conclusion, said two senior administration officials briefing reporters in Latvia.

"This is an enormously complicated situation for which there is no cookbook answer," said one of the officials. "There is not summary judgment of Prime Minister Maliki, but instead there is a great deal of respect for the enormity and complexity of the challenge he faces."

Just how complex was underscored yesterday when Mr. al-Maliki lost part of his governing coalition.

Lawmakers and Cabinet ministers loyal to anti-U.S. cleric Muqtada al-Sadr suspended participation in parliament and the government to protest the meeting, according to wire service reports.

"This visit hijacked the will of the people during days when the sons of Iraq write their destiny with blood and not ink," the Associated Press quoted lawmakers and ministers saying in a statement which referred to Mr. Bush as a "criminal" and the "world's biggest evil."

Meanwhile, the recent upsurge in violence continued, with fighting between coalition troops and insurgents shutting down the city of Baqouba, about 35 miles northeast of Baghdad.

While Mr. al-Maliki faces fractured support in Iraq, Mr. Bush is facing his own political pressures at home.

The independent Iraq Study Group has announced it will release its recommendations for how to handle the U.S. commitment to Iraq on Monday, and key Democrats now in the majority in Congress are already raising the stakes for the report as a means to force Mr. Bush to change course.

Other top Democrats are calling on Mr. Bush to appoint a special envoy to Iraq to follow up on the specifics Mr. Bush and Mr. al-Maliki discuss today.

"They know what they have to accomplish," said Sen. Jack Reed, Rhode Island Democrat. "Somehow controlling the militias, somehow developing a more inclusive government, or a government at least who respects the minority rights of the Sunni community, somehow getting public services out to all of the people of Iraq, and it's got to be done with some type of time limits, a timetable."

On those points, he seemed to echo much of Mr. Hadley's classified memo.

The five-page memo lists nine items on which Mr. Hadley says Mr. al-Maliki should take action, including: bringing "his political strategy with Moktada al-Sadr to closure," diversify his Cabinet and his personal staff to include those who are not Shi'ite allies, expand the Iraqi army over the next nine months, and support renewal of the U.N. mandate for coalition forces to operate in Iraq.

Yesterday the senior administration officials said Mr. al-Maliki has taken steps on at least two of the nine items, including supporting this week's extension of the U.N. mandate for coalition forces.

They said the bulk of today's conversations will be about those action items but also said Mr. al-Maliki will have some things he wants the U.S. to work on as well.

"This is not the president dictating terms," one official said. "Prime Minister Maliki is the sovereign head of state. The president respects that."

Mr. Hadley in the memo said some steps the United States could take were to have Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice hold an "Iraq-plus-neighbors" meeting to try to end Syrian and Iranian meddling, and to step up efforts to get Saudi Arabia to cut off funding to insurgents and ask Sunni Muslims in Iraq to stop sectarian violence and join the political process.

Bush, Maliki Put Off Meeting (WP)

By Michael Abramowitz And Ann Scott Tyson

The Washington Post, November 30, 2006

AMMAN, Jordan, Nov. 29-- President Bush arrived here Wednesday evening for consultations with Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki on how to halt the deterioration of security in his country, but their scheduled opening meeting was canceled following political turmoil in Baghdad and disclosure of U.S. doubts about Maliki's capabilities.

Iraqi lawmakers and cabinet ministers allied with Shiite cleric and militia leader Moqtada al-Sadr, a bloc that was pivotal in bringing Maliki to power in May, launched a boycott Wednesday of their governmental duties to protest Maliki's decision to meet with Bush. At the same time, relations between the U.S. and Iraqi governments were complicated by the leak of a confidential White House memo suggesting the Bush administration was close to losing confidence in Maliki's ability to deliver results.

At the Pentagon, the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff said Wednesday that the U.S. military is bolstering its forces in Baghdad to deal with "unacceptable" levels of violence in Iraq.

Marine Gen. Peter Pace said that the senior U.S. commander in Iraq, Army Gen. George W. Casey Jr., is moving "a couple of battalions" to Baghdad from elsewhere in the country and is determining how many troops he can move to the capital without creating gaps in other parts of Iraq. A Pentagon official, speaking on condition of anonymity, said the battalions would replace units being rotated out of the country.

In addition, the official said, the Joint Chiefs are considering calling up 2,800 troops from four Army Reserve combat engineer battalions and sending them to Baghdad and other Iraqi cities in early January. Such a call-up could be politically sensitive, because three of the reserve battalions have already deployed, meaning some soldiers in the units could be involuntarily mobilized for a second time. Under Pentagon policy, that would require the approval of the defense secretary.

As late as Wednesday afternoon, it appeared that the White House was planning to go ahead with a three-way meeting that evening among Bush, Maliki and King Abdullah of Jordan. But when reporters showed up at the palace where the meeting was to take place, they were told by White House counselor Dan Bartlett that the session was off.

Officials later said Bush planned to meet with Maliki on Thursday morning and signaled that the focus of their talks would be on how to strengthen the capacity of the Iraqi government to quell sectarian violence.

White House officials said the cancellation had nothing to do with Maliki's political problems at home or the leak of a memo, written for Bush by national security adviser Stephen J. Hadley, that was published in Wednesday's New York Times.

Bartlett said Maliki had already had a productive meeting with Abdullah on Wednesday, and that Bush and Maliki both felt "there was not an agenda for the three for a trilateral that they felt was necessary."

"No one should read too much into this," Bartlett said.

White House press secretary Tony Snow said that "there's no snub" by Maliki.

Two senior administration officials, at a contentious background briefing with White House reporters who repeatedly challenged their explanation, said all the parties involved believed it would be more productive to have two separate meetings, one on Wednesday between Bush and Abdullah and one on Thursday between Bush and Maliki. They noted that Bush and the king had a variety of issues to discuss, including broader Middle East peace initiatives and the situation in Lebanon.

"You have one shot at dealing with the king," one senior official said.

Abdullah had made clear that he planned to use his own meeting with Bush to push for a renewed U.S. drive to address the Israeli-Palestinian dispute, which the king has described as the "core" issue in the region. White House aides said the king pressed Bush during a dinner meeting Wednesday to move faster to resolve the so-far intractable problem.

After the briefing, another senior official returned to the press center with more details about the cancellation, saying that the U.S. ambassador to Iraq, Zalmay Khalilzad, had received word in the afternoon from the Jordanians and the Iraqis that there was no need for a three-way meeting. Khalilzad called Air Force One, on its way to Amman from Latvia, with the news. This official said Bush concurred.

Administration officials insisted that the president maintains full confidence in Maliki, despite the bluntly worded Nov. 8 memo by Hadley raising pointed doubts about the prime minister's ability to curb sectarian violence.

"His intentions seem good when he talks with Americans, and sensitive reporting suggests he is trying to stand up to the Shia hierarchy and force positive change," Hadley wrote. "But the reality on the streets of Baghdad suggests Maliki is either ignorant of what is going on, misrepresenting his intentions, or that his capabilities are not yet sufficient to turn his good intentions into action."

Administration officials would not discuss the memo on the record, saying it remains classified despite its publication. One senior official said it was appropriate for Hadley, who visited Baghdad and met with Maliki several weeks ago, to raise "probing questions" about the government but said the memo did not constitute a "summary judgment" about the current Iraqi government.

Although the memo suggests several alternatives for the lack of progress by Maliki, the official said the White House has concluded that the main problem with Maliki is a "capability" issue. He said a focus of the Bush-Maliki sessions would be: "How do we increase his capability to turn his good intentions, as described in this memo, into concrete action?"

In Washington, a bipartisan panel that has spent eight months reviewing U.S. policy toward Iraq wrapped up its deliberations Wednesday and announced it will roll out its report and recommendations to President Bush and Congress on Dec. 6.

The Iraq Study Group's report, which is close to 100 pages, will offer a comprehensive look at regional political and security issues as well as the troubled U.S. deployment in Iraq, according to sources close to the panel.

"We reached a consensus, which in itself is remarkable," said one source.

But one Democratic senator questioned whether the commission would produce recommendations that would fix the Iraq situation. "The question, I think, is how much detail and specific guidance they can give and still reach a consensus," said Sen. Jack Reed (D-R.I.).

Reed called for the president to immediately appoint a special envoy to try to bring Iraqi factions to some form of reconciliation.

"I don't think we have a great deal of time," Reed said, urging Bush not to wait for the Iraq Study Group's recommendations. "I think there's still an opportunity, but that opportunity is rapidly closing on us."

At the Pentagon, an official speaking on condition of anonymity said the U.S. battalions to be shifted to Baghdad from elsewhere in Iraq would include about 1,600 soldiers from an Army brigade equipped with advanced Stryker armored vehicles. The unit, now in the northern city of Mosul, would replace departing troops from the Alaska-based 172nd Stryker Brigade.

Pace, the Joint Chiefs chairman, acknowledged that the U.S. military fell short last summer when it attempted to quell spiraling sectarian fighting in Baghdad with a significant increase in U.S. and Iraqi forces. Instead, fighting in the capital between Shiite and Sunni Muslims has soared to new extremes.

"The amount of violence in Baghdad . . . right now is not where we want to be," Pace said. "The impact of those increases has not been what we wanted it to be." Pace, however, said Iraq is not in a state of civil war because its government and security forces are "functioning."

He emphasized that Casey and Iraqi leaders have identified more Iraqi units to move to Baghdad from elsewhere in the country. But he acknowledged that this process is hampered by the sectarian and parochial nature of many Iraqi military units.

"There are some units around Iraq that, if moved to Baghdad, would not be helpful," Pace said. "If a Sunni unit somewhere else in Iraq moved into a Shia neighborhood, or a Shia unit . . . moved into a Sunni neighborhood," he said, that "is not going to help the problem." Moreover, commanders want to avoid creating a regional security vacuum by moving Iraqi troops to Baghdad, he said.

Pace denied that there are any immediate plans to pull U.S. troops wholesale out of the volatile western province of Anbar and send them to Baghdad, leaving the province -- U.S. commanders call it a Sunni insurgent stronghold -- in the hands of Iraqi forces. "Why would we want to forfeit any part of Iraq to the enemy? We don't," he said. But he said the goal "eventually" was to transfer security responsibilities in all provinces to Iraqi forces.

Pace said he is considering further U.S. troop increases in Iraq among a range of options as he reviews military strategy there, but he acknowledged the stress that would inflict on American ground forces. "If you determine to surge more today, you are taking it out of your rotation base and, therefore, using it today and not having it available for tomorrow," he said. "It's pure math."

Gen. John P. Abizaid, the top U.S. commander in the Middle East, said in congressional testimony this month that the Army and Marine Corps could rapidly shift 20,000 more troops into Iraq, but could not sustain that increase given their current size.

Pace said he and the Joint Chiefs routinely question whether the Army and Marines are large and resilient enough to handle their current missions, but indicated he had not yet recommended increasing the size of those forces.

Experts Question Proposals In Leaked Iraq Memo (MCT)

By Jonathan S. Landay And Nancy A. Youssef

McClatchy Newspapers, November 30, 2006

WASHINGTON - It would be extremely difficult, if not impossible, to implement most of the key ideas for quelling the Iraqi civil war that are outlined in a classified Nov. 8 memo to President Bush from National Security Adviser Stephen Hadley, experts said Wednesday.

Trying to push anti-U.S. Shiite Muslim cleric Muqtada al-Sadr out of the ruling coalition led by Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, as the memo suggests, would be throwing gasoline on a fire, they said.

Sadr's party is the largest in parliament, with 32 seats, and Maliki became prime minister only with his support. Sadr's Mahdi Army militia controls large parts of Baghdad and southern Iraq, and many Iraqi Shiites hail him as their only protection from attacks by rival Sunni Muslims, which American and Iraqi forces have failed to stop.

"Sadr is aware of the considerable extent to which his forces ... constitute a significant part of the power in the streets, and there is no reason why he would simply want to surrender that leverage," said Paul Pillar, the former top U.S. intelligence analyst on the Middle East.

In what appeared to be a warning from Sadr to Maliki, Sadr followers suspended their participation in the government and parliament to protest Maliki's plan to meet Bush on Wednesday in Jordan. Within an hour of the statement, Jordanian officials announced that the meeting had been postponed.

Hadley's memo was leaked to The New York Times on the eve of the Bush-Maliki talks. He wrote the five-page classified document after meeting with Maliki on Oct. 30 in Baghdad.

Since then, the violence in Iraq has surged to its worst level since the 2003 U.S.-led invasion. It's been especially fierce in the capital since bombings last Thursday killed more than 200 people in Sadr City, a Shiite slum in Baghdad that the Mahdi Army controls.

In the memo, Hadley expressed doubts about Maliki's ability or willingness to go beyond the Shiite sectarian agenda and forge a unity government.

Hadley recommended steps that Maliki could take to curb the violence and measures that the United States could implement to strengthen him, including sending more forces into Baghdad.

Hadley's central suggestion was to bring Maliki's political reliance on Sadr "to closure" and pursue Mahdi Army members who "do not eschew violence."

Trying to force Sadr out of the government - in which his followers control some of the key ministries - and crack down on his militia almost certainly would lead to the government's collapse.

It also would ignite a wave of violence by his militia and supporters in Baghdad and the Shiite-dominated south, much of it probably aimed at the U.S.-led multinational force.

"Sadr is not going to rein in the Mahdi Army," said Vali Nasr of the Naval Postgraduate School, in Monterey, Calif., and the author of a new book on modern political Shiism.

Hadley suggested that Maliki overhaul his Cabinet by replacing key members of Shiite and Sunni religious parties with "nonsectarian, capable technocrats."

But the Iraqi Constitution requires that new ministers be approved by two-thirds of parliament, a vote that Sadr could block. A Cabinet shakeup also would unravel the power-sharing deal on controlling the ministries that took the religious parties months to negotiate.

"The ministries are run like fiefdoms," Nasr said. "Most ministers don't even come to Cabinet meetings."

Experts also were skeptical of a Hadley proposal that the United States provide "monetary support" for forming a new coalition of moderate Shiite, Sunni and ethnic Kurdish parliamentarians to keep Maliki in power if he's unable to cut loose from Sadr.

Several experts wondered what moderates Hadley was referring to.

Moreover, such an alliance would require Maliki to forge stronger bonds with Sadr's chief rival, Abdul-Aziz al-Hakim. He's the head of another Shiite party that belongs to the ruling coalition and whose militia maintains even closer ties to the Islamic regime of neighboring Iran than the Mahdi Army does.

Finding Sunnis to join such a grouping would be impossible, because Hakim has been a leading proponent of purging members of deposed dictator Saddam Hussein's Baath Party from the bureaucracy and the military, Nasr said.

Hakim met with Jordan's King Abdullah hours before Bush arrived in Amman, and was scheduled to travel to Washington, where he was expected to visit the White House.

Maliki already has tried unsuccessfully to implement some of Hadley's ideas, several experts noted. These include attempts to purge the police and Interior Ministry of sectarian death squads and to disarm militias.

Phebe Marr, a leading U.S. expert on Iraq, said that some of the more modest ideas that Hadley proposed in the memo - such as appointing technocrats to the government and cleaning up the Interior Ministry - were achievable.

"I think these small steps can be done. I think Maliki is doing them. But we have very different perceptions of time and timetable," Marr said, referring to growing political pressure in the United States to withdraw troops.

As for a "spectacular breakthrough" from the Iraqi government in the near future, "forget it," she said.

Youssef reported from Amman, Jordan. Warren P. Strobel in Washington contributed to this report.

In public, top Bush administration officials have taken a very different view of Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki than the one expressed in a classified National Security Council memo:

Sept. 30. Army Gen. George W. Casey in Baghdad: Maliki is "a determined, courageous leader taking on some very difficult issues. ... He has an awful lot of challenges facing him, and I do believe he is very much up to the task."

Oct. 5. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice in Baghdad: "I do think he has the strength. I think he's a very good and strong prime minister."

Oct. 24. Marine Gen. Pete Pace, the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff: "I do know that Prime Minister Maliki is working very hard right now in his five-month-old government - he's working very hard to try to find those political agreements that would reconcile the needs of Sunni, Shia and Kurds so he can get on about being the unifying leader that he's trying to be."

Oct. 25. President Bush: "I do believe Prime Minister Maliki is the right man to achieve the goal in Iraq."

Nov. 8. Memo prepared by National Security Adviser Stephen J. Hadley and his aides after a visit to Baghdad: "Do we and Prime Minister Maliki share the same vision for Iraq? If so, is he able to curb those who seek Shia hegemony or the reassertion of Sunni power?

"... Despite Maliki's reassuring words, repeated reports from our commanders on the ground contributed to our concerns about Maliki's government. Reports of nondelivery of services to Sunni areas, intervention by the prime minister's office to stop military action against Shia targets and to encourage them against Sunni ones, removal of Iraq's most effective commanders on a sectarian basis and efforts to ensure Shia majorities in all ministries - when combined with the escalation of Jaish al-Mahdi's (JAM) (the Mahdi Army militia of militant Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr) killings - all suggest a campaign to consolidate Shia power in Baghdad.

"... His intentions seem good when he talks with Americans, and sensitive reporting suggests he is trying to stand up to the Shia hierarchy and force positive change. But the reality on the streets of Baghdad suggests Maliki is either ignorant of what is going on, misrepresenting his intentions, or that his capabilities are not yet sufficient to turn his good intentions into action."

Nov. 28. Rice in Riga, Latvia: "I think that if you meet these leaders of the central government, you recognize the challenges that they have, you will be quite impressed with what they have achieved and continue to achieve."

Three 'More' Options For Bush And Maliki (CSM)

By Dan Murphy

The Christian Science Monitor, November 30, 2006

CAIRO

Even before President Bush was scheduled to meet Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki in Jordan to talk about how to stop the spiraling violence in Iraq, the administration had already made clear many of the options.

As outlined in a Nov. 8 memo from national security adviser Stephen Hadley and provided to The New York Times, as well as in discussions among key advisers to the president, the ideas from the US can be boiled down to "three mores": More troops, more money, more regional diplomacy.

The first more is what some advisers to the Iraq Study Group, led by former Secretary of State James Baker, are calling the "surge" option, essentially pouring thousands more American troops into the country in the hope that boots on the ground will translate into law and order. Baghdad, the religiously mixed capi- tal where death squads now roam, would be the principal beneficiary.

In his memo, Mr. Hadley refers to a "four brigade gap" in combat power in Baghdad, implying that US officials believe the city needs roughly 13,000 additional soldiers. While he says he hopes that local troops will be mustered to do the job, he writes that "we might also need to fill the [gap] ... with coalition forces if reliable Iraqi forces are not identified."

While that would be politically unpopular at home, with anger over the extended war in Iraq leading to the major Republican reverses in national elections this month, Bush could use his meeting with Maliki as a springboard to make this case, since Maliki himself has said he would welcome more troops and resources to pacify the country.

But Maliki, from the Shiite Islamist's Dawa Party, has also frequently complained that he has insufficient direct control of troops on the ground, arguing that it's unfair to expect him to deliver results when the US calls the shots on troop deployments.

He's expected to press Bush for more control during the summit in Amman. That's something the Hadley memo recommends - but contingent on Maliki first meeting US conditions, such as cutting off his close relations with Shiite cleric Moqtada al-Sadr, purging divisive Shiite leaders from his cabinet, and suspending the de-Baathification program designed to purge former loyalists of Saddam Hussein from the government.

While it's unclear if meeting these demands is within Maliki's power, Hadley's memo also provides reason for the US to worry about giving the prime minister more control over the Iraqi military.

It cites "repeated reports" from US generals on the ground of a failure to provide government services in Sunni Arab areas and "intervention by the prime minister's office to stop military action against Shia targets and to encourage them against Sunni ones."

That sort of behavior has fed Iraq's worsening civil war, creating the impression among Sunnis, who were a privileged class under Saddam Hussein, that they have little future in the new Iraq.

Mr. Sadr's Mahdi Army has been blamed by the US and Sunni Arab politicians for a string of sectarian atrocities in and around Baghdad, while aides to Sadr counter that the force is largely defensive and is needed because of the Iraqi government and US failure to stop terrorist attacks on Shiites.

Sadr and his supporters are fervently anti-American and have been angry at recent US offensives to curtail his militia's power. Wednesday, 30 legislators and six cabinet members loyal to Sadr said they were temporarily boycotting the government to protest the meeting between Maliki and Bush. In a statement, they described Bush as "the world's greatest evil."

Hadley's memo also says the US can help Maliki by encouraging Saudi Arabia to encourage Sunni insurgents to give up violence, and to "lean on Syria to terminate its support for Baathists and insurgent leaders." Syria has denied it is playing any role in the fighting.

Then there is the question of money. US reconstruction spending in Iraq has largely run out, and some advisers to the Iraq Study Group, as well as outside analysts like Anthony Cordesman at the Center for Strategic and International Studies in Washington, are urging that the US unveil a large aid package to act as a carrot to get Iraqi leaders of waring factions to sit at the negotiating table.

While Hadley's memo refers to providing Maliki with more money, it doesn't refer to an aid program. Instead, he appears to be advocating using US resources to try to split Maliki and other leaders described as moderate away from their Shiite power base.

The memo argues that if Maliki proves unable to take the steps the US asks of him, then the US would use money and its prestige to try to cobble together a nonsectarian parliamentary bloc that would effectively divorce Maliki from his own Dawa Party, which has close ties to Iran, and the other Islamist Shiite parties in the government.

But Malaki is not likely to abandon his Shiite political powerbase, including Sadr, says Chris Toensing, executive director of the Middle East Research and Information Project in Washington. "It's a calculus about his own protection, and for a future when the US eventually leaves," he says. Leaked memo: US suggestions for Iraq's leader

Excerpts from a memo by national security adviser Stephen Hadley that was leaked to The New York Times:

"Steps Maliki Could Take ... There is a range of actions that [Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki] could take to improve the information he receives, demonstrate his intentions to build an Iraq for all Iraqis ...

"Compel his ministers to take small steps - such as providing health services and opening bank branches in Sunni neighborhoods - to demonstrate that his government serves all ethnic communities ... Bring his political strategy with Moktada al-Sadr to closure ... Announce plans to expand the Iraqi Army over the next nine months ... Declare the immediate suspension of suspect Iraqi police units ...

"What We Can Do to Help Maliki ... Continue to target Al Qaeda and insurgent strongholds in Baghdad to demonstrate the Shia do not need the [Mahdi Army] to protect their families ... Continue our diplomatic efforts to keep the Sunnis in the political process ... Seek ways to strengthen Maliki immediately by giving him additional control over Iraqi forces ...

"The above approach may prove difficult to execute even if Maliki has the right intentions. He may simply not have the political or security capabilities ... Pushing Maliki to take these steps without augmenting his capabilities could force him to failure ..."

Iraq Panel To Recommend Pullback Of Combat Troops (NYT)

By David E. Sanger And David S. Cloud

DOJ_NMG_0100041

WASHINGTON, Nov. 29 — The bipartisan Iraq Study Group reached a consensus on Wednesday on a final report that will call for a gradual pullback of the 15 American combat brigades now in Iraq but stop short of setting a firm timetable for their withdrawal, according to people familiar with the panel's deliberations.

The report, unanimously approved by the 10-member panel, led by James A. Baker III and Lee H. Hamilton, is to be delivered to President Bush next week. It is a compromise between distinct paths that the group has debated since March, avoiding a specific timetable, which has been opposed by Mr. Bush, but making it clear that the American troop commitment should not be open-ended. The recommendations of the group, formed at the request of members of Congress, are nonbinding.

A person who participated in the commission's debate said that unless the government of Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki believed that Mr. Bush was under pressure to pull back troops in the near future, "there will be zero sense of urgency to reach the political settlement that needs to be reached."

The report recommends that Mr. Bush make it clear that he intends to start the withdrawal relatively soon, and people familiar with the debate over the final language said the implicit message was that the process should begin sometime next year.

The report leaves unstated whether the 15 combat brigades that are the bulk of American fighting forces in Iraq would be brought home, or simply pulled back to bases in Iraq or in neighboring countries. (A brigade typically consists of 3,000 to 5,000 troops.) From those bases, they would still be responsible for protecting a substantial number of American troops who would remain in Iraq, including 70,000 or more American trainers, logistics experts and members of a rapid reaction force.

As the commission wound up two and a half days of deliberation in Washington, the group said in a public statement only that a consensus had been reached and that the report would be delivered next Wednesday to President Bush, Congress and the American public. Members of the commission were warned by Mr. Baker and Mr. Hamilton not to discuss the contents of the report.

But four people involved in the debate, representing different points of view, agreed to outline its conclusions in broad terms to address what they said might otherwise be misperceptions about the findings. Some said their major concern was that the report might be too late.

"I think we've played a constructive role," one person involved in the committee's deliberations said, "but from the beginning, we've worried that this entire agenda could be swept away by events."

Even as word of the study group's conclusions began to leak out, Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, said two or three battalions of American troops were being sent to Baghdad from elsewhere in Iraq to assist in shoring up security there. Another Pentagon official said the additional troops for Baghdad would be drawn from a brigade in Mosul equipped with fast-moving, armored Stryker vehicles.

As described by the people involved in the deliberations, the bulk of the report by the Baker-Hamilton group focused on a recommendation that the United States devise a far more aggressive diplomatic initiative in the Middle East than Mr. Bush has been willing to try so far, including direct engagement with Iran and Syria. Initially, those contacts might be part of a regional conference on Iraq or broader Middle East peace issues, like the Israeli-Palestinian situation, but they would ultimately involve direct, high-level talks with Tehran and Damascus.

Mr. Bush has rejected such contacts until now, and he has also rejected withdrawal, declaring in Riga, Latvia, on Tuesday that while he will show flexibility, "there's one thing I'm not going to do: I'm not going to pull the troops off the battlefield before the mission is complete."

Commission members have said in recent days that they had to navigate around such declarations, or, as one said, "We had to move the national debate from whether to stay the course to how do we start down the path out."

Their report, as described by those familiar with the compromise, may give Republicans political cover to back away from parts of the president's current strategy, even if Democrats claim that the report is short on specific deadlines.

While the White House reviews its strategy options, Pentagon planners are also looking beyond the immediate reinforcements for Baghdad to the question of whether they will need to draw more on reserve units to meet troop requirements in the Iraqi capital, military officials said. In particular, the Army is considering sending about 3,000 combat engineers from reserve units.

The proposal would not increase the overall number of troops in Baghdad, but it is controversial because it would require sending units that had already been deployed to Iraq in recent years, a step National Guard officials have been trying to avoid.

The move has not been approved by the Bush administration, but the decision could be made in the coming weeks, and the first of the additional troops may begin arriving in Iraq by next spring, officials said.

American military officials said that the forces in Iraq that were being shifted to Baghdad were to take the place of the 172nd Stryker Brigade, which is returning to its base in Alaska, and that there would be no increase in American forces in the Iraqi capital. In fact, one officer said there might be a brief decrease until the adjustments were completed.

As the Iraq Study Group finished its meetings in Washington, it heard final testimony from Senator John Kerry of Massachusetts, a Democrat who has urged a specific timeline for withdrawal, and Senator John McCain of Arizona, who has called for a significant bolstering of troops to gain control of the Iraqi capital. Two former secretaries of state, Henry A. Kissinger and George P. Shultz, also spoke to the group as it debated its final conclusions.

Although the diplomatic strategy takes up the majority of the report, it was the military recommendations that prompted the most debate, people familiar with the deliberations said. They said a draft report put together under the direction of Mr. Baker and Mr. Hamilton had collided with another, circulated by other Democrats on the commission, that included an explicit timeline calling for withdrawal of the combat brigades to be completed by the end of next year. In the end, the two proposals were blended.

If Mr. Bush adopts the recommendations, far more American training teams will be embedded with Iraqi forces, a last-ditch effort to make the Iraqi Army more capable of fighting alone. That is a step already embraced in a memorandum that Stephen J. Hadley, the national security adviser, wrote to the president this month.

"I think everyone felt good about where we ended up," one person involved in the commission's debates said after the group ended its meeting. "It is neither 'cut and run' nor 'stay the course.' "

"Those who favor immediate withdrawal will not like it," he said, but it also "deviates significantly from the president's strategy."

The report also would offer military commanders — and therefore the president — great flexibility to determine the timing and phasing of the pullback of the combat brigades.

Throughout the debates, Mr. Baker, who served as secretary of state under Mr. Bush's father and was the central figure in developing the strategy to win the 2000 Florida recount for Mr. Bush, was highly reluctant to allow a timetable for withdrawal to be included in the report, participants said.

Mr. Baker cited what Mr. Bush had also called a danger: that any firm deadline would be an invitation to insurgents and sectarian groups to bide their time until the last American troops were withdrawn, then seek to overthrow the government. But Democrats on the commission also suspected that Mr. Baker was reluctant to embarrass the president by embracing a strategy Mr. Bush had repeatedly rejected.

Committee members struggled with ways, short of a deadline, to signal to the Iraqis that Washington would not prop up the government with military forces endlessly, and that if sectarian warfare continued the pressure to withdraw American forces would become overwhelming. What they ended up with appears to be a classic Washington compromise: a report that sets no explicit timetable but, between the lines, appears to have one built in.

As one senior American military officer involved in Iraq strategy said, "The question is whether it doesn't look like a timeline to Bush, and does to Maliki."

In addition to Mr. Hamilton, a former Democratic congressman, the group includes two Democrats who are veterans of the Clinton administration, Leon E. Panetta and William J. Perry, and a Clinton adviser, Vernon E. Jordan Jr. Charles S. Robb, former Democratic governor of Virginia, and Alan K. Simpson, a former Republican senator from Wyoming, are also on the panel, along with Sandra Day O'Connor, a former Supreme Court justice who was nominated by President Reagan.

Other members includes Edwin Meese III, who served as attorney general under Mr. Reagan, and Lawrence S. Eagleburger, a former secretary of state under Mr. Bush's father. Mr. Eagleburger replaced Robert M. Gates, who resigned when he was nominated to be the next secretary of defense.

If confirmed he will have to carry out whatever change of military strategy, if any, Mr. Bush embraces.

Joint Chiefs Oppose Iraq Pullout (WT)

By Rowan Scarborough

The Washington Times, November 30, 2006

All six members of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, amid an ongoing Pentagon review of strategy for Iraq, oppose pulling out U.S. troops now, and are also against a specific withdrawal timetable, a defense source said yesterday.

"The chiefs are solid. They want victory," the source said. "There is no dissent."

The Joint Chiefs -- which includes Gen. Peter Pace, the chairman, along with a vice chairman and the heads of the Air Force, Army, Marine Corps and Navy -- have been meeting several times a week to review a list of Iraq options for President Bush.

The Pentagon has said all options are open for consideration during the far-reaching review. But on the question of withdrawal, the issue is settled in favor of Mr. Bush's position, the source said.

"We are looking at the whole spectrum of possible military actions," Gen. Pace said yesterday. "I'm not going to say to you where I am personally, nor where the chiefs are, because our responsibility is to give our best military advice."

A Pentagon spokesman said he had no information on the chiefs' positions.

At a press conference, Gen. Pace endorsed the idea of shifting more Iraqi forces into violence-wracked Baghdad, where Shi'ite and Sunni terrorists are on a killing spree to gain control of the capital. A number of lawmakers, including Rep. Duncan Hunter, California Republican and House Armed Services Committee chairman, advocate sending more Iraqi battalions to the capital.

"I think that idea has a good amount of appeal for multiple reasons," Gen. Pace said. "Because Baghdad is extremely important to the Iraqi government, and their armed forces and their security forces are the proper long-term solution to that problem."

Gen. Pace said that putting into practice a Baghdad redeployment depends on whether Army Gen. George Casey, the top U.S. commander in Iraq, and Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki think they have sufficient personnel from a total force of more than 300,000.

"The question is, when they move them from where they are, what condition does that create from where they moved them," he said.

The Iraq Study Group, a bipartisan commission of former officeholders, completed work yesterday on its final report to Mr. Bush. The report will be released Wednesday, the day after Senate confirmation hearings begin for Defense Secretary-designate Robert M. Gates.

Mr. Bush is not likely to warmly embrace the study group's centerpiece proposal -- direct diplomatic engagement with U.S. adversaries Syria and Iran, which are fueling the various insurgency groups in Iraq that are killing U.S. troops and Iraqi civilians by the thousands.

Defense sources said the group, led by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III and former Rep. Lee Hamilton, decided not to call for a specific timetable to bring home troops because such an idea lacked unanimous support on the panel.

Gen. Pace told reporters that Gen. Casey has started, after a buildup in August, to put yet more U.S. troops into Baghdad.

"The impact of those [August] increases has not been what we wanted it to be," he said.

Defense officials say Gen. Casey is moving a Stryker armored-vehicle brigade from northern Iraq into Baghdad. An incoming brigade will eventually replace it in Mosul.

Gen. Pace said the Joint Chiefs review has been augmented by senior officers who have recently served in Iraq. They have compiled a list of ideas and personally discussed them with the chiefs in the "tank," the group's secure meeting place.

"We're doing our job, which is to meet multiple times a week and to talk through individual pieces of the global military environment," he said.

December is shaping up as a time of major decision-making by Mr. Bush. He will receive the study group report, more input from Gen. Pace and ideas from the National Security Council staff.

He has resisted direct talks with Syria and Iran, two U.S.-designated terrorism sponsors whom the administration thinks are using unrest in Iraq to spread violence in Lebanon and the Palestinian territories. Mr. Bush has also ruled out a direct timetable for troop pullouts. He says reductions should be based on achieving peace and on the Iraqis' ability to take control of security in more of the country's 18 provinces.

Three Options For Iraq War, But Dangers, Risks Abound (USAT)

By Susan Page And Barbara Slavin

USA Today, November 30, 2006

WASHINGTON — There is no shortage of reviews in the works on U.S. policy in Iraq — from the Pentagon to the White House to an independent commission led by former secretary of State James Baker — and each faces the same dilemma: All the options carry downsides and dangers.

Withdraw U.S. troops quickly and court chaos, the White House warns. Send more troops to secure Baghdad and strain a U.S. military that's already stretched thin, the Pentagon says. Appeal to Iran for help and hear demands that Washington in turn ease its objections to Tehran's nuclear program, diplomats predict. Divide Iraq into autonomous regions and give al-Qaeda terrorists a safe haven in Sunni territory, the administration says.

The war has become a Rubik's Cube: Move to fix one side of the puzzle and another side is upended.

As Baker's Iraq Study Group prepares to release its recommendations next Wednesday, pressure is mounting at the White House and on Capitol Hill to find new approaches and even reconsider those that have been rejected before.

A majority of voters surveyed as they left polling places in this month's elections want some or all U.S. troops withdrawn now. Democrats, who take over Congress in January, are about to have responsibility to do more than criticize.

The task ahead is defined not only by military, diplomatic and political quandaries in Iraq but also by brewing civil wars in Lebanon and the Palestinian territories, says a key ally, King Abdullah II of Jordan. And the United States' ability to control events — to hold Iraq together, avoid a full-scale bloodbath and shape developments in the region — has diminished.

"U.S. influence in the Middle East is ebbing, largely as a result of the consequences of our decision to invade Iraq," says Richard Haass, who served as a foreign-policy adviser to President Bush and his father. "The U.S. will still have influence but will have to share it as never before with a motley crew of local forces ranging from Iran to Hamas and Hezbollah."

The Baker commission could provide bipartisan cover to take difficult steps, says Sen. Joseph Biden, D-Del., incoming chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee. "I think the president will have to listen," he says.

"We'll see their report and their ideas in due course and take a good, solid look at them," says Sean McCormack of the State Department.

The five Democrats and five Republicans on the commission finished their meetings on Wednesday. "We reached a consensus," Co-chairman Lee Hamilton told the liberal Center for American Progress late in the day.

Two top advisers to the panel, speaking on condition of anonymity because they aren't authorized to discuss its deliberations, say the group ruled out three strategies: Partition Iraq. Withdraw immediately. And stay the course.

The New York Times reported in its online edition Wednesday that the study group's final report will call for a gradual pullback of the 15 American combat brigades now in Iraq but stop short of setting a firm timetable for their withdrawal. The Times said the report will also recommend the United States use diplomacy with Iran and Syria to help stop violence in Iraq.

The Times based its reporting on members of the group who spoke on condition of anonymity. USA TODAY was not able to independently confirm the details of the report.

If there were a ready solution to Iraq's travails, policymakers presumably would have chosen it already. Instead, they are left with balancing tough trade-offs — and a sense that time is running out.

"The level of sectarian violence is 10 to 12 times higher than it was in January, and there is no sign that it is being reduced," says Anthony Cordesman of the Center for Strategic and International Studies. "Whatever the options are chosen, we have to have a degree of realism and self-honesty that we have lacked. … We need to understand that whatever we do will involve high risk and high cost."

Increasing fragmentation in Iraq and declining support for the war in the USA have eliminated ideas that might have worked a year or two ago, says former U.S. diplomat David Mack, a consultant to Baker's group. Gen. John Abizaid, commander of U.S. forces in the Middle East, told a Senate panel two weeks ago that there were four to six months left to get control of the violence in Iraq.

Zalmay Khalilzad, the U.S. ambassador to Iraq, offered a different timetable in an interview with USA TODAY on May 31. He said the Iraqi government had three to six months to turn around the situation — a period that expires today.

While the Baker commission recommendations, the Pentagon review and the National Security Council report all are being drafted in private, there's no secret about the options available as the United States faces its worst military crisis since the Vietnam War:

Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., has proposed deploying 20,000 troops to Iraq in addition to the 140,000 already there — a step he estimates would require expanding the Army and Marine Corps by 100,000. William Kristol, an influential neoconservative, says 50,000 more troops should be dispatched to secure Baghdad without shifting U.S. forces from other parts of Iraq.

Abizaid suggests there might be a temporary increase in troop levels to bolster training of Iraqi units.

However, the Army and Marines can't sustain higher force levels for long, Abizaid says. Other than troops in South Korea, nearly every Army unit is either deployed in Iraq and Afghanistan, recovering from a deployment or preparing for one.

What's more, Abizaid says, sending more U.S. troops might reduce the pressure on Iraqis to take over their own security.

And withdrawing troops?

Sen. Carl Levin, D-Mich., the incoming chairman of the Armed Services Committee, says a phased withdrawal of U.S. troops should begin in four to six months, an approach embraced by many other Democrats. Some anti-war Democrats want faster action. Rep. John Murtha, D-Pa., says U.S. troops should be redeployed as soon as they can safely move out of Iraq.

The administration says setting a timetable or pulling out troops would embolden insurgents, increase sectarian violence and create a vacuum that Iran and Syria could exploit. "There's one thing I'm not going to do," Bush said Tuesday during a visit to Latvia. "I'm not going to pull our troops off the battlefield before the mission is complete."

Bush said he would ask Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki at their meeting today in Jordan to detail what stronger action he'll take to unify the government and tackle the sectarian militias blamed for the spreading violence.

The White House wants al-Maliki to offer political concessions to Sunnis and give amnesty to insurgents who are willing to lay down their arms. David Satterfield, the State Department's Iraq coordinator, told the Senate this month that the Shiite-dominated Iraqi government also should pass a law distributing oil earnings fairly, including to Sunnis.

The American axiom that all politics is local applies in Baghdad, too. Al-Maliki won the prime minister's job last spring by one vote because of support from Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr. Phebe Marr, an Iraq historian and adviser to the Iraq Study Group, asks how al-Maliki could go after al-Sadr's Mahdi Army without losing his own job.

"It's so fractured," Marr says. "The thought that there's a person who can come and give an order and have it obeyed is a great mistake." She cautions that pushing al-Maliki aside could empower competing Shiite factions that are more closely aligned with Iran.

Al-Maliki has made little progress on two critical fronts: preparing Iraqi forces to take over security operations and disbanding the Shiite militias. He's blocked U.S. efforts to arrest top members of the Mahdi Army. A joint U.S.-Iraqi operation to stabilize Baghdad, announced with fanfare when he met with Bush at the White House in July, has been a dramatic failure.

Bush's national security adviser, Stephen Hadley, wrote a classified memo this month, reported Wednesday by The New York Times, that questioned al-Maliki's intentions and ability to counter sectarian violence.

If he doesn't, U.S. troops might have to take military action against the militias in Sadr City, a sprawling Baghdad slum named for the cleric's father and home to 2 million Shiites. That step, Marr and other analysts warn, could topple the al-Maliki government and enrage Shiites across the region.

Bush administration officials are urging U.S. allies in the Arab world to help tamp the turmoil in Iraq. Vice President Cheney met last week with King Abdullah of Saudi Arabia and Bush met Wednesday with King Abdullah II of Jordan. Both could use their ties with Sunni tribal groups to encourage Sunni cooperation with al-Maliki, strengthening his political standing.

However, they have little influence with the Shiite majority or Sunni insurgents in Iraq, and the Bush administration has refused to meet with two neighbors that do. The administration has had no serious talks with Iran since 2003 and no high-level meetings with Syria since early 2005.

Baker says that policy should be reversed. "You can't fulfill the mission without talking to the neighboring countries," he said in an interview with USA TODAY in September. He has talked to Syrian Foreign Minister Walid al-Moallem and Iran's United Nations ambassador, Mohammad Javad Zarif. His commission has met twice with Syria's ambassador to the United States, Imad Mustapha.

Some experts doubt either nation could do much. Judith Yaphe, a Middle East expert at the National Defense University in Washington, D.C., says Sunni fighters are no longer dependent on Syria for financial help because they've become self-sufficient through smuggling and other criminal activities.

What's more, both countries presumably would demand something in return. "We believe we can play a constructive role," Mustapha, the Syrian ambassador, said in an interview. However, he said, "The U.S. has to respect Syrian interests in the region we live in."

Syria would like to limit a U.N. probe into the 2004 murder of former Lebanese prime minister Rafiq Hariri that may implicate senior Syrian officials.

For its part, Iran wants to end a quarter-century of U.S. economic sanctions and to win recognition of its rising role in the region. Chas Freeman, another adviser to the Iraq Study Group and a former U.S. ambassador to Saudi Arabia, predicts the Bush administration wouldn't be able to enlist Iranian support on Iraq without agreeing to broader negotiations.

Bush on Tuesday took a hard line, reiterating that talks with Iran were off-limits until it suspends its uranium enrichment program. In any case, Yaphe says, Iran probably wouldn't be willing to curtail its support for the Shiite militias.

"Talking with Iran and Syria over the fate of Iraq is not guaranteed to get the U.S. government the results it wants," she says.

There also are no guarantees that Bush will choose to change course, though his decision this month to replace Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld, an architect of the war, seems to open the door. Robert Gates, the former CIA director nominated to replace Rumsfeld, had been a member of the Iraq Study Group.

In a statement submitted to Congress this week in advance of his confirmation hearings, Gates endorsed diplomatic engagement with Syria and Iran.

Baker's group will publish its report next Wednesday, according to the U.S. Institute of Peace, the taxpayer-funded think tank that organized the study. The recommendations will be sent first to the White House and Congress.

Biden says he then plans "extensive hearings" exploring the range of proposals on Iraq.

Meanwhile, in Iraq, some politicians have begun hedging their bets in anticipation of a reduction in U.S. troops and influence.

Last week, al-Maliki welcomed Syria's foreign minister to Baghdad, restoring diplomatic ties between the two countries after a breach of nearly a quarter-century.

And on Monday, Iraqi President Jalal Talabani went to Iran, long Iraq's arch foe, and met with Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad. Talabani urged him to help "restore stability and security" in Iraq.

One War, No Answers (WP)

By Dana Milbank

Does anybody have a good plan for Iraq?

Not President Bush. He arrived in Jordan yesterday for a crucial meeting with Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, only for the White House to discover that the Iraqi was a no-show. "It was going to be more of a social meeting anyways," Bush aide Dan Bartlett told reporters at the Raghadan Palace in Amman.

Neither does the Pentagon appear to have a solution. Gen. Pete Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, called a news conference yesterday to advise the American public not to expect big conclusions from a major Iraq study he ordered. "There's not an end product," he announced.

Nor, apparently, do the Democrats have the answer. Sen. Jack Reed (R.I.), a Democratic point man on Iraq, called his own press briefing in the Capitol yesterday to call for (drum roll, please) "a high-ranking special envoy to work with the Iraqi government."

And what of the congressionally appointed Iraq Study Group? After nearly nine months of studying, the commission will finally give some recommendations next week. Its deliberations are so relaxed that its co-chairmen, James Baker and Lee Hamilton, found time on Monday to pose for an Annie Leibovitz photo shoot for Men's Vogue. (The current issue has features on "the new Bond temptress," the "Alpha Suit" and "power" wristwatches.)

Political Washington is in a state of suspended animation these days: waiting for Bob Gates to replace Donald Rumsfeld as secretary of defense, waiting for the Baker-Hamilton commission, waiting to see whether Bush will raise or lower troop levels. But with good ideas in short supply, and hopes falling that the Men's Vogue Study Group will produce a magic solution, leaders of both parties seem unable to do much more than heap blame on Maliki and argue about whether or not to call the Iraq carnage a civil war.

Yesterday's installment began when Reed, a former Army Ranger from the 82nd Airborne, hopped onto the stage in the Senate press gallery. Demanding "immediate and tangible" actions by Maliki, the senator stipulated that "the critical issue is what the Iraqi government is going to do to keep their government together, quell the violence and provide the services to the people that a government should and must provide."

Having established that, Reed made his entry into the great nomenclature debate. What's happening in Iraq, he said, "is a working definition of a civil war."

Other than his envoy suggestion, Reed had little in the way of fresh ideas for Iraq. But he made it clear that he didn't expect ideas from the Baker-Hamilton group or the Pentagon either. "I don't think we can afford to wait for the Iraqi Study Group report," Reed advised, questioning "how much detail and specific guidance they can give and still reach a consensus."

His hopes were not much higher for the Pentagon. Asked about Pace, the Joint Chiefs chairman, Reed smiled. "I think he's been extremely loyal to the secretary and the administration." Previewing the general's news conference, the senator said it "will probably be the best sort of indication of whether there is a new sense of candor or whether his position remains the same."

Pace opted for the latter. Under the watchful eye of Bryan Whitman, Rumsfeld's spokesman, he energetically offered his view that Iraq is not in a civil war but provided little other information, because "we need to be circumspect about what we say in public."

How about current efforts to increase troops in Baghdad? "That is a province of General Casey," he demurred.

Gen. John Abizaid's warning that violence must be controlled within six months? "I doubt that General Abizaid meant to pick a particular point on the calendar," Pace said.

Abizaid's caution that the military couldn't sustain a big increase of troops in Iraq? "The United States military can today and tomorrow handle any additional challenge."

Over in Amman, White House aide Bartlett was delivering the less-cheerful tidings that Maliki would be skipping the meeting that Bush had rearranged his schedule to attend -- and that the postponement to today had nothing to do with a leaked White House memo saying Maliki was either ignorant or incompetent.

"Since the king of Jordan and Prime Minister Maliki had a bilateral themselves, earlier today, everybody believed that negated the purpose for the three of them to meet tonight," Bartlett argued.

He continued this line of logic: "They had a very good conversation, and afterwards they felt, well, since we had good conversations, we addressed issues, there was not an agenda for the three for a trilateral that they felt was necessary."

No agenda? It was an odd way to characterize the Iraq war, civil or otherwise. But Bartlett and his colleagues were not the only ones feeling unhurried.

NBC's Andrea Mitchell discovered that the Baker-Hamilton commission had taken time from its deliberations for "a class photo . . . shot by celebrity photographer Annie Leibovitz." The Washington Post's Robin Wright learned yesterday that Men's Vogue would be publishing the spread.

"Through coverage of art and architecture, travel and food, politics and finance, books and sports, custom tailoring and fine watches," the magazine's mission statement says, it "will define a new male sensibility -- smart, worldly, mature, and ready to discover more." Such as how to fix Iraq.

Mideast Turmoil Pressures Bush To Revise Tactics (WSJ)

By Yochi J. Dreazen, Cam Simpson And Mariam Fam

The Wall Street Journal, November 30, 2006

President Bush long shunned the intensive Middle East diplomacy of the 1990s. But with Iraq, Lebanon and the Palestinian territories wracked by bloody turmoil, he may have little choice but to reconsider the regional political order he once derided as a "false stability."

As Mr. Bush arrived in Jordan last night, the White House has made clear that it is open -- at least in principle -- to considering talks with longstanding rivals Syria and Iran, though it wants them to first change their behavior. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice announced yesterday that she is meeting with Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert today amid efforts to revive the moribund Israeli-Palestinian peace process that allies say the Bush administration has never really embraced. And the administration has toned down its pressure on allied authoritarian countries such as Egypt and Saudi Arabia, which it previously suggested should embrace democratic measures.

Taken together, the administration's diplomatic initiatives represent an effort to cobble together as much of the decades-old Middle East power structure as possible as a way of restoring stability to Iraq and deterring Iran.

"Without arguing that the old Middle East was perfect, it sure looks an awful lot better than the new Middle East," says Richard Haass, who headed the State Department's policy-planning staff during the Bush administration's first term. Still, Mr. Haass cautions, it will be hard to piece together the old order.

The new diplomatic initiatives are fueled primarily by the rapidly deteriorating situation in Iraq, where a worsening civil war is killing thousands of civilians. Yesterday, Pentagon officials said they are considering sending more than 3,000 new troops to Baghdad in yet another attempt to quell the violence in the capital. U.S. officials, meanwhile, are harboring growing doubts about Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's ability to control the situation.

Mr. Bush had planned to meet the Iraqi leader last night in a joint meeting with Jordan's King Abdullah II, but Mr. Maliki abruptly canceled the session. Iraqi officials traveling with the Iraqi leader said he wanted to meet directly with the American president, without Jordan's leader present. Mr. Maliki is also taking political heat at home for the session, with several cabinet members saying yesterday they were boycotting parliament as a protest over the planned summit. Iraqi officials may also have been angry about a U.S. memo leaked to the New York Times questioning Mr. Maliki's intentions and capabilities.

But White House spokesman Tony Snow insisted the cancellation was unrelated to the flap over the memo, and said Mr. Maliki didn't "snub" Mr. Bush. U.S. officials say Mr. Bush and Mr. Maliki will meet today as scheduled. White House officials say Mr. Bush is planning to push the Iraqi leader to detail his strategy for stemming Iraq's surging violence and reconciling the country's warring sectarian groups.

Mr. Bush said earlier on the trip that he planned to reassure Mr. Maliki that the U.S. remains committed to victory in Iraq, wouldn't withdraw troops prematurely, and is seeking ways to bolster the Iraqi premier's authority. Administration officials say one idea being considered is to give Mr. Maliki expanded authority over Iraq's security forces.

Ms. Rice, meanwhile, will head to Jerusalem and to the West Bank town of Jericho today for separate talks with Mr. Olmert and Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas. Ms. Rice will also be meeting in coming days with the foreign ministers of Saudi Arabia, Jordan and Egypt as part of a broad U.S. push to build a coalition of Sunni Muslim Arab allies to help contain Iran's Shiite Muslim regime.

Indeed, the administration is confronting a region in the midst of profound political shifts that the U.S. helped ignite -- by invading Iraq and promoting democracy -- but now finds itself largely unable to control.

The Palestinian government long led by the late Yasser Arafat's political organization is now run by the militant Islamist group Hamas, which took power in elections Mr. Bush strongly endorsed and which refuses to recognize Israel or forswear political violence. In Egypt, mounting public support for the Islamic opposition is leading the country's ruling party to back away from promises of greater democratization there. Lebanon faces growing tensions between the Western-backed government of Prime Minister Fuad Siniora and the militant Shiite movement Hezbollah, which wants a bigger role in Beirut's governing coalition. The Sunni rulers of Jordan and Saudi Arabia, meanwhile, are increasingly concerned about the growing influence of Shiite Iran.

At the same time, powerful officials within the Bush administration will continue to resist calls to lean on Israel or to engage substantively with Syria.

The broader regional instability is being fueled by the dire situation in Iraq, where the administration is anxiously seeking a solution to the escalating cycle of sectarian bloodshed. A bipartisan commission headed by former Secretary of State James Baker III and former Rep. Lee Hamilton, seeking new strategies for dealing with the situation, will next week recommend that the U.S. expand its diplomatic outreach to Tehran and Damascus, according to people familiar with the panel's recommendations.

White House officials caution that they are deeply skeptical that either country would be willing to take constructive steps to calm the situation in Iraq, with which both share a border. "There's a combination of Iran, Syria, Hezbollah and Hamas that is trying to frustrate the dreams of the people of the region," National Security Adviser Stephen Hadley said in an interview earlier this week. And senior officials don't think Iran and Syria have much power to stabilize Iraq, even if their leaders were so inclined.

But Bush advisers do think Tehran and Damascus can make things inside Iraq much worse. "They are important in a negative way in Iraq," said a senior State Department official. "They can make things considerably worse."

U.S. officials say Syria could allow -- or even encourage -- an unimpaired flow of fighters, weapons and cash to Sunni insurgents in Iraq. Tehran could similarly step up its military and financial support for Iraq's Shiite militias or push those fighters -- who have been nurtured and financed by the Iranians for years -- to escalate their bloody campaign against Sunni targets.

Beyond Iraq, White House officials have been pushing to revive the moribund Israeli-Palestinian peace process. Formal talks between the two sides broke down several years ago, but Israeli and Palestinian officials managed to cobble together a cease-fire package in recent days that has largely ended months of bloodshed in the Gaza Strip, and Mr. Olmert this week publicly called on Palestinians to return to the negotiating table.

In part, the White House's Palestinian initiative is a response to entreaties from U.S. allies such as Britain and Saudi Arabia, which have been pressing the Bush administration for years to force momentum in the Israeli-Palestinian peace process, arguing that progress would contribute to broader regional stability. U.S.-friendly countries in the region say that if that irritant were removed, Washington would have greater diplomatic leverage with Arab leaders in trying to solve other problems, such as Iraq.

Saudi Arabia's King Abdullah asked Vice President Cheney to come to his country earlier this week to express concerns that Iraq's deterioration is destabilizing the entire region, including his own country, according to a person familiar with the closed-door session. This person says the king also reiterated his longstanding proposal for the entire Arab world to recognize Israel in exchange for a full Israeli withdrawal from lands it conquered in 1967.

Mr. Cheney's trip to Riyadh -- and the administration's apparent willingness to put its pro-democracy agenda on hold in Egypt -- indicate the administration has concluded that U.S. interests would be better served by having its traditional Arab allies remain in power, such as King Abdullah and Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak.

"If you talk about a democratic Middle East, then you might end up with Islamic forces in power, so Mubarak is better for them," says Emad Gad, a senior researcher at Cairo's Al-Ahram Center for Political and Strategic Studies. "The war in Lebanon and the elections of Hamas convinced the U.S. administration that the so-called moderate Arab regimes are more moderate than their people and more in line with U.S. policies."

Still, it is unclear how far the administration is willing to go diplomatically. U.S. officials have already ruled out easing their pressure on Tehran to abandon its nuclear program in exchange for Iranian assistance in stabilizing Iraq. Administration officials also say Mr. Bush is unlikely to press Israel to make far-reaching concessions to either Syria or the Palestinians.

Indeed, Mr. Cheney, long a skeptic of peace talks with the Palestinians, notched a bureaucratic victory earlier this week when Philip Zelikow, a top Rice aide who has been a vocal advocate of greater U.S. involvement in Israeli-Palestinian peace talks, said he would resign by the end of the year. A White House official who described himself as a friend of Mr. Zelikow said the diplomat was frustrated by the administration's reluctance to expand its diplomatic efforts in the Mideast and other key regions, and didn't see indications that would change any time soon.

Mr. Zelikow had been one of the Bush officials arguing most strongly for a new effort to restart the Israeli-Palestinian peace talks. In a keynote address Sept. 15 at a conference sponsored by a pro-Israeli Washington policy group, Mr. Zelikow said that "active policy on the Arab-Israeli dispute is an essential ingredient to forging a coalition that deals with the most dangerous problems" in the region.

Mr. Zelikow's address kicked up so much controversy in Israel and Washington that senior State Department officials had to publicly distance the Bush administration from his remarks, though a senior administration official involved in Middle East policy said that Mr. Zelikow's views are supported by several other members of Washington's top policy ranks.

Indeed, in another sign of the difficulties of the administration's attempts to return to old-fashioned Mideast diplomacy, a second senior State Department official traveling with Ms. Rice acknowledged last night that an important piece of the administration's plan -- creating a so-called caretaker government in the Palestinian territories to replace the one led by Hamas -- was stalled for the foreseeable future. Palestinian leaders had already declared those talks at a dead end.

Such a change is a key to starting meaningful talks, since the White House can't legally deal with Hamas because the U.S. has deemed it a terrorist organization.

Democratic Leaders Seek Special Iraq Envoy To Try To Stem The Violence (NYT)

By Carl Hulse

WASHINGTON, Nov. 29 — Leading Senate Democrats called Wednesday for President Bush to appoint a special envoy to work with Iraqi leaders to bring increasing violence in Iraq under control.

"Violence in Iraq has reached critical levels, and the violence is not predominantly instigated by insurgents, but is taking place between Sunnis and Shia," said Senator Harry Reid, who will become the majority leader, and four other top Senate Democrats in a letter sent to Mr. Bush. "It is our belief that coalition military action alone cannot end this violence."

The lawmakers said in the letter that the special American envoy could follow up on issues raised between Mr. Bush and Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki of Iraq during their planned meeting on Thursday in Jordan.

Democrats also said Wednesday that a newly disclosed administration memo raising doubts about Mr. Maliki's ability to bring the turmoil under control was in some ways reassuring because it showed that some senior administration officials recognized how serious the situation had become.

" I think that was a pretty realistic appreciation of Maliki," Senator Jack Reed, Democrat of Rhode Island, told reporters on Wednesday. "And I hope it does represent a much more realistic assessment of what's going on there rather than just, you know, the slogans that we've heard for so long."

Mr. Reed helped initiate the letter, which was also signed by the incoming majority leader; Senator Richard J. Durbin of Illinois, the No. 2 Democrat; Senator Carl Levin, Democrat of Michigan and the incoming chairman of the Armed Services Committee; and Senator John D. Rockefeller IV, Democrat of West Virginia, who will become chairman of the Intelligence Committee.

"My fear is that this meeting in Amman ends just with sort of some concepts, some discussions, some photos, and Maliki goes back into Baghdad, nothing's going to get done, and months from now, precious time will have been lost," Mr. Reed said.

In their letter, the Democrats said that a special envoy with existing relationships in Iraq and elsewhere in the region could devote full attention to keeping the pressure on Mr. Maliki to try to contain the violence. They said the current American ambassador to Iraq, Zalmay Khalilzad, had too many other duties to give his full attention to such an initiative.

"A special envoy can play an indispensable role in assisting the Iraqis in finding solutions," wrote the Democrats, who are hoping that Mr. Bush will take their views more seriously now that they will control the House and Senate beginning in January.

With Mr. Bush in the Middle East and Congress out of session until next week, other Democrats were quiet Wednesday about their expectations for Mr. Bush's meeting with Mr. Maliki, which was postponed from Wednesday.

But senior aides said the disclosure of the memo by Stephen J. Hadley, the national security adviser, expressing skepticism about the prime minister's capacity to quell the violence was seen as another sign from the administration that it needed to change its thinking on Iraq.

House Democrats have scheduled an informal forum on Iraq policy for next Tuesday at which they plan to hear from foreign policy, national security and military experts. They hope that the session will help to increase the pressure on the administration for a change in strategy and consideration of a withdrawal of American forces.

In their letter, the Senate Democrats called for Mr. Bush to urge the American-backed Iraqi government to take a number of actions, including condemning the current sectarian violence, disbanding armed militias and encouraging equal treatment of all Iraqis as well as to be careful not to favor one Muslim group over another.

"We understand that all of these steps are difficult," the letter said. "We are also aware that the Iraqi government has pledged to take many of the above steps but none have been accomplished. In the meantime, our U.S. forces continue to be injured and killed."

Four American state governors — Jon S. Corzine of New Jersey; George E. Pataki of New York; Theodore R. Kulongoski of Oregon; and Jon Huntsman Jr. of Utah — on Wednesday completed a two-day trip to Iraq that had not been publicly announced.

Mr. Corzine, in a conference call with reporters, said he was surprised by how much security conditions had deteriorated in the country from his previous visits in May 2005 and December 2003 as a senator from New Jersey.

"I think it is significantly more unstable than I would have thought, and the need for additional forces, particularly Iraqi forces, is pretty obvious," Mr. Corzine said.

A Bust In Bakersville (NSWK)

By Michael Hirsh

Newsweek, November 30, 2006

Nov. 29, 2006 - The forthcoming report by James Baker's Iraq Study Group has enjoyed the biggest public buildup since the Segway. And it is likely to be just as big of a bust.

Here's why the Baker-Hamilton report is destined to land with a thud, after weeks of messianic hype. According to sources who have seen the draft report introduced this week, the group will recommend deeper engagement with Iran and Syria in hopes these countries can help us quell the violence in Iraq. But George W. Bush, who remains a true neocon believer—"It's the regime, stupid"—is very unlikely to cut deals with such evil states, except in the most foot-dragging way. In any case, with each passing week Iraq's sectarian fratricide makes these neighboring countries less and less relevant. One doesn't have to be trained by Hizbullah or the Iranian secret service to grab a few Sunnis off the street every night and shoot them in the head. But until those killings stop, the yes-it-is-a-civil war-no-it's-not-a-civil-war in Iraq will continue to rage out of control.

The James Baker-Lee Hamilton group will also recommend tackling the problem of Israeli-Palestinian peace. But this central issue of Islamist discontent no longer has much to do with the violence in Iraq, just as the violence has less and less to do with Al Qaeda. The neocon fantasists, in their headiest days, used to say that "the road to Jerusalem goes through Baghdad." This meant that somehow, in ways they could never spell out, the Israeli-Palestinian issue would be resolved after democracy was achieved in Iraq. Now Baker's thought seems to be that the road to Baghdad goes through Jerusalem. This is just as silly as the earlier idea. Take this down: the road to Baghdad goes through Iraq.

Above all, sources indicate the Baker-Hamilton group will fudge the issue of what the size of the U.S. troop presence in Iraq should be, and what a specific timetable for withdrawal should look like. This means that, almost as soon as the report comes out in early December, Iraqi Prime Minister Nuri al-Maliki will be able to ignore it, and he likely will. Prominent Democrats like Sens. Carl Levin, Jack Reed and Joseph Biden will begin to dismiss it and reintroduce their own plans. Biden, for example, plans to hold six weeks of hearings in January, after he takes over the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, that will quickly turn Baker-Hamilton into a relic of that long-ago autumn of 2006.

What's happening in Washington right now is the worst sort of cover-your-backside politics. The nation's officialdom, Republicans and Democrats both, continue to indulge in the outer-galactic notion that Iraq is "winnable" or "losable." President Bush still seems to be deluding himself that "Al Qaeda" is behind the violence in Iraq, as he said in Latvia yesterday, and this week he's supposed to meet with Maliki in Jordan in hopes he can get the Iraqi leader to crack down on the violence. This requires the pretense the Maliki doesn't owe his political life to one of the chief authors of the violence, radical cleric Moqtada al-Sadr. Assuming the Bush trip was well-thought-out strategy and not merely a political ploy—not a safe assumption—the only possible explanation for it is that the president wants to split Maliki off from Sadr, forcing him to reform his government. But that is playing with dynamite in the middle of a conflagration. And Sadr, in any case, is probably too smart to give up his political hold on Maliki: his loyalists in Parliament announced today that they would merely suspend their participation in the government.

The biggest reason why Baker-Hamilton will bust big time, however, is that while the diplomatic Baker cautiously forges consensus, the fast-moving events in Iraq are making him look as if he's standing still. Consider: out at Ft. Riley in Kansas, the U.S. Army is engaged in its biggest training of "transition teams"—advisers to be embedded in the Iraqi military—since the Vietnam war. The 11-man transition teams amount to only about 5,000 advisers so far, and some 15,000 are needed to truly professionalize the Iraqi Army, says Lt. Col. John Nagl, commander of the 1-34 Armor. In order to train up those additional U.S. advisers, President Bush must decide to stand down U.S. forces in Iraq and give the Iraqi Army the lead. That would allow regular U.S. Army battalions to park their tanks and artillery pieces, so that U.S. officers and noncoms could become advisers.

This major shift is going to occur no matter what Baker-Hamilton says. The future course of U.S. involvement is set for a long time to come: as the Iraqi Army matures beyond the five or so divisions that are now functioning, very brave American officers will join them, guiding their movements with the latest technology that effectively will give them a proxy air force. This will be a slow, painstaking process, neither cut and run nor stay the course. Just find a medium-term way to extricate yourself with your scalp intact.

Iraq is not winnable or losable. All it is, in the best case, is manageable. What's needed instead of careful consensus building in Washington is a Richard Holbrooke or a Henry Kissinger out in the field, a tough, no-nonsense negotiator who can grapple with the reality of the American failure in the region and simply seek the most honorable way out. Perhaps the best hope for this kind of adult solution now lies with Robert Gates, who served on the Baker-Hamilton group until he was named to replace Donald Rumsfeld as secretary of Defense. Gates, a longtime CIA analyst, is a true big-tent guy who has made a career out of sifting out nonsense. In his 1996 memoir, "From the Shadows: the Ultimate Insider's story of Five Presidents and How They Won the Cold War," Gates took a nonideologue's view, identifying useful elements of foreign policy from Jimmy Carter to Ronald Reagan. Both hawks and doves, he says, had part of the cold war equation right. "If presidents had listened only to the hawks, U.S. belligerence and aggressiveness would have been so overwhelming that the Soviets would have been afraid to undertake changes in their system, to have let down their guard at all," he wrote. "If presidents had listened only to the doves, not only would the Soviets have seen many opportunities to gain strategic military advantage and new influence in the Third World; there would have been significantly less pressure on them to change." His interpretation of the victory over the Soviet Union is that it was won through "both confrontation and conciliation, conflict and dialogue."

In the end, the most enduring legacy of the Baker-Hamilton report may be Gates himself, a philosophy of management over vision. At least that's better than what we have now.

When Should The U.S. Withdraw? Ask The Iraqis. (WSJ)

By Scott Turow

The Wall Street Journal, November 30, 2006

Now that we have a divided government, a new defense secretary and the Iraq Study Group prepared to issue its report, we appear ready to descend into a period of rancorous national debate about how long our troops should remain in Iraq. But before Americans go toe-to-toe with one another, I have a new idea. Why don't we ask the people of Iraq what they think?

I'm not a foreign-policy wonk. I am merely one of millions of Americans who despairs over the news from Baghdad, and yearns to see this country as united as we were in the days after 9/11. The Americans who opposed the Iraq invasion -- like me -- and those who fully supported our military action now find themselves in accord on two fundamental points: First, the war has not gone well. Second, we are prisoners of an ethical dilemma of our own making, crystallized in the "Pottery Barn Rule" Colin Powell reportedly invoked to President Bush: You break it, you own it. Whatever the validity of our reasons for going into Iraq, we terminated not only a despotic government but a stable, civil society. It seems selfish and unjust for us simply to leave the country in chaos, and we will be required to spend billions repairing Iraq for years to come.

But that does not resolve the question of our military presence, which is sharpened by the young Americans being killed and maimed there every day. Many foreign-policy experts believe that a large-scale American force on Iraqi soil aggravates ethnic rivalries by forcibly enhancing power differentials between those groups, thus robbing the current government of legitimacy in the eyes of many citizens. Others, including many of our generals, say that the 140,000 American troops stationed in the country are all that stand in the way of a full-scale civil war. But why attempt to resolve this as a debate among our dueling experts when we can ask the genuine authorities -- the Iraqi people? They are there. They know their country and their countrymen. And naturally, it is they who care most intensely about their future.

So here's what I propose. Our government must urge Iraqi leaders to hold an immediate plebiscite on a single question: Should American forces remain in Iraq until a stable democratic order emerges, however long that takes, or should we instead withdraw in stages over a fixed period, say, the next 12 months?

I have a guess about which way the vote will go. Since opinion-sampling began a year after the invasion, one poll after another has found that an increasing majority of Iraqis would like us to pack our gear and leave. But who knows how accurate polling is in a society like Iraq, where so many citizens have reasons to be guarded about their views? And even if the results reflected opinions at the time, it's possible that an informed national discussion might change minds. Yet if the remaining rationale for our presence in Iraq hinges on our commitment to democracy there, what possible excuse can we have for not letting the Iraqis make the ultimate choice about our occupation? If a solid majority throughout the country wants us out, then we can leave knowing that we are not deserting a people eager for our presence.

And if instead a majority of Iraqis prefer that we remain, we can revert to our own national debate about the kind of commitment we are willing to make, knowing we have an open invitation. I am not proposing that we give the people of Iraq veto power over how long Americans must fight and die on their behalf. We must fix goals for our inevitable departure. But even the Americans who believe we should depart tomorrow will have to reflect twice if the beleaguered citizens of Iraq, 150,000 of whom have already died according to their government, say the future presence of our troops will be helpful. And attacks on American soldiers will perhaps slacken if it becomes fact-established that we are invited guests, not an occupying army.

The results of the vote would probably not be the same in the various ethnic regions of Iraq. In prior opinion polls, the Kurds have overwhelmingly favored the American presence that has freed them from the menacing hand of Iraq's central government. But a split verdict may suit our aims. American troops must continue to be stationed somewhere in the region to prevent active coercion by Iraq's neighbors, especially Syria and Iran, and to respond in case the direst predictions prove out and parts of Iraq become a lawless terrorist breeding ground, like Afghanistan under the Taliban. The emerging Kurdish canton might be the ideal place for our soldiers to wait out events, while removing themselves from the cross-fire in the rest of the country.

After the blood and treasure America has expended in Iraq, all Americans should hope that a stable society emerges there, governed by people who are not actively hostile to American interests. That is an ever more distant dream at this stage. But the longer we remain in Iraq without considering the will of its people, the more certainly we imperil the dwindling hopes we have by breeding enduring resentments.

The War Last Time (NYT)

By Thomas Powers

The New York Times, November 30, 2006

South Royalton, Vt.

THE chaotic war in Iraq is the great piece of unfinished business that will soon face Robert M. Gates, President Bush's choice to replace Donald Rumsfeld as secretary of defense. He will assume the difficult charge of halting the collapse of American strategy at a moment when the president's freedom to maneuver has been curtailed by the election of Democratic majorities in both houses of Congress, and by the free-for-all sectarian killing in Iraq.

Mr. Gates arrives at the Pentagon with no background in running the immense American military establishment, no broad political constituency, and no experience fighting or managing a big ground war. What he does bring is a survivor's knowledge of how to push forward a controversial policy — President Ronald Reagan's campaign against the Sandinistas in Nicaragua in the 1980s — and a history of close association with President Bush's father. It was President George H. W. Bush who appointed Mr. Gates to his biggest job — running the Central Intelligence Agency.

Simple realism — totting up the Congressional votes the president can count on to back or oppose him — suggests that a turning point has been reached in Iraq. Getting in is over, and getting out is about to begin. I am reminded of a similar moment 41 years ago, when Lyndon Johnson was facing the bleak but imminent prospect of his South Vietnamese allies' collapse in Saigon. The year was 1965, and Johnson had just been overwhelmingly re-elected president over Senator Barry Goldwater on the oft-repeated campaign pledge not to send American boys thousands of miles away to fight a war that Asian boys ought to fight.

Johnson's advisers put it to him straight: Saigon was going to lose, Hanoi was going to win, and there wasn't much time to waste. The choice was clear: lose the war or expand the war, find a formula of words to mask failure or send more troops and increase the bet on the table. Johnson chose to expand the war.

Raising the bet was already a pattern. Just two years earlier, President John F. Kennedy had faced a similarly stark choice. The government of Ngo Dinh Diem, installed and sustained by the United States, was locked in a destructive battle with Buddhists in its own country, and though it was fighting the war erratically and ineffectively, it seemed impervious to American counsel. Even worse, from Washington's point of view, the Diem government had entered into secret conversations with the Communists. Some American officials thought a deal was in the works.

At the end of a long period of crisis, Kennedy's government backed a coup by Vietnamese generals who were being advised by a French-born C.I.A. operative named Lucien Conein. The Diem government was quickly removed and replaced, but in the process Diem and his brother were brutally murdered. The war went better for a while, and then didn't, in a pattern that repeated itself many times.

About 20 years ago, a friend and I were picking up a takeout dinner from a Vietnamese restaurant in Washington run by Tran Van Don, one of the generals who organized the 1963 coup. Tran pointed out a portly, white-haired man at a table overlooking the room, dining alone: it was his old friend, Lucien Conein. In a sense, they were both exiles. I often think about the conversations they must have had. The war that followed their coup killed 57,000 Americans and a million Vietnamese.

It was during this period, in 1968, that Robert Gates joined the C.I.A., specializing in Soviet strategic arms programs. In the early 1980s, the central intelligence chief, William Casey, picked him to be the C.I.A.'s deputy director, which won him a front row seat while the agency put a contra army into the field to bring down the Sandinista government of Nicaragua — a goal Casey and President Reagan never publicly admitted.

The contras were expensive and ineffective. The public turned against the war, and eventually Congress passed the Boland Amendment, blocking all further expenditure on the clandestine war. Then began what would be known as the Iran-contra scandal, and then ended Mr. Gates's knowledge of what his chief was up to. So Mr. Gates testified, and the Iran-contra special prosecutor, Lawrence Walsh, never managed to prove otherwise, despite years of tireless effort.

Mr. Gates kept out of trouble and earned the trust of two presidents, who both nominated him to run the C.I.A. The first time opposition was so bitter that Mr. Gates withdrew his name; the second time, he was confirmed only after drawn-out hearings in which agency professionals accused Mr. Gates of shaping intelligence to please his bosses. Three volumes of hearing records prove only that Mr. Gates knew how to answer the question that he was asked and could get the people who worked for him to do likewise.

Today the choice facing Washington is not quite as stark as the one that confronted Lyndon Johnson in 1965, but it is close. Mr. Gates has spent the last nine months working as a member of the Iraq Study Group, whose much awaited recommendations will be revealed next Wednesday. Getting out is the simplest remedy, but no one wants to shoulder the blame for what follows. Staying the course has already been rejected by the president. That leaves only some kind of altered or renewed effort to postpone the day of reckoning.

Defeating the insurgents is only half of the challenge; harder will be finding some way to restrain or disband the Shiite militias without bringing them into the war against us. Down that road would lie a spiraling conflict as protracted and unwinnable as the war in Vietnam. The Republicans may have lost the midterm elections, but to my ear, on the subject of Iraq, the president has never sounded ready to accept anything that might be called defeat. Iraq is not Vietnam, but we are the same. We find ourselves, at a parallel moment, militarily committed to a policy on the verge of conspicuous failure. The American people, now as then, are unsettled by the phrase "cut and run" and reluctant to put their judgment ahead of the president's.

Above all, American presidents are the same. Bad news from Baghdad and opposition at home may point to a lowering of expectations, at the very least, but I wouldn't bet on it. Presidents take failure personally, can lift their voices above the din of opponents, and can use the immense power of their office to force events in the directions they choose.

The verdict of the elections was clear. The public wants to let Iraqis handle their own troubles from here on out, while we start bringing our soldiers home. But that's not what President Bush has said he wants, so there will very likely be a series of fights over Iraq that will extend to the president's last day in office. Robert Gates is smart, quiet, dogged and loyal: a well-considered choice for defense secretary by a president determined to bring home that "coonskin on the wall," to borrow a phrase made memorable by an earlier president in a similar fix, Lyndon Johnson.

Defense Eyeing More Deployments To Iraq (AP)

By Pauline Jelinek

AP, November 30, 2006

The Pentagon is developing plans to send four more battalions to Iraq early next year, partly to boost security in Baghdad, defense officials said Wednesday. Meanwhile, a commission studying Iraq policy said it would make its report next week.

The extra combat engineer battalions of reserves, likely to be sent to Baghdad, would total about 3,500 troops, officials said. They said the units, coming from around the United States, have already done tours in Iraq but there has been no final decision on which will go.

The moves come as violence continues to rise in Baghdad, and President Bush is under growing pressure to craft an exit strategy that would withdraw a substantial number of U.S. troops from Iraq while shifting more responsibility to the Iraqi government. The Iraq Study Group, a bipartisan commission looking into Iraq war policy, said it will release its report to the president, Congress and the public on Dec. 6.

The commission, led by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III and former Rep. Lee Hamilton, D-Ind., is widely expected to call for regional talks as part of its recommendations, including involvement by Syria and Iran. The Bush administration has been reluctant to engage those two countries, which it says have abetted the violence in Iraq.

It remained unclear what the group would recommend regarding possible U.S. troop withdrawals. As of Tuesday, its members — five Democrats and five Republicans — were divided over the appropriate U.S. troop levels in Iraq, and whether and how to pull American forces out, according to one official close to the panel's deliberations.

A second official has said that the commission is unlikely to propose a timetable for withdrawing all U.S. troops but that some members seem to favor setting a date for an initial withdrawal, an idea that has been pushed by many congressional Democrats.

There are 139,000 U.S. troops in Iraq, with some 20,000 in and around Baghdad.

At a Pentagon press conference, Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, would not say whether more troops are planned for Baghdad, but he did say that was among many ideas commanders are debating. He said there was no plan to shift all troops out of the volatile Anbar Province into Baghdad.

Pace was asked if the advice of generals is becoming less important because of the upcoming Iraq Study Group report and the fact that power in Congress has shifted to Democrats, some of whom have been critical of the war.

"This is a very complex problem, and the more 10-pound brains we can bring to bear on the problem for our nation, the better," Pace said.

The Pentagon's decisions on which reserve battalions to send to Iraq next year would depend on how long the units had already served on the battlefront, because the Pentagon is trying to not break a policy of deploying troops no longer than 24 months on the ground in Iraq. The decision-making process was described by defense officials who requested anonymity because the plans have not yet been announced.

DOJ_NMG_0100054

In addition, military leaders are shifting brigades within Iraq. The officials said they are moving a Stryker Brigade into Baghdad to help shore up security there. The 3rd Stryker Brigade, 2nd Infantry Division will move from Mosul in northern Iraq, down to Baghdad to replace a Stryker brigade that has gone home to Alaska.

Portions of the 2nd Brigade, 1st Infantry Division are moving into Iraq and heading up to Mosul to take its place, officials said.

In another development, former CIA Director Robert Gates, President Bush's nominee for defense secretary, endorsed the idea of engaging Iran and Syria for help in stabilizing increasingly violent Iraq, an opinion somewhat at odds with Bush's.

Gates made the comments in response to a questionnaire from the Senate Armed Services Committee, which is to hold a confirmation hearing next week.

"War planning should be done with the understanding that post-major combat phase of operations can be crucial," Gates said in a 65-page written response submitted to the committee Tuesday.

"If confirmed, I intend to improve the department's capabilities in this area," he said. "With the advantage of hindsight, I might have done some things differently."

Gates also appeared to subtly criticize the invasion of Iraq.

"I believe the use of pre-emptive force should be based on very strong evidence," he said.

Powell: Iraq Meets Civil War Definition (AP)

By Jim Krane

AP, November 30, 2006

Former Secretary of State Colin Powell said Wednesday at a business conference here that the war in Iraq "could be considered a civil war," the conference organizer said.

Powell made the comment during a question-and-answer session after a keynote speech, according to David Hellaby, who organized the "Leaders in Dubai Business Forum." No cameras were allowed in to record the talk, but Hellaby was present and issued a press release quoting Powell.

Powell could not be immediately reached for comment. Hellaby said Powell was leaving Dubai immediately after Wednesday's conference.

Powell's comments come in sharp contrast to those of President Bush, who said Tuesday that Iraq is not in a civil war. Bush blamed al-Qaida extremists for the daily violence there.

Bush said Iraqis had "a chance to fall apart and they didn't."

The issue has become the focus of intense political debate in the United States in recent days. Powell is a retired general who served as chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, and was secretary of state during Bush's first term in office.

During his speech, Hellaby said, Powell said the Iraq war had three phases. The first, the invasion phase, went as planned. But the second phase, the military occupation, was "badly handled," Powell said, according to the conference organizer.

Mistakes during the second phase led to the third, "which could be considered a civil war," Powell told the conference, according to Hellaby.

The session was moderated by CNN International correspondent Hala Gorani, but no cameras were allowed, Hellaby said. The forum drew 2,000 business people from around the Middle East.

Is Iraq A Civil War? Scholars Say Yes. Media Debate It. (CSM)

By Linda Feldmann

The Christian Science Monitor, November 30, 2006

WASHINGTON

Bit by bit, the mainstream media are referring to the war in Iraq as a "civil war" in news coverage. NBC News took the leap on Monday. The Los Angeles Times and The New York Times have made the switch. Other news organizations are still using "sectarian conflict" or "on the verge of civil war," but are actively debating using the more loaded term, which the Bush administration still eschews.

Most scholars who study war view the Iraq situation as a civil war; the only debate is when it became one - in 2004 when the US transferred sovereignty to Iraqis, or early this year when the bombing of a Shiite mosque in Samarra sparked a wave of sectarian violence that continues? Academics cite the standard definition of civil war: groups from the same country fighting for political control, and a death toll of at least 1,000. A majority of Americans view the conflict as a civil war, polls show.

The debate over terminology seems to have sprung from the latest surge in sectarian violence, and perhaps from a greater sense of freedom among US media, after the November elections, to call the situation as they see it without being accused of political bias, analysts say.

"It's a political debate, not a semantic debate or a theoretical debate," says David Gergen, a professor at Harvard's Kennedy School of Government and a former adviser to four US presidents of both parties. "In politics, the conventional wisdom has held for some time that if the public concludes our soldiers were in the middle of a civil war, they would think it hopeless and want to withdraw quickly."

Mr. Gergen says the administration's resistance to the term is understandable. "Calling it a civil war, in the minds of many supporters of the war, could pull the plug on all remaining support," he says.

The Bush administration, along with its British allies, is not alone is resisting the term "civil war." UN Secretary General Kofi Annan warned on Monday that Iraq was "almost there." But as UN chief, he too faces political considerations in his use of terminology. And at this delicate moment, with the US-led coalition and Middle East nations considering next steps, Mr. Annan is walking a careful line.

In the academic world, British war historian John Keegan writes in the current issue of Prospect magazine that the Iraq war does not meet his own criteria for civil war, which include "identifiability of the combatants." By Mr. Keegan's definition, there have been only five civil wars since the 17th century. By the reckoning of Molly Toft, an expert on civil wars at the Kennedy School, there have been 142 since 1940.

For the mainstream media, whose franchise on the news has been under increasing challenge, bucking the administration early on in the war would have been seen as a political statement that they were not willing to make.

"There's a tendency on the part of the mainstream media to defer to the basic definitions of the administration, and I think that's what happened here," says Chris Hanson, who teaches journalism at the University of Maryland.

The press, in an almost unconscious way, did not want to be drawn into a situation where it might be blamed for the outcome, and so has danced around flat assertions that Iraq is in civil war, he says.

"There's a nervousness about appearing to make a political decision, when in fact it should be based on reality rather than political," says Bill Kovach, a counselor at the Project for Excellence in Journalism. "But explaining all that is too difficult for most news organizations, or has been."

Since the start of the war, news organizations have preferred to describe events on the ground, rather than applying labels. But now, a growing number of news organizations are willing to change their approach, and explain why. On Monday, New York Times Executive Editor Bill Keller released a statement on the paper's decision to allow news reporters and editors to describe Iraq as being in "civil war" when they see fit.

"We expect to use the phrase sparingly and carefully, not to the exclusion of other formulations, not for dramatic effect," Mr. Keller wrote. "The main shortcoming of 'civil war' is that, like other labels, it fails to capture the complexity of what is happening on the ground. The war in Iraq is, in addition to being a civil war, an occupation, a Baathist insurgency, a sectarian conflict, a front in a war against terrorists, a scene of criminal gangsterism and a cycle of vengeance. We believe 'civil war' should not become reductionist shorthand for a war that is colossally complicated."

Similarly, The Christian Science Monitor has used a wide number of terms. Two of its news articles out of Iraq this week referred to the nation's "deepening civil war" and to "driving Iraq further into civil war." "We try to give our reporters a reasonable amount of analytical freedom to describe what they find in plain language, but not to force conclusions on readers," says Managing Editor Marshall Ingwerson. "In the end, I think our language has shifted as gradually as the situation in Iraq has evolved."

Some observers believe President Bush should accede to growing public perception and agree that Iraq is in a state of civil war - and then explain what he proposes to do. Perceptions of a "credibility gap" on Iraq have dogged the administration, and an acceptance of the public's view could help bring the public along with next steps.

"They'd be better off acknowledging the reality that it is a civil war, and then say, 'Let me tell you why we still need to stay here and fight and here's why it's still an important mission,' says Chris Gelpi, an expert on war and public opinion at Duke University.

An important aspect of the bipartisan Iraq Study Group's forthcoming recommendations will be whether the group refers to Iraq as being in civil war, says Gergen.

Majority Of Americans Believe Iraq Is In 'Civil War', Poll Finds (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, November 30, 2006

A majority of Americans think Iraq is in the midst of a civil war, a new Harris Interactive poll finds, and few are confident that Robert Gates's nomination as Secretary of Defense will improve the situation there.

Sixty-eight percent of U.S. adults said they believe there is a civil war in Iraq, the online poll from Nov. 13 to Nov. 20 found, compared with 14% who disagree and 18% who aren't sure.

Mr. Bush nominated former director of the Central Intelligence Agency Mr. Gates as a successor to Donald Rumsfeld on Nov. 9.

Of 2,429 U.S. adults polled, only 13% think Mr. Gates will make the situation in Iraq better. Forty-two percent think he will make no difference and another 40% say they aren't sure of the impact.

About half of those polled would like the government to set a timetable for withdrawal of U.S. troops in Iraq, while 18% favor withdrawing all U.S. troops now and 19% favor sending more troops to stabilize the situation.

The Harris poll was conducted online within the U.S. between Nov. 13 - 20, 2006 among 2,429 adults. Figures for age, sex, race, education, region and household income were weighted where necessary to bring them into line with their actual proportions in the population. Propensity score weighting was also used to adjust for respondents' propensity to be online. In theory, with probability samples of this size, one can say with 95% certainty that the overall results have a sampling error of +/- 2 percentage points of what they would be if the entire U.S. adult population had been polled with complete accuracy. This online sample is not a probability sample.

Oil For Food Justice (WSJ)

Australia's involvement in Saddam Hussein's Oil for Food scam has been known for years. But the bright light shone this week by the Cole Commission report is nonetheless illuminating -- and a lesson for other countries.

In 2,065 pages, Sir Terence Cole and his team unmask the vast corruption in AWB Ltd., Australia's former wheat board and supplier for a time of 16% of the world's wheat. That alone is a huge public service. AWB was the single largest payer of kickbacks to Saddam. From 1999 to 2003, the company paid $221.7 million to Iraq through "transportation" fees and "after-sales-service" fees designed to evade U.N. sanctions and Australian law. Given such compliant partners, it is little wonder Saddam thought the world would never act against him.

AWB's complicity started in July 1999, when the Iraqi Grain Board asked for a $12 per metric ton "transportation" fee for the wheat AWB wanted to sell to Iraq. Under U.N. sanctions, Iraq couldn't receive foreign currency; it was allowed to sell oil and deposit the proceeds in a U.N. escrow account for the purpose of buying food. But rather than reject Baghdad's blackmail, AWB rolled over and figured out a way to pay the bribe through third parties.

Mr. Cole's report demonstrates that AWB's senior directors devised front companies to disguise the illegal fees to Saddam and evade U.N. sanctions. Then they lied about it. "At no time did AWB tell the Australian government or the United Nations of its true arrangements with Iraq," Mr. Cole wrote. Canadian and American wheat companies did complain to their governments about AWB's practices. But AWB lied to Australia's Department of Foreign Affairs and Trade, the Australian Trade Commission, the Coalition Provisional Authority in Iraq, and Paul Volcker's Oil for Food investigation.

The Australian government started to act once Mr. Volcker's probe began turning over the rocks. Apart from the U.S., no other nation has launched a full-scale, independent criminal investigation into the crimes committed as part of Oil for Food. Mr. Cole's thoroughly readable report is available at www.oilforfoodinquiry.gov.au. He has recommended 11 AWB employees, plus a BHP Billiton executive, for criminal prosecution.

Meanwhile, most other countries have done little or nothing to come clean. France, which was given preferential oil allocations, has only a lone prosecutor moving ahead, with little support from the Elysée Palace. Russia, which facilitated the oil allocations and blocked moves on the Security Council to investigate kickbacks, refused to assist Mr. Volcker, much less prosecute anyone. Ditto for China, which received huge oil allocations, and Vietnam, whose state-owned food companies paid kickbacks in exchange for business contracts.

Regarding the U.N., Mr. Cole notes that "The United Nations knew that Iraq was breaching sanctions by requiring payment of inland transport fees and surcharges or after-sales-service fees. It knew this between 1999 and 2003. . . It took no steps to publicize or warn member states of the Iraqi practices, and it took no steps to stop the practices." Mark it down as another coda to Kofi Annan's disastrous legacy as Secretary General.

Afghanistan Called 'Key Priority' For NATO (WP)

By Michael Abramowitz

The Washington Post, November 30, 2006

RIGA, Latvia, Nov. 29 -- European NATO countries pledged Wednesday to remove some of the restrictions on combat by their troops in Afghanistan, officials here said, as the alliance sought to close ranks and bring new force to bear against a resurgent Taliban militia.

At the conclusion of a summit here, leaders of the 26 NATO governments declared that attaining peace and security in Afghanistan is now the "key priority" for a grouping originally formed to confront Soviet military power in the Cold War.

The Bush administration has been pushing for more troops in Afghanistan and fewer restrictions by NATO members on how those troops could be used. President Bush has said success in Afghanistan is possible only if members accept "difficult assignments." NATO has about 33,000 troops in Afghanistan, about a third of them American.

Tensions have risen within the alliance over the refusal of Germany, France and Italy to send their forces into southern Afghanistan, focus of the alliance's battle against the Taliban militia. The increasing violence there has raised doubts about the viability of Afghan President Hamid Karzai's government.

Restrictions on use of troops has reflected a reluctance by some member countries to get involved in a war that, with suicide attacks and roadside bombs, is coming to resemble the one in Iraq more.

A statement from NATO indicated that the leaders had agreed to remove some of the "caveats" that countries had placed on the use of their troops, though exactly how much will change remained uncertain.

Though Germany, France and some others have maintained restrictions that will largely keep their troops in the relatively calm north, the Netherlands and Romania removed limits on how their troops can be used. Some other countries offered more troops and equipment for the effort, officials said.

During a news conference, NATO Secretary General Jaap de Hoop Scheffer said that about 26,000 of the troops in Afghanistan were now "more usable" in combat and noncombat operations and that all member countries had agreed their troops could be called on in a crisis by British Lt. Gen. David Richards, NATO's Afghanistan commander.

"In an emergency, they will support each other. That is the most fundamental demonstration of NATO solidarity," de Hoop Scheffer said.

U.S. officials pronounced themselves pleased with the summit. "We heard new pledges last night, so I think the commanders have a great deal to work with," said Daniel Fried, assistant secretary of state for European and Eurasian affairs, briefing reporters on board Air Force One. "The fighting season, so to speak, is going to end with the coming of winter. The NATO forces in the south did a very good job. Now you're going to see NATO trying to consolidate its battlefield gains."

Fried and other officials said the challenges facing Afghanistan are more than military, and the NATO leaders called on other countries to step up economic support and help for reconstruction. "There can be no security in Afghanistan without development, and no development without security," the communique stated.

Afghanistan was a major focus of a dinner Tuesday night for Bush and other leaders gathered for the summit here. British Prime Minister Tony Blair briefed the others on his recent trip to Afghanistan, saying the operation there is of "crucial importance to our own security. NATO's credibility is at stake here."

White House counselor Dan Bartlett described Bush as pleased with the dialogue Tuesday night. There was a "clear understanding of the stakes in Afghanistan," Bartlett said.

Unlike some recent summits, this year's NATO gathering did not focus on the immediate induction of new member countries. But the leaders' statement indicated that they might issue invitations to three Balkan nations -- Croatia, Macedonia and Albania -- at the next gathering in 2008.

They also invited Montenegro, Bosnia and Serbia to join the alliance's Partnership for Peace program, a first step toward possible NATO membership. The alliance had previously indicated it would first require greater cooperation from Serbia and Bosnia in tracking down suspected war criminals from the ethnic wars of the 1990s.

NATO also declared its 25,000-member rapid reaction force to be fully operational. The force is designed to allow NATO to respond to crises around the world on short notice.

NATO Adds To Afghan Force (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, November 30, 2006

RIGA, Latvia -- NATO leaders agreed yesterday to add troops to the 32,000 already in Afghanistan, but European countries such as France and Spain retained some of the restrictions that prevent their troops from taking a more active role in the fighting.

President Bush's goals for the summit were to achieve the troop commitment, persuade other NATO members to pledge increased defense spending, gain a recognition that Afghanistan is a make-or-break fight for the future of NATO, and break down restrictions that keep some allies' troops out of the heaviest fighting in the south, where Canada, Britain, the Netherlands, the United States and Estonia bear the burden.

He won progress on all of those goals, though in varying degrees.

The final communique makes it clear that Afghanistan is the defining battle for the alliance, but it simply encourages nations to boost defense spending. Although some European nations dropped caveats to deployment, they gave no hard agreement to push more of those troops to the south where the fighting is heaviest.

"We got a good deal the last couple of days in Riga," said Daniel Fried, assistant secretary at the State Department for European and Eurasian affairs. "Some allies brought more commitments to the table. Other allies said they would, in fact, even if they kept on some of the caveats on their missions, would respond to other allies if they needed help."

He said the allies also agreed to heed any requests by the NATO commander to shift troops inside Afghanistan.

NATO Secretary-General Jaap de Hoop Scheffer said the meeting produced a consensus that Afghanistan is critical, that the alliance's military commitment there is open-ended and that progress is being made.

"It is winnable, it is being won, but it is not yet won," he said.

Britain and Canada were optimistic that other nations would take some of the brunt of fighting in southern Afghanistan, but Spain and Italy said they would refuse to deploy troops.

Mr. de Hoop Scheffer said agreements to reduce caveats that constrain troops stationed in Afghanistan will help.

"A number of nations have diminished the caveats and the result is that, as we speak, about 20,000 of the total of 32,000 NATO ... forces are now more usable than they were for NATO combat and noncombat missions," he said.

Pledges to increase forces bring NATO to 90 percent of what military commanders have requested. Members have pledged additional fighter helicopters, several infantry companies and embedded training teams to help train the Afghan army.

"We still have to work on the other 10 percent," Mr. de Hoop Scheffer said.

The NATO leaders also discussed another round of expansion, with Albania, Croatia and Macedonia the likeliest candidates, and invited Serbia, Montenegro and Bosnia-Herzegovina to take the first step toward membership.

The United States hopes that former Soviet republics Georgia and Ukraine will be given a chance to meet the requirements for NATO membership.

Nato Discord Mars Afghan Headway (FT)

By Daniel Dombey And Stephen Fidler And Farhan Bokhari

Financial Times, November 30, 2006

Nato's leaders made modest progress on Wednesday on reducing the restrictions on the use of the alliance's 32,000 troops in Afghanistan, but differences soon broke out over the scope of changes.

At the close of a two-day summit in Riga, Jaap de Hoop Scheffer, Nato's secretary-general, said the alliance had met 90 per cent of the requirements for its mission in Afghanistan – chiefly by reducing or eliminating national "caveats" or restrictions on the use of troops. Previously Nato had said it had fulfilled 85 per cent of the requirements.

"We still have to work on the other 10 per cent," Mr de Hoop Scheffer said.

Nato officials said that five to eight of the 50 specific restrictions on national troops had been eliminated, making it easier to move soldiers and equipment across different sectors in Afghanistan.

Mr de Hoop Scheffer added that he had received commitments from the leaders of all 26 Nato countries that such restrictions would be waived in the case of emergency. "An emergency is defined by one man and only one man and that is the commander [of Nato's force]," he said.

But seconds later both José Luis Rodríguez Zapatero, Spain's prime minister, and Romano Prodi, his Italian counterpart, insisted that their countries retained the right to decide when troops should be deployed.

"In emergency situations it is the Spanish command that decides," Mr Zapatero said. He added that Spain would not lift any of its restrictions on the use of its forces, since no such step was required by the troops' United Nations mandate.

Mr Prodi said the position of Italy, France, Germany and Spain, none of which station or intend to deploy troops in the turbulent south of Afghanistan, was the same. At a separate press conference, President Jac-ques Chirac said France could consider sending its troops outside Kabul case by case.

But Nato officials said that the political signal sent by the leaders at the summit would make it near impossible for national capitals in the future to resist emergency calls by commanders in the field. “Nato’s credibility is on the line,” said Tony Blair, Britain’s prime minister. “The mission in Afghanistan is not yet won but it is winnable and indeed we are winning,” he added, echoing comments made by many other leaders.

On Wednesday night, however, a senior Pakistani official insisted that Nato needed to reach an accommodation with the insurgency. “Instead of fighting Taliban militants, foreign troops should reconcile themselves to this reality,” he said. “If the western world makes the mistake of prolonging this war, we would only see a never-ending conflict”.

In an attempt to increase the effectiveness of the battle, Nato leaders agreed to give greater emphasis to non-military efforts, backing a call by Mr Chirac to set up a “contact group” to co-ordinate policy on Afghanistan with neighbouring countries and international institutions. Mr de Hoop Scheffer hoped the European Union would provide greater co-operation after an EU Brussels summit next month.

A UK official also emphasised that Bulgaria, Spain and Macedonia were sending reinforcements to the Afgh-an-istan mission. But Nato diplomats acknowledged that the contributions were relatively small and had been decided beforehand.

US Sees Afghanistan As Test Of NATO Role (CSM)

By Howard Lafranchi

The Christian Science Monitor, November 30, 2006

RIGA, LATVIA

The question looming over NATO's summit in this Baltic country this week was essentially this: What are friends for?

With the focus on the NATO-commanded counterinsurgency operation in Afghanistan, leaders from President George Bush to Canada's Prime Minister Stephen Harper wanted to know if just a few NATO countries would continue to carry the weight and face the worst of the danger. Or, would more of NATO's 26 members help out their partners with more troops - and fewer restrictions on how their troops can be used?

"Clearly there is still work to be done" to equalize the tasks of NATO assignments, says NATO Secretary-General Jaap de Hoop Scheffer.

The answer was only partially positive. At the close of the summit Wednesday, a few countries had pledged more forces for the 33,000-troop operation, while others - in particular Germany, France, Spain, and Italy - loosened restrictions on "emergency" engagement of their forces, so that they now can be used for the evacuation of injured NATO soldiers.

The controversy over who is doing the heavy lifting - and taking the worst of the fire - in Afghanistan is not just a row among friends. NATO's operation in Afghanistan, and controversy over burden-sharing in the fight against a resurgent Taliban in particular, dominated a summit originally envisioned as a venue for furthering the alliance's transformation from a cold-war institution defending Western Europe. But the Afghanistan debate largely pushed other big issues aside, with some leaders saying that success of the NATO operation there would be crucial to the alliance's long-term worth as a global force for peace and security.

"Contributing to peace and stability in Afghanistan is a just cause vital to our collective security and our shared values," Mr. De Hoop Scheffer told leaders at Riga's closing session Wednesday. "Together with other international actors, we will stand with the Afghan people for the long term to help them build a democratic country free from terror and drugs."

Employing a cautiously optimistic tone, NATO Supreme Allied Commander Gen. James Jones said, "Many nations involved in Afghanistan reduced or eliminated many of the national restrictions imposed for the use of their forces, known as caveats, and this will now allow the commander of the mission to more effectively use troops throughout Afghanistan." Unequal share of burden?

The controversy sparked in September, when European countries rejected calls from fellow NATO countries that they send part of their forces based in relatively peaceful parts of Afghanistan to reinforce efforts in the south, where the Taliban is most active. The issue was kept alive in Riga by Canadian officials, who noted that their troops in the south have suffered 36 deaths since March, while Germany, with a slightly larger force in the country, has lost no soldiers this year.

President Bush also focused on the issue, noting in a speech at Latvia University Tuesday that "this alliance was founded on a clear principle: An attack on one is an attack on all. That principle holds true," he added, "whether the attack is on our home soil or on our forces deployed on our NATO mission abroad."

French President Jacques Chirac responded Wednesday by announcing that France would allow "case by case" emergency assignment of its troops outside Kabul. But he gave a flat " non" to calls for additional troops - offering instead some additional materiel, including additional helicopters. Spain said its troops could be used in "exceptional circumstances" to evacuate wounded soldiers, but not for combat.

Bush left Riga directly after the traditional group photo Wednesday for talks in Jordan with Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki. But the president came away from the summit "encouraged" by the substantive discussions and "the commitment to success" in Afghanistan, according to senior White House officials.

Still, the questions over deployment "caveats" and burden-sharing in Afghanistan will continue to rattle the alliance, some experts say. "Frankly, if an alliance does not face collectively and equally the central threats to its members - and by that I mean the terrorist threat and security challenges coming out of the broader Middle East today - then that alliance will not be central to their thinking," says Ronald Asmus, director of the German Marshall Fund's Transatlantic Center in Brussels. New 'pre-members'

Yet such doubts have not weakened the alliance's attractiveness to other countries. As evidence of that, NATO leaders overcame their lingering resistance and invited Montenegro, Serbia, and Bosnia and Herzegovina to become "partners" of the Euro-Atlantic Council - essentially pre-membership status. Some NATO countries, including the US, had resisted this step because they consider Serbia and Bosnia less than fully cooperative with the United Nations war crimes tribunal. They wanted to see first the arrests of two former Bosnian Serb leaders, Radovan Karadzic and Ratko Mladic, as goodwill gestures.

In the end, even the US lifted its opposition, with some officials citing as a deciding factor a letter from reformist Serbian President Boris Tadic, in which he called on NATO to send a signal of support to democratic forces in his country.

The NATO leaders' final communique does call on Serbia and Bosnia and Herzegovina to "cooperate fully" with the UN tribunal and says NATO will "closely monitor" those efforts. Rapid-reaction force

Offsetting to a certain degree the modest progress on deployments in Afghanistan was De Hoop Scheffer's declaration that NATO's new 25,000-strong rapid-reaction force is fully operational. The force, envisioned as a means of putting NATO quickly on the scene of security and humanitarian emergencies, was first tested last year in response to the Pakistan earthquake. The new force is expected to lead over time to increased flexibility and "interoperability" of forces from more than two dozen countries.

In Estonia, Bush Finds A Tax Actually To His Liking (NYT)

By Sheryl Gay Stolberg

RIGA, Latvia, Nov. 29 — There was much for President Bush to like about Estonia, an efficient little nation of 1.4 million people sandwiched between Russia and the Baltic Sea.

He liked Estonia's biography, the story of a young democracy that blossomed from a breakaway Baltic republic shedding the yoke of Soviet rule. He liked his Estonian counterpart, Toomas Hendrik Ilves, a reformed reporter (for Radio Free Europe) who favors bow ties and, having been raised in the United States, speaks flawless English — albeit with a faint New Jersey accent. He liked the country's paperless bureaucracy, which allows citizens to pay parking tickets with their cellphones and file their taxes over the Internet — a system the president proclaimed "the envy of all nations."

But if there was one thing about Estonia Mr. Bush really seemed to like, it was the Estonian flat tax. "I appreciate the fact that you got a flat tax, you got a tax system that's transparent and simple," the president told Mr. Ilves when the two attended a news conferences held, perhaps not coincidentally, at the National Bank of Estonia. Later, toasting Mr. Ilves at a luncheon, Mr. Bush gushed, "I am amazed to be in a country that has been able to effect a flat tax in such a positive way."

The flat tax, as it turns out, was the brainchild of the former prime minister, Mart Laar. Mr. Laar was inspired by the only economics book he had ever read, Milton Friedman's paean to capitalism, "Free to Choose." Believing, erroneously, that the flat tax had been put into practice throughout the West, Mr. Laar introduced it to Estonia. This year, the Cato Institute, a libertarian policy organization, gave Mr. Laar its "Milton Friedman Award of Freedom."

A Change of Venue

Presidential trips require the right lighting, the right mix of people, the right backdrops. For the Bush White House, which began sending out advance teams as early as August to create the perfect imagery for the president's NATO summit swing through Estonia and Latvia, that meant a hasty change of venue for a presidential speech here in Riga.

Mr. Bush was scheduled to give a major address to the Riga Conference, a kind of parallel summit meeting put on by the Latvian government that drew government officials, academics, military leaders and opinion makers from around the world to debate the state of trans-Atlantic relations while the heads of state met separately.

The conference was held in Riga's most ornate building, a grand Renaissance affair that in the 17th century was home to the Society of the Black Heads, a group of German merchants whose patron was St. Mauritius, often depicted as a Moor. His likeness is reproduced in statues and paintings throughout the building, named the Black Heads House. The building, which dates to 1334, is a great source of local pride. But its name and scantily clad black figurines proved too much for a White House intent on repairing strained relations with African-Americans.

“They didn’t want to speak at a place called Black Heads,” said Eric Leland, co-chairman of the German Marshall Fund, an American foundation that helped the Latvians organize the event. “Just walk around here, look at all these statues.” So the speech was held at the politically neutral site of Latvia University.

Bush’s Body Language

Body language is everything when foreign leaders get together, especially when one of those leaders is Mr. Bush. Though the NATO summit meeting was mostly closed to the news media, the few snippets of video that TV journalists managed to eke out were without speech but, as the old saw goes, worth 1,000 words.

There was Mr. Bush entering the Olympic Sports Center, the convention hall that played host to the summit meeting, walking with a foreign leader of whom he is not particularly fond, President Jacques Chirac of France. Mr. Chirac is seen speaking animatedly, his right hand moving up and down. Mr. Bush, frowning as he looks in the other direction, appears to be taking a deep breath — the kind you might take when you are counting to 10 to keep yourself from saying what is really on your mind.

Later, as the leaders of the 26 member nations gathered, Mr. Bush seemed far more at ease. That, perhaps, was a fluke of the seating chart, which was arranged alphabetically by head of state. Mr. Bush landed next to his good friend Prime Minister Tony Blair of Britain. At the official photograph, where leaders were free to arrange themselves, Mr. Bush parked next to another friend, Chancellor Angela Merkel of Germany. Mr. Chirac was four leaders down the line, a safe distance away.

Dinner With Jacques (WP)

By Jackson Diehl

RIGA, Latvia -- NATO's summit meeting here this week was supposed to be focused on bolstering its fight in Afghanistan and celebrating the freedom of Latvia and two other Baltic states that have made an astounding transition from captive nations under Soviet rule to democratic Western allies. So why was all the intrigue and backroom maneuvering about Vladimir Putin?

The answer to that question is a tangled diplomatic tale about the stubborn vainglory of French President Jacques Chirac and the equally implacable determination of Putin to humiliate and undermine the independent governments of former Soviet republics. It says a lot about the state of the Western alliance: the weakness of much of its present leadership and the deep confusion about how to answer the growing challenge -- some would say menace -- of Putin's Russia.

For senior officials of the Bush administration, the drama began Monday, when they abruptly learned that Chirac had -- without consulting fellow allies -- agreed with Putin on a dinner in Riga on Wednesday night, immediately after the summit's conclusion. Supposedly the intent was to celebrate the 74th birthday of the lame-duck Chirac, whose term ends next spring. But U.S. officials quickly perceived the gambit for what it was: a last attempt to needle and upstage the lame-duck American president with whom Chirac has quarreled for six years.

Bush, after all, was to deliver a speech in Riga celebrating the Baltic revolt against rule from Moscow and urging an open door at NATO for other nations trying to free themselves from Russian dominion: Georgia, Ukraine, even Belarus. And as Chirac knew, Bush was to leave Riga well before the dinner hour.

Putin had his own special interest. No Russian president has set foot in Latvia, Lithuania or Estonia since they gained independence in 1991. Moscow's policy toward those countries has featured border disputes, demands for special treatment for Russian minorities and attempts to gain control over key pieces of economic infrastructure. Nominally a Putin visit would have done an honor to Latvia's already much-honored president, Vaira Vike-Freiberga. Only Putin's intention was to insult Vike-Freiberga by relegating her to the status of third wheel at a summit dinner -- as if she were a provincial governor rather than a head of state.

As NATO technocrats bargained over the conclusions of the summit -- which ended up giving a modest boost to the Afghanistan mission and the prospects for the future acceptance of new members -- the Chirac-Putin stink bomb produced a wave of revulsion, confusion and, eventually, tactical maneuvering among the allied delegations. German Chancellor Angela Merkel was invited to attend the dinner and thus recreate the Berlin-Paris-Moscow troika that opposed Bush during the Iraq war. But she declined, citing a suddenly urgent cabinet meeting in Berlin.

U.S. officials, meanwhile, pointed out to Latvian counterparts that they need not go along with the dinner if there was no benefit for Latvia. To her credit, Vike-Freiberga -- whom Bush called "the Iron Lady of the Baltics" when he appeared with her Tuesday -- let it be known that Putin would be welcome, provided that he made time for a bilateral visit with the Latvian president.

The Russian response was entirely predictable: Putin, who was attending his own summit meeting of the Commonwealth of Independent States in nearby Minsk, Belarus, suddenly couldn't fit a stop-off in Riga into his schedule after all. Birthday-boy Chirac was relegated to accepting a cake from Vike-Freiberga, along with the usual French role of bickering over the fine points of a NATO agenda driven by the United States.

In all, a trivial tempest. But there was a lingering lesson: The Western allies have no idea what to do about Putin. Five years ago the energetic former KGB colonel was regarded as a strategic partner for NATO and its members. Now he is generally understood to be an autocratic imperialist whose political enemies suffer from a high rate of sinister poisonings. Bush and other NATO leaders aren't ready to act on that understanding, or even to state it out loud. But the idea of having the man to their summit meeting has become a little creepy -- something only a bitter French lame duck would do.

AP, November 30, 2006

PITTSBURGH - U.S. Attorney Mary Beth Buchanan was appointed acting director of the Justice Department's Office on Violence Against Women.

Buchanan will remain the lead prosecutor in the 25-county Western District of Pennsylvania, while also heading the Washington, D.C.-based office. President Bush announced the appointment Wednesday.

The office administers financial and technical assistance to communities around the country that are creating programs and policies aimed at ending domestic violence.

Buchanan became an assistant prosecutor in 1988 and specialized in white collar and child exploitation crimes before being sworn in as U.S. attorney in September 2001. She also served as the director of the Executive Office of United States Attorneys from June 2004 to June 2005.

U.S. Attorney Mary Beth Buchanan Gets National Justice Post (PPG)

Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, November 30, 2006

President George Bush announced yesterday that Mary Beth Buchanan, the U.S. attorney for the Western District of Pennsylvania, has been appointed to a national post within the Department of Justice.

Ms. Buchanan, 43, will serve as the acting director of the Office on Violence Against Women.

She will continue to serve as the U.S. attorney here and will split time between the two posts.

The Washington, D.C., office administers assistance -- both financial and technical -- to communities around the country that are creating programs and policies aimed at ending all forms of domestic violence. Its main mission is to encourage the use of the Violence Against Women Act, which went into effect in 1995.

Next year, Ms. Buchanan will oversee the spending of some $400 million in various program areas in the office.

Some of that will be used to provide legal assistance to victims, to pay for supervised visitation and safe exchanges for children involved in custody disputes, and to provide support for elderly victims, Ms. Buchanan said.

"Issues involving violence against women and families have been one of my most significant interests," she said. "I welcome the opportunity to be effective on a national level in addressing this problem."

She plans to focus on increasing outreach to Native American tribes and on college campuses. In addition, she hopes to target young people to educate them about the damage caused by domestic violence.

"Many of the negative actions that we see are behaviors learned at very early ages," she said.

The Office on Violence Against Women was created under former President Bill Clinton. One of the greatest achievements in its 11-year history is the creation of 15 Family Justice centers.

There, victims of domestic violence will find all of the resources and services they need to recover -- the police officers, lawyers, medical care, forensic services and counseling -- available in one place.

Centers have opened in the past year in Boston, Buffalo, N.Y., St. Louis, Tulsa, Okla., Brooklyn, N.Y., and San Antonio.

In her new role, Ms. Buchanan will travel and speak extensively.

This is Ms. Buchanan's second appointment to a national Justice Department position. She served as director of the Executive Office of United States Attorneys from June 2004 to June 2005.

Ms. Buchanan was appointed U.S. attorney in 2001. She began working in the office as an assistant prosecutor in 1988.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Justice Policy On Corporate Prosecutions Under Review (AP)

DOJ_NMG_0100063

By Lara Jakes Jordan, Associated Press

AP, November 30, 2006

WASHINGTON — The Justice Department is considering scaling back tough policies used to prosecute scandal-plagued corporations, legal tools criticized as unfairly pressuring companies and employees to cooperate in investigations.

The policies, used in criminal investigations of accounting firms Arthur Anderson and KPMG, could be changed as early as next week, according to people familiar with discussions among Bush administration officials and congressional leaders.

No final decisions have been made, department officials said. But the review comes as outgoing Senate Judiciary Chairman Arlen Specter, R-Pa., threatens to ease parts of the 2003 crackdown on white collar crimes in legislation he plans to file next week.

Additionally, an odd coalition of critics — from the U.S. Chamber of Commerce and the American Bar Association to former Attorney General Ed Meese and the American Civil Liberties Union — are calling for greater protections for those targeted in cases.

At issue is what has become known as the Thompson Memo, written by former Deputy Attorney General Larry Thompson. In the wake of scandals involving Enron Corp. and WorldCom Corp., it sought to coordinate prosecution tactics among the country's 94 U.S. attorneys.

The policy allows prosecutors to show leniency to companies that cooperate with investigators by refusing to pay employees legal fees and disclosing confidential discussions between company lawyers and executives targeted by the government. The memo suggests that companies not cooperating could be indicted.

"There's a general understanding that there's going to be a change that would eliminate any reliance on whether a company was paying attorney fees for employees when making the decision to charge or indict a corporation," said Brian Walsh, senior legal research fellow at the Heritage Foundation think-tank in Washington. The think-tank scheduled a discussion Thursday about the memo, led by Thompson.

Walsh, who has been briefed on some of the department's discussions, said the department might require the attorney general or the top deputy to review and approve any government access to confidential attorney-client discussions. That would take away the discretion from U.S. attorneys in the states.

That, however, "won't do enough to restore the historical protections of the attorney-client relationship," Walsh said.

Few, if any, critics take issue with the Thompson memo's overarching goals. It has helped secure hundreds of corporate fraud convictions since it was written, and is "designed to protect the American investor," department spokesman Brian Roehrkasse said.

Roehrkasse signaled that major changes are not likely, noting that waiving the confidentiality of attorney-client discussions "may very well be in the corporation's best interest."

"Doing so has allowed prosecutors to complete as expeditiously as possible their investigation while minimizing the disruptive effect a criminal investigation can have on a corporation," he said.

Jonathan Macey, a corporate governance and finance professor at Yale Law School, said the policy lets prosecutors proceed as though companies already have been proved guilty.

"If you have a situation where someone is actually innocent but they've been branded as uncooperative — it's a very scary Kafkaesque thought," Macey said.

In June, a federal judge in New York criticized the policy as it was used in a 2004 case against KPMG. Trying to cooperate with prosecutors and avoid indictment, the company cut off legal aid to 16 employees charged with setting up illegal tax shelters.

"KPMG refused to pay because the government held the proverbial gun to its head," U.S. District Judge Lewis A. Kaplan wrote. By doing so, the judge said, the government violated the employees' rights to fair trials.

Shift In Corporate Prosecution Ahead (WP)

By Carrie Johnson

Justice Department officials are revising controversial guidelines for criminal prosecutions of companies in response to pressure from business groups, civil liberties lobbyists and an influential lawmaker who is expected to introduce legislation on the issue early next week.

The changes, which could require local U.S. attorneys to obtain input from high-level Justice Department officials before seeking corporate indictments, could be unveiled by Deputy Attorney General Paul J. McNulty next month, according to sources briefed on the issue who spoke on condition of anonymity because the deliberations are not yet complete. The administrative revisions also may forbid government lawyers from forcing companies to stop paying attorney fees to employees ensnared in investigations, a move that was declared unconstitutional in June by a federal judge in New York.

Separately, Senate Judiciary Chairman Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) is drafting legislation that would bar prosecutors from forcing companies to waive their attorney-client privilege over internal documents in order to avoid criminal charges, a key part of the current guidelines. Specter, who has received support from Sen. Patrick J. Leahy (D-Vt.), could release the bill as early as Monday.

Debate about the appropriate use of prosecutorial power over business has simmered for years, reigniting in 2002 when the Justice Department charged Arthur Andersen LLP with obstruction of justice, a move that prompted partners and clients to flee and hastened the death of the audit firm.

Larry D. Thompson, then deputy attorney general, developed the guidelines in a memo the next year. After leaving government for a top legal job at PepsiCo, Thompson has quietly continued to defend his approach. In June, Thompson told the Texas bar association that his policy never was intended to force companies to waive their legal privilege except in "limited circumstances" in which prosecutors could not get information from other sources. Instead, Thompson said, companies should be prepared to cooperate with the government and turn over key facts about wrongdoing. He is to speak today at the Heritage Foundation, a conservative think tank in the District.

Some legal analysts argue that the push back is a reflection of increased confidence among business interests whose influence was devastated by the accounting scandals and resulting investor losses. In practice, they argued, debate over the Thompson memo is overblown because few government attorneys cross the line and demand confidential material to which they are not entitled.

Yet a strange-bedfellows coalition, including the National Association of Criminal Defense Lawyers, U.S. Chamber of Commerce, American Civil Liberties Union and National Association of Manufacturers, has formed to protest what it views as overly aggressive implementation of the guidelines. Peter H. Lawson, the chamber's congressional affairs director, and chief executive Thomas J. Donohue have visited top Justice Department officials repeatedly this year to make their case.

For business groups, the biggest concern is waiver of the attorney-client privilege to avoid prosecution, a move that puts sensitive documents and e-mail messages -- often involving communication with company lawyers -- into the hands of prosecutors, securities regulators and, ultimately, plaintiff lawyers who can use the waivers to obtain potentially damaging information in costly class-action lawsuits. Qwest Communications lost a bid in July to keep 220,000 documents from plaintiff attorneys after a federal appeals court ruled against the telecommunications company. Qwest had waived the attorney-client privilege over the documents to avoid criminal prosecution.

Defense lawyers and ACLU advocates, on the other hand, fear government practices that encourage businesses to point the finger at their own employees to save the companies from indictment. An ongoing prosecution of more than a dozen former KPMG officials over the marketing of tax shelters cast a spotlight on the issue after the accounting firm bent over backward to avoid indictment and helped implicate its own former executives.

In a letter earlier this year, a bipartisan group of former Justice Department officials, including attorneys general Griffin Bell and Richard L. Thornburgh; Clinton-era deputy attorney general Jamie S. Gorelick; and former solicitors general Theodore B. Olson, Kenneth W. Starr and Seth P. Waxman, called the memo "seriously flawed."

"You know you have a bad policy when people from across the spectrum are against it," said former deputy attorney general George J. Terwilliger III, who also signed the missive.

Panel Urges Relaxing Rules For Oversight (WSJ)

By Greg Ip, Kara Scannell And Deborah Solomon

The Wall Street Journal, November 30, 2006

A blue-ribbon committee on financial regulation has called for better protection of auditors, company employees and outside directors from authorities and lawsuits, as well as less-detailed rule-making and lower-key investigations.

The Committee on Capital Markets Regulation's report, to be released publicly today, is one of the most high-profile efforts to date to address concerns that excessive regulation -- much of it a response to recent corporate scandals -- is adding to corporate costs, stifling the public securities markets and causing the U.S. markets to lose business to foreign competitors.

AN ACTION PLAN

· Commentary:1 Panel chairs Glenn Hubbard and John Thornton on balancing the costs and benefits of regulation.

"The United States is losing its leading competitive position," the 148-page report says. One reason is "the growth of U.S. regulatory compliance costs and liability risk."

The committee is directed by Harvard law professor Hal Scott and co-chaired by former White House adviser Glenn Hubbard, now dean of Columbia University's business school, and John Thornton, former president at Goldman Sachs Group

Inc. and now chairman of the Brookings Institution. The group's recommendations for the most part either parallel efforts already under way or would require a different implementation of existing laws, primarily by the Securities and Exchange Commission. Only a few would require new legislation.

Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson is likely to welcome the report; the former chief executive of Goldman Sachs already is advocating many of its recommendations and recently called for a broad re-examination of regulations and laws.

He will hear more opinions before long. Early next year, the U.S. Chamber of Commerce is expected to release its own report, and Sen. Charles Schumer, (D., N.Y.), along with New York City Mayor Michael Bloomberg, have hired McKinsey & Co. to assess market competitiveness and its impact on the city's economy. Early next year, Treasury will host a conference to discuss the regulatory, legal and accounting structure.

The group would like the President's Working Group, a coordinating group headed by Mr. Paulson and including the heads of the SEC, Federal Reserve and Commodity Futures Trading Commission, to use its report to recommend specific reforms. That would give the issue "national economic significance," said Mr. Scott.

But Mr. Paulson will also have to decide which ideas are politically viable and which are dead-on-arrival. "Obviously anything you need congressional approval for would be difficult," said Mr. Scott, such as auditor-liability caps and reduced state-federal enforcement overlap.

Mr. Hubbard said, "I'm not sure this is as horrible a political [environment] as people think. There are Democratic leaders who have been quite bold in this area," citing, for example, incoming Senate Banking Committee Chairman Christopher Dodd's (D., Conn.) role in limiting shareholder class-action lawsuits in the 1990s.

The report makes 32 recommendations, of which six relate to easing the application of Section 404 of the 2002 Sarbanes-Oxley Act governing internal company-financial controls. The SEC already plans to present new guidance on section 404 on Dec. 13. Companies have complained that the section is expensive and onerous to implement.

Other recommendations call for setting a higher bar for regulators or private litigants to go after outside auditors, independent directors and company employees, especially when they act in good faith. It also recommends Congress cap auditors' liabilities, as some European countries do.

It recommends lawyers who donate to the officials who run public pension funds be barred from representing those funds in a class-action securities lawsuit. This could be done by the Department of Labor passing a rule under pension laws, or separate legislation.

The report's overarching theme is a change in regulatory philosophy. The revised philosophy is one based more on general principles than prescriptive rules, more aware of costs as well as benefits of new rules and less intrusive. It lauds Britain's Financial Services Authority, which uses "principles"-based regulation and oversees all British financial firms, in comparison with the U.S.'s multiple federal and state banking and securities regulators.

It suggests the SEC act more like federal banking regulators, such as the Federal Reserve, which concentrate on the soundness of the financial system and less on individual acts of wrongdoing, "with less publicity surrounding enforcement actions." That would encourage securities firms to step forward when they find problems, it says.

The report also says the U.S. has fallen behind some other countries in protecting shareholders' rights. It recommends that companies be required to submit "poison pills," meant to deter hostile takeovers, to shareholder approval.

It also says companies should require directors to be elected by a majority of voting shareholders.

On the contentious issue of executive compensation, it advises no action.

The SEC, it says, should create a special staff group to measure costs and benefits of rules before they are implemented.

Group: Sarbanes-Oxley Needs To Loosen Up (USAT)

By Greg Farrell

USA Today, November 30, 2006

A group of prominent business executives and academics is planning to issue a call today for government regulators to ease up on the enforcement of the Sarbanes-Oxley Act. The group, dubbed the Committee on Capital Markets Regulation, asserts that some elements of the stringent law, which was passed in the wake of accounting meltdowns at Enron and WorldCom, have threatened the USA's leadership position in the global capital markets.

While the group has no legal standing, its recommendations are expected to be taken seriously by Congress, the business community and the Securities and Exchange Commission, which is expected to discuss the paper's contents at its public meeting Dec. 13. The reasons:

·Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson gave his blessing to the group in September, saying it was important for U.S. capital markets to remain competitive.

·Several lawmakers, including Sen. Chuck Schumer, D-N.Y., have publicly bemoaned the fact that foreign companies have been scared away by the USA's regulatory environment and increasingly looked to London or other financial centers to list their shares.

·One of the co-chairs of the group, Columbia Business School Dean Glenn Hubbard, served as chairman of the Council of Economic Advisers under President Bush.

According to Hal Scott, the Harvard Law School professor who spearheaded the study, recent trends in litigation and regulation threaten to undermine the USA's position as the world's dominant capital market.

Scott says that 40 years ago, onerous banking regulations drove U.S. banks to London, where they helped spark the growth of the Eurobond market. He sees a similar trend with initial public offerings: Fewer than 10% of foreign companies that went public in the last year did so in the USA.

"We've got a major problem here," he says.

The solution, according to the committee, is to change the legal environment in the USA, where class-action lawyers win billions in settlements from public companies each year; ease up on Section 404 of the Sarbanes-Oxley Act, which forces even small companies to spend several million dollars to establish strong internal accounting controls; and urge the SEC to ensure its rules make sense from a cost/benefit point of view.

Jack Coffee, an expert in securities law at Columbia who consulted on the project, doesn't think over-regulation has scared away foreign issuers. Instead, he says, the threat of getting sued in U.S. courts is more of a concern.

Scott says the study was funded by the Starr Foundation, a group headed by former AIG chairman Maurice "Hank" Greenberg, and a philanthropist who didn't want to be named.

Panel To Urge Rewriting Rules To Aid Companies (NYT)

By Floyd Norris And Stephen Labaton

The New York Times, November 30, 2006

Saying it is concerned about a loss of American competitiveness, an independent committee will call today for a sweeping overhaul of securities market regulations.

It recommends making it harder for companies to be indicted by the government or sued by private lawyers, and urges policies to keep the Securities and Exchange Commission from adopting rules that impose high costs on business.

The committee, formed with the endorsement of Treasury Secretary Henry M. Paulson Jr., said the S.E.C. should be required to perform cost-benefit analyses on all rules before they were adopted. It said the S.E.C. should also take steps to rein in private securities litigation and adopt policies to shield corporate directors and auditors from some lawsuits.

With Congress soon to be under control of the Democrats, the report recommends changes that can be made without legislation. Even so, it remains unclear how much of the report will be adopted by the Treasury or the S.E.C. While the committee said its recommendations would help investors, they drew immediate criticism from one former member of the S.E.C., who said the recommendations would damage the commission and roll back needed regulation.

The report said President Bush should direct the President's Working Group on Financial Markets — composed of Mr. Paulson and the chairmen of the Federal Reserve, the S.E.C. and the Commodities Futures Trading Commission — "to examine the legal and regulatory concerns we raise and to propose whatever reforms it views necessary."

That could include permitting the group to review cost-benefit analyses before S.E.C. rules take effect, providing businesses with one more avenue of appeal against new rules they oppose.

The report also calls for relatively modest changes in the enforcement of the Sarbanes-Oxley Act and supports greater shareholder democracy by limiting antitakeover defenses of companies.

"Strong shareholder rights go hand in hand with reduced regulation or litigation, as strong shareholder rights invite greater dependence on shareholders to discipline management and directors," the report states.

The report was produced by the Committee on Capital Markets Regulation, a group co-chaired by R. Glenn Hubbard, the dean of the Columbia University Graduate School of Business, and John L. Thornton, the chairman of the Brookings Institution.

The committee has no official standing, but the identities of its leaders and its formation with an endorsement from Mr. Paulson have created an expectation that it may map out the Bush administration's final two years of strategy in capital markets. President Bush came to office talking of reduced regulation, but the Enron and WorldCom scandals led to passage of the Sarbanes-Oxley Act, which tightened regulation and established a new regulator for auditing firms, the Public Company Accounting Oversight Board.

Mr. Hubbard is a former chairman of President Bush's Council of Economic Advisers, and Mr. Thornton was president of Goldman Sachs when Mr. Paulson was its chief executive. The committee was directed by Hal S. Scott, a Harvard Law School professor.

The Treasury has not indicated what its agenda will be. In a speech last week, Mr. Paulson said the department would set up its own roundtable on the issues next year, an indication he was not yet willing to stake out definitive positions. Nor is it clear if Christopher Cox, the S.E.C. chairman, or the other commissioners will back the proposals.

The S.EC. analyzes some costs and benefits through its Office of Economic Analysis. But the committee proposes making that more formal, establishing "an internal staff group of qualified economists and business analysts to perform a systematic cost-benefit analysis as a regular part of the rule-writing process."

A draft copy of the report was provided to The New York Times yesterday by a committee member who asked not to be identified because the committee had determined it would not be publicly disclosed until today. The committee also gave reporters an embargoed copy of the report, but this article was not based on that release.

Although many of the changes could be made without legislation, some of the provisions, like imposing limits on damages against auditing firms — a major goal of two committee members who are heads of major auditing firms — would require Congressional action.

The report calls on the Justice Department to change its policy on corporate prosecutions. That approach is contained in a memorandum by Larry Thompson, who was deputy attorney general when the corporate scandals erupted. At the moment, prosecutors, in determining whether to bring criminal charges against a company, are permitted to consider whether the company waived lawyer-client privileges to aid the government's investigation and whether the company is paying defense costs for current or former executives facing criminal charges.

Instead, the report said, the Justice Department should prohibit prosecutors from seeking waivers of lawyer-client privilege or the denial of legal fees for company officials.

In general, it said, the government should be hesitant to ever indict companies, given possible damage to innocent shareholders and to the economy, and it said the law should be changed to give Washington the power to block state indictments of accounting or financial firms.

Federal indictments of corporations should occur only "in exceptional circumstances of pervasive culpability throughout all offices and ranks," the report stated. It added that if a state wanted to bring charges against either an auditing firm or a financial firm, the Justice Department should be able to block the prosecution "on the grounds of national interest."

A major focus of the report is what the committee sees as a loss of competitiveness for American capital markets, which no longer list the bulk of new initial public offerings. The report concedes that some of the reasons for that change cannot be altered, like improved foreign markets and the fact that some offerings are from companies controlled by foreign governments. But it wants to take action on the rest.

One way would be to exempt foreign companies from Section 404 of the Sarbanes-Oxley Act, which requires audits of internal controls, if they have something similar in their home markets. For American companies, it said, the S.E.C. and the accounting oversight board should provide guidance to make application of the rule less costly, something they have promised to do.

Companies whose securities now trade in the United States generally cannot leave unless the number of American shareholders falls below 300. The committee suggested that the S.E.C. change that to omit institutional shareholders from the count, on the theory that it is individual investors who most need protection. That would make it a little easier for such companies to leave the American markets.

For foreign companies not now registered in the United States, the report suggests that the S.E.C. abandon most restrictions on leaving, so long as American investors are warned before they invest that such a departure is possible. "If foreign companies know they can leave U.S. markets, they may be more willing to come in the first place," the report states.

A focus of the report is on excessive litigation. It urges the S.E.C. to offer rules and interpretations to raise the standard of materiality needed to make an error important and therefore subject to litigation.

It suggests that companies, with shareholder approval, be permitted to divert some complaints to arbitration rather than to court, or to require that such disputes that do go to court be heard by judges rather than juries. It also urges the commission to provide protection from lawsuits for directors who rely in good faith on auditors or on corporate officials. And it suggests Congress consider limiting the liability of accounting firms, to protect them from collapse if they lose a major case.

When the committee was formed, it did not include any former S.E.C. officials. "We would not want to put people in the position who had formulated these rules in the past," Mr. Scott said. "They may have a lack of objectivity."

But those people may have influence, and at least one of them said yesterday that he was not impressed by the report.

"The report pays lip service to the need for rigorous enforcement but would dramatically diminish the effectiveness of the S.E.C., of criminal enforcement, of state attorney general enforcement and of private damage actions," said Harvey J. Goldschmid, a professor at Columbia Law School who had served as general counsel and as a member of the S.E.C. He said he had seen the final report but declined to discuss or disclose details of it.

"The recent drive for accountability and deterrence would be replaced by a world in which almost anything goes," he added. "The committee raised legitimate questions but over all their recommendations are unbalanced and unwise."

Paulson-Backed Group Seeks Reduced Business Penalties (Update2) (BLOOM)

By Jesse Westbrook And Vineeta Anand

Bloomberg, November 30, 2006

Nov. 29 (Bloomberg) -- U.S. lawmakers and regulators should reduce penalties on companies and their auditors to help American financial markets compete globally, a group of prominent executives and academics backed by Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson said.

The Committee on Capital Markets Regulation, led by former White House Economic Adviser Glenn Hubbard and former Goldman Sachs Group Inc. President John Thornton, in a report to be published tomorrow, called for a broad overhaul of securities regulation, saying the Justice Department should pursue corporate criminal indictments only as a last resort. The group's recommendations may shape the debate about how to revise the Sarbanes-Oxley Act.

``Firms must choose to come to the United States: they do not have to come," the group said in an advance copy of the 135- page report. ``It is the committee's view that in the shift of regulatory intensity, balance has been lost to the competitive disadvantage of U.S. financial markets."

Paulson has questioned whether laws like Sarbanes-Oxley, passed in the wake of corporate scandals, went too far. The Treasury secretary has been waiting for the report as he prepares meetings next year to examine the U.S. accounting and legal systems.

Members of Congress have said they are concerned the U.S. may lose its status as the world's top financial center because of costs stemming from Sarbanes-Oxley.

Sarbanes-Oxley

House Financial Services Committee Chairman Michael Oxley and Senator Paul Sarbanes, a Maryland Democrat, drafted the law in 2002 after accounting scams at Enron Corp. and WorldCom Inc. cost investors about $65 billion, according to government estimates and shareholder lawsuits.

Sarbanes-Oxley requires outside auditors to evaluate the procedures companies have in place to ensure accurate financial statements, drawing business complaints. Critics say accountants have interpreted the provision too stringently, driving up compliance fees and prompting companies to take initial public offerings overseas.

The committee headed by Hubbard and Thornton said Congress should exempt companies with market values of less than $75 million from Sarbanes-Oxley audit requirements if costs can't be brought in line with benefits. SEC Chairman Christopher Cox has said he opposes exemptions for small firms.

Representative Barney Frank, a Massachusetts Democrat who's poised to replace Oxley in January, says he supports easing the law's costs. Representative Nancy Pelosi, a California Democrat who will become House Speaker, has said she wants to reduce burdens on small companies.

Cost of Regulation

U.S. companies paid $4.36 million on average to comply with Sarbanes-Oxley in 2004, the group said.

To ensure that regulation doesn't become too expensive in the future, the group suggested the SEC periodically review its rules to make sure benefits exceed costs.

The capital markets committee says it doesn't want to emasculate Sarbanes-Oxley, which it says has ``significantly strengthened the financial reporting and governance processes for public companies." In addition to tightening accounting rules, the law stiffened penalties for corporate fraud and requires top executives to certify that company books are accurate.

To prompt overseas companies to sell shares in the U.S. and prevent domestic firms from going elsewhere, the Justice Department should stipulate that it will only pursue criminal prosecutions in instances of ``pervasive culpability throughout all offices and ranks."

Investor Confidence

Charles Niemeier, a member of the Public Accounting Oversight Board, said in an interview regulators are already working to resolve most of the committee's concerns about Sarbanes-Oxley by revising audit standards to save companies time and money.

SEC Commissioner Roel Campos, a Democrat, said in an interview that securities regulations give U.S. markets advantages over foreign rivals by boosting investor confidence.

``Foreign investors tell me every day that they invest billions of dollars in the U.S. because they feel that our system protects capital and minority shareholders better than anywhere else in the world," Campos said.

DOJ_NMG_0100069

Civil litigation presents another problem. U.S. settlements from class action lawsuits soared to $3.5 billion in 2005 from $150 million 10 years earlier, the group said. The risk of litigation has prompted insurers to charge U.S. firms six times as much as they do European companies for coverage protecting executives and directors from lawsuits.

Lawsuit Limits

The committee said Congress should limit liability for accountants by ``preventing damage awards against audit firms and their employees at a level that could destroy a firm." U.S. financial markets couldn't sustain the demise of another accounting firm after Arthur Andersen LLP went out of business following its indictment for aiding Enron's fraud, the group said.

The SEC should shield independent directors from shareholder lawsuits when board members can show decisions were based on ``good-faith reliance on an audited financial statement," the report said. Such a change would encourage more people to serve on public boards.

There is no guarantee regulators will take up the committee's recommendations. Democrats, considered less friendly to business, will take control of Congress in January and similar suggestions have been rejected before, said Damon Silvers, associate general counsel of the AFL-CIO labor federation.

The report is ``destined for the desk drawer," Silvers said in an interview. ``It's the same old stuff the business lobby has been shopping around for a generation."

Market Panel Issues Call For Relaxing Rules (LAT)

By Jonathan Peterson, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, November 30, 2006

Post-Enron regulation has hurt competitiveness of U.S. firms, a business and academic study says.

WASHINGTON — Business lobbyists and their intellectual allies have begun a broad effort to lighten the regulatory burden of corporate America, warning that U.S. companies and the capital markets they rely on are losing the competitive battle to rivals overseas.

In the latest development, the private Committee on Capital Markets Regulation today plans to release an interim report contending that regulation, enforcement and litigation have become a weighty burden on the economy, and cite evidence that America's long-envied capital markets have lost some of their allure.

"The first conclusion is that we have a real competitiveness problem," said Hal S. Scott, a Harvard University law professor who directed the work of the panel.

The 22-member committee includes corporate chieftains and leading academics and was launched Sept. 12 with the backing of Treasury Secretary Henry M. Paulson Jr.

To make its case, the panel cites the rising prominence of private equity firms, which are increasingly buying publicly traded companies and taking them into private ownership.

The report also warns that the U.S. is losing its dominant role in initial public offerings. "As measured by value of IPOs, the U.S. share declined from 50% in 2000 to 5% in 2005," it says.

"Foreign companies are not coming here, and private companies are not going public as much as they did in the past," Scott said in an interview Wednesday. "Over time, if we don't deal with the problems, it's not just going to be foreign companies that don't want to come here but our own companies won't want to be traded here."

Such complaints aren't new, but some see a change in the nation's attitude toward big business that could give the panel's report greater currency.

Memories of fraud at Enron Corp., WorldCom Inc. and elsewhere are starting to fade, and the corporate investments held by millions of Americans through stocks, 401(k) plans and mutual funds are swelling thanks to a booming stock market.

Business leaders are also encouraged by signs that some Democrats are willing to consider working with Republicans to ease the regulatory burden.

"Right after Enron, the American business community felt they had to keep their mouths shut and not complain even when they saw poor regulation or poor management of capital markets issues," said David C. Chavern, chief legal officer of the U.S. Chamber of Commerce. "Now, people are saying just because some executives did bad things, that doesn't mean we should screw up our whole capital markets system because of it."

The new report calls on the Securities and Exchange Commission to place greater emphasis on analyzing the costs as well as the benefits of new rules. It will suggest that the SEC, the Justice Department and state regulators do a better job of coordinating their enforcement efforts so that companies aren't vulnerable to multiple attacks.

It also proposes easing of liability for independent corporate directors when companies get into trouble, and it will urge a change in the standards demanded for internal controls that were required by the Sarbanes-Oxley corporate reform law.

The controls, used by companies to guarantee the accuracy of their financial records, have been assailed as unduly, costly and burdensome by many firms.

The group emphasizes investor protections as a "bedrock principle" of the marketplace but nonetheless concludes that the intensity of regulation has become extreme. "The evidence suggests that the balance needs to be restored," said a summary of the report that was obtained Wednesday.

Other proposals to ease red-tape burdens also are in store. The U.S. Chamber of Commerce plans next year to release its own recommendations by a panel that is being co-chaired by William M. Daley, the Democratic Commerce secretary during the Clinton administration, and A.B. Culvahouse, chairman of the O'Melveny & Myers law firm.

More narrowly, the SEC is preparing to propose guidelines next month that some fear will ease the requirements for internal controls.

The combination of developments has become a concern for shareholder-rights activists who have applauded an array of post-Enron measures and until now have been able to rely on bipartisan congressional support to uphold them.

"I'm very worried," said Barbara Roper, director of investor protection for the Consumer Federation of America. "We have a huge fight on our hands. They are very well funded and very well organized," she said of business groups.

Democrats, who won control of the House and the Senate in the midterm elections, have been careful not to alarm big business interests that have traditionally favored Republicans.

On Wednesday, Rep. Charles B. Rangel (D-N.Y.), likely to be the next chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee, said he planned to hold a bipartisan retreat with Treasury Secretary Paulson to consider cooperative approaches on such matters as taxation and trade.

And Rep. Barney Frank (D-Mass.), soon to be chairman of the House Financial Services Committee, believes that regulators can exert their discretion in implementing the Sarbanes-Oxley rules to address business concerns without having to amend the law itself.

"In a nutshell, he believes there's enough flexibility in the law to reduce some of the costly burdens — especially to small business — before any legislative remedy is sought or even thought about," said Steve Adamske, a spokesman for Frank.

The Bush administration may be an ally of some of the business proposals. In a recent speech, Paulson alluded to the nation's "complex and confusing regulatory structure and enforcement environment." Furthermore, he noted that some of the post-Enron rules, although necessary, were being implemented in a way that might create unnecessary costs and new risks to the economy.

Paulson has been closely identified with the Committee on Capital Markets Regulation, with some even referring to it as the "Paulson group." But although Paulson hailed the creation of the committee at its launch, there is no formal connection. The Treasury Department plans its own conference early next year on the concerns related to U.S. capital markets and economic competitiveness.

"Treasury is not a member of the committee nor is it working in collaboration with this committee," said Jennifer Zuccarelli, a Treasury spokeswoman. "But the department is open to hearing new ideas from respected academics and industry leaders to encourage the strength of the capital markets and uphold investor protections."

In addition to Harvard's Scott, other members of the capital markets panel include R. Glenn Hubbard, who served as chairman of the White House Council of Economic Advisors earlier in the Bush administration; John L. Thornton, chairman of the Brookings Institution and former president of investment bank Goldman Sachs; and James Rothenberg, chairman of Los Angeles-based Capital Research & Management Co., the parent of American Funds.

Action Plan For Capital Markets (WSJ)

By R. Glenn Hubbard And John L. Thornton

Today, the Committee on Capital Markets Regulation will issue its first report on regulatory changes needed to maintain and improve the global competitive position of U.S. capital markets for investors. Our 135-page report offers numerous recommendations and suggestions for areas of further study -- principally for regulation, though, in some cases, for legislation. The theme is simple: To maintain and enhance the value of U.S. public markets, we must do a better job of assessing and evaluating the benefits and costs of our regulatory and legal system and strengthen the rights of shareholders.

Our 22-member committee's initial recommendations should be implemented: They represent the consensus of a diverse group of legal and finance scholars, CEOs, auditors, practicing corporate attorneys, institutional investors and investor advocates drawn from both political parties. Taken together, the proposed changes would enhance shareholder value by reducing the cost of capital, increasing expected firm cash flows, and reducing excessive risk aversion of corporate managers, auditors and directors. * * *

Public capital markets play a vital role in any modern economy. They offer the means for growing firms to finance investment. They allow investors' funds to flow to the most promising opportunities. And the risk-sharing, liquidity and information services provided by well functioning capital markets enhance the value of investors' assets and lower the cost of capital for firms. Legal and regulatory regimes that promote shareholder rights, accountability, disclosure and transparency are an important element in the success of capital markets and the economy as a whole.

In our column on this page late last month, we observed that U.S. capital markets are losing their competitiveness in global markets, to the detriment of investors. Our report concludes that regulatory and legal costs play a leading role in this adverse shift. And the debate over foreign listings in the U.S. is instructive.

Foreign firms still receive a benefit on average from listing in the U.S., according to evidence from economic research. But that benefit has declined in recent years. Since 2002, the average listing premium has declined 19 percentage points. Of particular interest is the variation across countries. It might be that extra regulation is harmful for firms from countries with poor corporate governance -- the cost of meeting the standards is difficult to bear by any measure. On the other hand, the new regulation might be beneficial, even for companies from countries with strong corporate governance -- but too costly relative to the benefits. In this case, the decline in listing premiums should be for firms in countries with good corporate governance (that is, who already have the benefit, but now must pay higher costs).

The report presents evidence to support the latter view. In concert with evidence on global IPOs and private equity transactions, this finding underscores the need to balance costs and benefits of regulation to maintain the global position of U.S. markets. Doing so requires examining all pieces of the puzzle to ensure that regulation enhances shareholder value by improving the incentives of corporate managers, auditors and directors while advancing shareholders' rights in the markets for corporate control.

Better implementation of Section 404 can lead to a capture of benefits at a lower cost. First, reform should start by revising the materiality standards in Auditing Standard No. 2 to ensure that reviews are truly risk-based and focus on significant control weaknesses, as the SEC and the PCAOB are now acknowledging. The SEC should define materiality quantitatively and consistently with the definition of materiality in financial reporting.

Second, the SEC and PCAOB should clarify and permit greater judgment as to the auditor's role in understanding and evaluating management's assessment process. Third, consistent with the objective of focusing control review on higher-risk components of financial processes, the SEC and the PCAOB should give guidance to management and auditors to allow multiyear cycling of testing where appropriate. Fourth, small companies (under $75 million market capitalization) should either be subject to the same (revised) Section 404 requirements as large companies, or Congress should consider reshaping Section 404 for small companies by eliminating auditor attestation while providing for a reasonable form of certification of internal controls by management. Finally, we would not apply Section 404 to non-U.S. companies subject to equivalent home-country requirements.

· The U.S. litigation and enforcement system requires reform. Our enforcement system has many virtues. A vigorous system that includes civil and criminal enforcement against individual wrongdoers, including CEOs, makes financial markets safer and more competitively attractive. We do conclude, however, that our private litigation system needs modification in several important ways, and the criminal enforcement system needs better balance.

First, for private enforcement, while claims under Rule 10b-5 account for the bulk of securities litigation, considerable uncertainty exists about many of the elements of 10b-5 liability as a result of conflicting court interpretations over the years. The size and frequency of damage settlements in securities class-action suits, moreover, sets the U.S. apart from other major financial centers and is an important factor in the declining competitive position of our securities markets. The SEC should provide more guidance, using a risk-based approach. This review should include materiality, scienter (knowledge of wrongdoing), and reliance.

Second, criminal enforcement against entire companies, reflecting the experience with the (now vacated) Arthur Andersen decision, should be truly a last resort, reserved for companies that have become criminal enterprises from top to bottom. In addition, the Justice Department's Thompson Memorandum makes the decision to prosecute a firm turn in part on whether the firm is willing to refuse to advance legal fees to employees who are being prosecuted and waive its attorney-client privilege. A district court has held these restrictions to be unconstitutional. The Justice Department should revise its prosecutorial guidelines to prohibit federal prosecutors from seeking waivers of attorney-client privilege or the denial of legal fees to employees, officers or directors.

· Shareholder rights should be strengthened. Matters of corporate control are part of the fundamental framework of shareholder rights. And a well functioning market for corporate control is crucial to an efficient and competitive capital market. The combination of a poison pill and a staggered board raises barriers to hostile bids, impairing the market for corporate control and investors' asset values. Classified boards should be required, as a matter of course, to obtain shareholder authorization prior to the adoption of a poison pill, unless the firm is the target of a takeover. In that case, the firm should be given no more than three months to obtain shareholder authorization.

Another element of shareholder rights is the need to allow shareholders to devise private alternatives to the present costly litigation system. Such procedures might include the waiver of jury trials (a waiver already commonly made in a variety of circumstances) or arbitration (with or without class actions). This choice should be afforded for IPOs as part of an initial public offering for new companies, provided it is done by shareholder vote after the IPO. Shareholders of companies that are already public should similarly be able to amend their charters and bylaws.

In addition, we applaud the increasing number of companies that have adopted majority voting requirements. Majority voting is a cornerstone of any effective system of shareholder rights, along with the right of shareholders to vote on poison pills and alternative remedies. In a related area, the SEC should resolve the confusion over the ability of shareholders to place their own director nominees on the company's proxy (confusion created by a recent decision of the Second Circuit Court of Appeals in AFSCME v. AIG).

Finally, the SEC's new executive-compensation disclosure requirements should be rigorously assessed before assessing any policy changes toward the market for executive talent.

· Excessive gatekeeper litigation is harmful to shareholders. Gatekeepers such as auditors and directors play critical roles in monitoring corporate management on behalf of shareholders. Significant increases in potential liability for these gatekeepers in recent years can induce risk aversion behavior not in shareholders' long-term interests and possibly reduce the supply of willing and competent professionals to perform these tasks.

Audit firms play the part of ensuring the integrity of financial statements and the effectiveness of internal controls of public companies. Remedies for excessive litigation here will require congressional action. Like so many of the issues touched on by our committee, this is a complex area. Nevertheless, we recommend that Congress explore alternatives to avoid catastrophic loss and its consequences. One approach would be to set a cap on auditor liability (an approach some European countries already pursue, and which Charlie McCreevy, Commissioner for Internal Markets, has recommended for the European Union). An alternative would be to create a safe harbor for certain defined auditing practices. Preventing economic damage awards against audit firms and their employees at a level that would destroy the firm would allow insurers to re-enter this market. Insurance would allow audit firms to conduct prudent oversight with a knowable risk and create an additional source of recovery for shareholders. To ensure that investors are protected against auditor misconduct, such legislation could provide that invocation of a cap or safe harbor by an audit firm would trigger an investigation by federal regulators, who, based on their findings, may impose appropriate sanctions on the firm.

Likewise, we should not hold outside directors responsible for corporate malfeasance they cannot possibly detect. In particular, the SEC should modify Rule 176 to make an outside director's good faith reliance on an audited financial statement or an auditor's comfort letter sufficient for meeting this standard of care.

· Effective regulation requires economic analysis. While there are existing mechanisms at the SEC for applying cost-benefit analysis to proposed rules and regulations, we believe more can be done in this regard to assure that regulations are achieving the intended effects of investor protection at a cost that is sensible in the context of individual firms, the markets at large, and the economy as a whole. The SEC and self-regulatory organizations need to engage in a more risk-based process, focused explicitly on the economic costs and benefits of regulation (as is the case for the FSA in the United Kingdom) for companies and investors, while strengthening shareholder protections. In weighing the costs and benefits of new rules, regulators should assess and rely on empirical evidence to the extent possible.

· A broader policy engagement is now required. Because the competitiveness and integrity of U.S. capital markets are central to overall national economic health and investors' well being, we recommend that the president direct his Working Group on Financial Markets to evaluate these key legal and regulatory issues and formalize a process of cost-benefit analysis for capital markets regulation. This opportunity -- affecting our nation's wealth and future growth -- is one that transcends politics. And it calls for action.

Appellate Panel Skeptical Of Grasso's Bid To Disqualify Judge From Compensation Case (LAW)

By Beth Bar, New York Law Journal

New York Law Journal, November 30, 2006

Appellate judges reacted with skepticism Wednesday to arguments that Manhattan Supreme Court Justice Charles E. Ramos should be disqualified from hearing a state lawsuit to force former New York Stock Exchange Chairman Richard A. Grasso to return much of his $187.5 million compensation package.

Attorneys for Grasso appeared Wednesday before a four-judge panel of New York's Appellate Division, 1st Department, to appeal Ramos' refusing to recuse himself from the case and saying he would decide the reasonableness of the compensation in a bench trial.

Among other things, Grasso's attorneys argued that Ramos should have recused himself because he promised to do so before engaging in settlement discussions during which he expressed strong opinions about the case.

Justices John T. Buckley, Angela M. Mazzarelli, David B. Saxe and James M. McGuire sat on the panel for the hour-long argument.

"You are asking us to say that anytime a judge conducts settlement talks he must recuse himself," Mazzarelli told Gerson A. Zweifach, a partner at Williams & Connolly who represents Grasso.

Saxe predicted that ruling in favor of Grasso could have a "chilling effect" on trial judges' efforts to engage in settlement discussions in future cases.

Zweifach has said that, before engaging in settlement talks on May 10, 2006, Ramos promised not to preside over any subsequent trial should Grasso later object to his involvement in the case.

In an affidavit, Mark Zauderer, a partner at Flemming Zulack Williamson Zauderer who also represents Grasso, has offered a slightly different account. He said Ramos promised to reassign the case "depending on 'how far things go' with the settlement discussions."

Ramos has verified Zauderer's depiction of the conversation, and Deputy Attorney General Avi Schick said Wednesday that Ramos indicated he would recuse himself if he became "heavily involved" in talks, but insisted that they never reached that point.

Schick, who said in court documents that the parties were engaged in "brief settlement discussions," has argued that requiring judges who engage in settlement talks to recuse themselves from a subsequent trial "is not the law in this State and would wreak havoc upon the judicial process."

Robert L. Michels, an attorney for the New York Stock Exchange, stressed Wednesday that judges are encouraged under the Civil Practice Law and Rules to conduct settlement discussions.

Grasso, who was sued by Attorney General Eliot Spitzer in May 2004 under New York's not-for-profit law, declined to comment after the hearing.

In addition to the recusal request, Grasso asked the court Wednesday to hold that a central issue in the dispute -- whether his pay package was reasonable -- must be heard by a jury instead of by Ramos.

Zweifach said Grasso was "promised by the Legislature the right to a jury trial," and, by holding a bench trial on the reasonableness of his compensation, Grasso is effectively being denied a right to a jury trial on other charges.

Schick, however, said the state is seeking restitution via a constructive trust instead of damages, and that under the law Grasso is therefore not automatically entitled to a jury trial.

In addition to the issues addressed Wednesday, the Appellate Division is considering several other appeals filed by Grasso, including a challenge to Ramos' decision last month ordering Grasso to pay back what could be as much as $100 million to his former employer.

CRIMINAL LAW:

7M In U.S. Jails, On Probation Or Parole (AP)

By Kasie Hunt, Associated Press Writer

DOJ_NMG_0100074

WASHINGTON — A record 7 million people - or one in every 32 American adults - were behind bars, on probation or on parole by the end of last year, according to the Justice Department. Of those, 2.2 million were in prison or jail, an increase of 2.7 percent over the previous year, according to a report released Wednesday.

More than 4.1 million people were on probation and 784,208 were on parole at the end of 2005. Prison releases are increasing, but admissions are increasing more.

Men still far outnumber women in prisons and jails, but the female population is growing faster. Over the past year, the female population in state or federal prison increased 2.6 percent while the number of male inmates rose 1.9 percent. By year's end, 7 percent of all inmates were women. The gender figures do not include inmates in local jails.

"Today's figures fail to capture incarceration's impact on the thousands of children left behind by mothers in prison," Marc Mauer, the executive director of the Sentencing Project, a Washington-based group supporting criminal justice reform, said in a statement. "Misguided policies that create harsher sentences for nonviolent drug offenses are disproportionately responsible for the increasing rates of women in prisons and jails."

From 1995 to 2003, inmates in federal prison for drug offenses have accounted for 49 percent of total prison population growth.

The numbers are from the annual report from the Justice Department's Bureau of Justice Statistics. The report breaks down inmate populations for state and federal prisons and local jails.

Racial disparities among prisoners persist. In the 25-29 age group, 8.1 percent of black men - about one in 13 - are incarcerated, compared with 2.6 percent of Hispanic men and 1.1 percent of white men. And it's not much different among women. By the end of 2005, black women were more than twice as likely as Hispanics and over three times as likely as white women to be in prison.

Certain states saw more significant changes in prison population. In South Dakota, the number of inmates increased 11 percent over the past year, more than any other state. Montana and Kentucky were next in line with increases of 10.4 percent and 7.9 percent, respectively. Georgia had the biggest decrease, losing 4.6 percent, followed by Maryland with a 2.4 percent decrease and Louisiana with a 2.3 percent drop.

Death Penalty Weighed In Beach Kidnapping, Murder (V-P)

By Tim Mcglone, The Virginian-Pilot

Virginian-Pilot, November 30, 2006

NORFOLK — The Justice Department is considering pursuing the death penalty against Tanya Y. Torrence, the 35-year-old woman charged with the kidnapping and murder of her estranged boyfriend's mother this summer.

Torrence was arraigned Wednesday in U.S. District Court on a four-count indictment that could carry a death sentence if convicted. Led to the magistrate court's podium in shackles, Torrence pleaded not guilty to the charges.

The indictment charges Torrence with murder, kidnapping, interstate kidnapping resulting in death and use of a firearm. Magistrate James E. Bradberry set a trial date of March 13.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Laura P. Tayman told the judge that she expects a decision from Washington by Jan. 23 on whether to seek the death penalty.

Torrence is accused of kidnapping 72-year-old Mary Knight from her Virginia Beach home July 1 and driving north in Knight's minivan. Along the way, Torrence shot Knight twice, killing her, according to the indictment and other court filings.

She continued driving, ending up in Philadelphia where she exchanged the handgun for crack cocaine, according to the court records. She turned herself in to police there and Knight's body was found in the minivan.

The indictment says Torrence committed the crimes "to punish her estranged boyfriend." In a confession to authorities after her arrest in Philadelphia, Torrence said the shooting was an accident.

Torrence remains jailed without bond.

The court records indicate that Torrence suffers from mental health issues, has attempted suicide in the recent past and was a daily crack cocaine user for the four months prior to her arrest.

Court Says Former Governor Of US State Illinois Can Avoid Jail While He Appeals Conviction (FINDLAW/AP)

By Mike Robinson, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 30, 2006

(AP) - CHICAGO-Former Governor George Ryan can remain free while he appeals his conviction in the corruption scandal that ruined his political career, a federal appeals court has ruled.

DOJ_NMG_0100075

The decision by the 7th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals was issued without explanation Tuesday, but the court said if it upholds Ryan's conviction, he must go to prison immediately.

Ryan, 72, was sentenced in September to 6 1/2 years in federal prison for racketeering and fraud involving corruption when he was secretary of state in the 1990s and later governor.

U.S. District Judge Rebecca L. Pallmeyer had refused to grant bail to Ryan. But the appeals court overruled her and said Ryan may remain free while appealing his conviction. He had been due to report to prison Jan. 4.

Federal prosecutors opposed bail for Ryan, saying it was unlikely his conviction would be overturned. But Ryan's attorneys argued that jury deliberations in the case were flawed and that Ryan should be granted a new trial.

Ryan was convicted in April of steering lucrative state contracts and leases to lobbyists and friends; using state employees and tax dollars to operate his political campaigns; and sabotaging an investigation of driver's license bribery.

A spokesman for the U.S. attorney's office, Randall Samborn, said Wednesday the government had no comment on the appeals court's decision.

Also Wednesday, the state stripped Ryan of his $197,000 (â‚¬150,000) annual pension, ruling that his conviction wiped out all benefits from his 35-year career in public office.

Nonprofits Subjects Of Federal Probe Got $2.5 Million From State (AP)

By Melinda Deslatte, The Associated Press

AP, November 30, 2006

BATON ROUGE, La. (AP) — At least $2.5 million in state money was steered by New Orleans lawmakers over a 10-year period to two nonprofit agencies with family ties to U.S. Rep. William Jefferson, according to documents released by the governor's office.

The documents from the defunct Gov.'s Office of Urban Affairs show at least $1 million was given to Care Unlimited Inc. and another $1.5 million to Orleans Metropolitan Housing and Community Development Inc. The documents were subpoenaed by the Federal Bureau of Investigation and provided to The Associated Press this week by the governor's office in response to a public records request.

The FBI has declined to say what information it is seeking in the documents. But Jefferson — a New Orleans Democrat embroiled in a campaign for re-election to a ninth term — is the subject of a federal bribery probe. Jefferson has not been charged with a crime and has denied wrongdoing, but a businessman and a former Jefferson aide have pleaded guilty in the case.

The FBI documents covering allocations from January 1996 to the present, involving five nonprofit agencies, four of which had documented ties to the Jefferson family. Marie Centanni, Blanco's press secretary, said only Care Unlimited and Orleans Metropolitan Housing received funding through the Office of Urban Affairs.

The earmarks for Care Unlimited and Orleans Metropolitan Housing were added by lawmakers connected to Jefferson: his daughter, Rep. Jalila Jefferson-Bullock, and former Rep. Renee Gill Pratt, a former legislative aide to the congressman and former New Orleans City councilwoman who was hired by Care Unlimited when she lost her re-election bid. Also listed as sponsor of the add-ons in some instances was Sen. Diana Bajoie, D-New Orleans.

The nonprofit agencies themselves were tied to the congressman. One of Jefferson's brothers is chairman of the board of directors for Orleans Metropolitan Housing, and Care Unlimited was founded by another Jefferson brother.

The Office of Urban Affairs supervised grants to nonprofits in black lawmakers' districts before it was disbanded this year by Blanco. A similar office for rural nonprofit agencies also was disbanded. Both were criticized as slush funds used by the governor's office to steer dollars to lawmakers' pet projects in response to favorable votes.

Care Unlimited and Orleans Metropolitan Housing are among hundreds of pet causes added into spending bills over the years by legislators through the regular budget construction process.

But the documents given to the FBI show state funding appeared to be the only sources of income in some years for Care Unlimited and Orleans Metropolitan Housing.

The money paid for salaries and benefits, accounting services, insurance, telephone service, utilities and supplies. In the 2003-04 budget year, Orleans Metropolitan Housing paid for the company picnic with state cash, and a year earlier, state money paid for building renovations.

Care Unlimited sponsored several programs that received money through the state budget process, according to the financial documents.

The programs were described as education initiatives for pregnant teens, tutoring, career workshops for high schoolers, assistance with scholarship services and a pilot project to focus on the "broad problems of black males" to coordinate family, health, education and counseling services through local churches, schools and community agencies.

Orleans Metropolitan Housing and Community Development was described in documents as a nonprofit that helped rehabilitate and improve housing for low- and moderate-income residents, conducting carbon monoxide testing and energy conservation education.

The phone number listed in the New Orleans phone book and on financial documents for Orleans Metropolitan Housing was disconnected. Phone numbers listed for Care Unlimited also were disconnected. Calls to the legislative district offices of Bajoie and Jefferson-Bullock weren't immediately returned Wednesday.

In July, Blanco eliminated $450,000 in the state budget that would have gone to the two nonprofits in the current 2006-07 fiscal year.

Justice Dept. Decision Not To Probe Lawmaker Raises Key Question (SCRIPPS)

By Lisa Mascaro

Scripps Howard, November 30, 2006

The Justice Department's decision not to investigate allegations that Rep. Jon Porter, R-Nev., made illegal campaign fund-raising calls from his office raises a question central to ethics reform in the new Congress: What if there's a law on the books and no one enforces it?

Experts say they know of no congressman ever being prosecuted under the law banning them from soliciting cash from their offices, a violation punishable by fines and imprisonment.

Justice Department officials have "bigger fish to fry," as one veteran Washington election-law attorney put it - pointing to the bribery of now-imprisoned former Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham, R-Calif., and the $90,000 allegedly found in the freezer of re-elected Rep. William Jefferson, D-La.

But ethics-reform groups say the failure to investigate less sensational allegations feeds into a culture of corruption in Washington, which Democrats have vowed to clean up in January as the party in control of Congress.

"There are a lot of rules, that have been in place for reasons, that have been ignored," said Mary Boyle, a spokeswoman for Common Cause, a political watchdog group.

In the weeks before the Nov. 7 election, a former Porter staff member claimed that the congressman made fund-raising calls from his offices in Washington and Henderson, Nev. E-mails obtained by the Las Vegas Sun showed conversations, apparently dealing with the phone calls, between the aide and other members of Porter's staff and campaign.

Porter has steadfastly denied having made the calls.

"Congressman Porter has stated, repeatedly, that he has done nothing wrong and welcomes any investigation," his spokesman, Trevor Kolego, said in a statement Tuesday.

The former Porter aide, Jim Shepard, said last week that he would try to have the matter heard by the House ethics committee, which has jurisdiction over representatives' behavior.

Kolego said Tuesday that Porter has not been contacted by the committee.

The panel does not comment on its work. But experts said they doubt that it will take up the matter, arguing that it has become "toothless" in recent years.

Gerry Hebert, executive director of Campaign Legal Center, an ethics-reform organization, said an "unholy alliance" has developed on the panel: Republican members don't go after Democrats and, in return, Democrats don't go after Republicans.

The truce dates from the late 1990s, after the committee investigated former Republican House Speaker Newt Gingrich, who ultimately resigned.

Last year the Republican leadership sent a "chilling" message, Boyle said, when it replaced committee members who investigated former House GOP leader Tom DeLay of Texas, who stepped down from his leadership post and later resigned from Congress.

Because only the committee or a member of Congress can request an investigation, outsiders have little recourse under the current climate, experts said.

Hebert's organization and others are pushing Democrats to create an independent Office of Public Integrity to investigate matters involving members of Congress.

"That's why the voters voted for reform," said Hebert, a former federal prosecutor. "It's because they see the system as being broken. Here's a chance to fix it. Matters like this will be investigated and will be dealt with."

But longtime election-law expert Jan Witold Baran calls such reforms "overkill."

He said members of Congress are well aware of the laws banning them from using their offices for campaign calls, which is why both Republicans and Democrats have so-called call rooms set up just steps from the U.S. Capitol.

For investigators who need to decide where to put limited resources, dialing for dollars from campaign offices hardly compares to the pay-to-play scandals that have rocked Capitol Hill.

"It's not a big deal," Baran said of the Porter case. "One, he denied it. Two, making a few phone calls from a House office is not a capital crime. You've got a congressman with $90,000 in his freezer ... You've got bigger fish to fry."

Besides, "there's always a jury every two years to evaluate what someone does - that's the voters," he added.

Police Probe Has Methuen On Edge (BOS)

By Christine Mcconville, Globe Staff

The Boston Globe, November 30, 2006

Feds mum on trace of grant spending

The federal investigation into the Methuen Police Department's use of grant money is causing a lot of anguish in the city, officials say.

"It's like a cloud hanging over the city," said City Councilor Kathleen Corey Rahme. "It's really wearing on the minds and hearts of our citizens."

In shops and in city offices, everyone, it seems, has questions about who is involved and what is being investigated. There are questions, too, about how and when it will all end.

At City Hall, Mayor William Manzi III said the focus has to remain on regular city business. "Yes, the rumor mill is active, but it is incumbent on us to do our jobs," he said. "The taxpayers don't deserve any less."

According to some councilors, that's getting harder and harder to do. "It's become a circus," Councilor Deborah Quinn said of the swirling speculation, "and the morale in the Police Department is really low."

The investigation caught the public's attention this past summer, when agents from the Federal Bureau of Investigation arrived at City Hall with subpoenas. They left with records showing how the city had spent federal grant money in recent years.

City officials confirmed that a federal grand jury subpoenaed records for all federal grants given to police since 2001.

For their part, federal agencies have had nothing to say about their probe. Gail Marcinkiewicz, spokeswoman for the FBI, and Samantha Martin, spokeswoman for US Attorney Michael J. Sullivan, declined to comment.

The story heated up a couple of weeks ago when Methuen Police Chief Joseph E. Solomon launched an internal investigation to try to identify officers who are talking to the FBI or gossiping about possible indictments, according to a lawyer for the police union.

The union's lawyer called it "abuse of power."

Solomon did not return phone calls seeking comment for this article. But he issued a statement last week saying, "in no way would this department or myself interfere with any outside agencies ' investigation."

Last week, City Councilor John A. Cronin Jr. called a special meeting to discuss the legality of Solomon's investigation.

"With everything that is going on, he might not be effective as a chief anymore," Cronin told the Globe a week ago.

If Solomon has been asking officers in his department if they are talking to federal agents, "it is very, very wrong, and probably illegal," he said.

A few days later, the meeting was canceled. The city's lawyer said it was a union dispute that ought to be addressed through the grievance process.

In the meantime, some councilor questioned Cronin's motives, because his son Shaun resigned from the force in January 2004, after 17 years on the job. He sued the department soon afterward, alleging that Solomon prevented him from getting another job by criticizing him to prospective employers. The dispute is unresolved.

Quinn, who called herself "defiantly pro-blue," said Cronin's actions appear to her as a "personal vendetta." It's a charge that the elder Cronin denies.

Howard B. Lenow, the police union lawyer, said he has advised the officers not to speak about any ongoing investigations. Still, he added, "any time a chief engages in what we view as a frivolous investigation, it hurts morale."

For now, residents are just hoping for a quick resolution.

AP, November 30, 2006

CHICAGO - Chicago police officials are aware of corruption and misconduct in the department but aren't doing enough to stop it, according to a report from an expert on internal police affairs.

Lou Reiter, a former deputy chief of the Los Angeles Police Department, said Chicago officials have perpetuated "a practice of indifference" to corruption that "makes officers who engage in misconduct feel protected."

Reiter, who has advised about 1,000 police departments, completed his report this summer for two Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms agents who are suing the city of Chicago in federal court, the Chicago Tribune reported Wednesday.

Chicago police officials contend Reiter's criticism is based on limited knowledge of the department, and doesn't consider current policy reforms aimed at blocking corruption and abuse before it becomes a problem.

Pressure on the department to deal with corruption allegations has intensified in recent months. In July, two special prosecutors released a report claiming that officers under former Chicago Police Lt. Jon Burge tortured suspects in the 1980s.

And in September, four members of the Special Operations Section were charged with robbery, kidnapping and false arrests.

The ATF agents suing the city are a husband and wife who say their careers and credibility were attacked when they tried to blow the whistle on convicted former police officer Joseph Miedzianowski.

But instead of investigating Miedzianowski, internal affairs officials targeted them, the agents claim. It took years before the FBI was able to indict Miedzianowski on drug charges; he is serving a life prison term.

As part of the couple's lawsuit, former assistant U.S. attorney Brian Netols also testified that when he tried to prosecute 18 cases of alleged police corruption, he was met with a "blue wall of silence" - officers who resisted helping with investigations of each other.

Chicago police officials acknowledge there have been problems in the past but said they are intensifying efforts to root out corruption before it starts.

"Most large law enforcement agencies are struggling to identify poor performance issues," said Assistant Deputy Supt. Deb Kirby, head of the department's Internal Affairs Division. "Most are doing it under mandates with the federal government. The Chicago Police Department is doing this on their own."

Former South Gate Treasurer Sentenced To 10 Years In Bribery Case (MERCN)

The San Jose Mercury News, November 30, 2006

LOS ANGELES - The former treasurer of the city of South Gate was sentenced Tuesday to 10 years in federal prison for extracting nearly $2 million in bribes from contractors and sharing the money with family and friends.

Albert Robles, 41, was taken into custody immediately after his sentencing. He was also ordered by U.S. District Judge Stephen V. Wilson to pay back more than $600,000 to the city in southeast Los Angeles County.

Robles was convicted in July 2005 of five counts of bribery, four counts of money laundering and 21 counts of defrauding citizens of South Gate.

Prosecutors depicted the city as a corrupt fiefdom in which Robles solicited bribes from contractors and was able to hire and fire city employees at will. The illicit money paid for everything from a seaside condo for his mother to an exclusive membership in the group operated by motivational guru Tony Robbins, authorities said.

In a rambling statement in court, Robles suggested he was guilty of arrogance and pomposity but not criminal acts.

"My activities were not illegal," he said at one point.

Prosecutors have estimated the corruption cost the city as much as $20 million.

"He turned it into a pay-to-play town," Assistant U.S. Attorney David Vaughn said outside court, alluding to a scheme in which contractors were forced to pay bribes for city business.

Much of the evidence against Robles came from a New Jersey financial consultant who offered testimony in hopes of receiving a more lenient sentence. He told jurors he frequently distributed kickbacks in the form of checks to family and friends of Robles.

Last year Robbins agreed to refund $45,000 in taxpayer money - most of what Robles spent on the membership to his organization.

Ex-Fugitive Admits Slaying Trooper And Wounding Two (NYT)

By David Staba

The New York Times, November 30, 2006

MAYVILLE, N.Y., Nov. 29 — Ralph Phillips, the police say, spent most of the spring and summer roaming along the New York-Pennsylvania line after escaping from a jail outside Buffalo in April, venturing as far as Ohio to the west and the Canadian border to the north to evade a sweeping manhunt.

On Wednesday, within five hours in courtrooms 150 miles apart, the fugitive, who became nationally known simply by his nickname, Bucky, admitted in guilty pleas to killing one New York state trooper and wounding two others during his flight.

As part of a plea agreement that prosecutors said will keep Mr. Phillips in prison for life, he admitted shooting Troopers Joseph A. Longobardo and Donald Baker Jr. with a high-powered rifle in a wooded area outside his former companion's home in rural Chautauqua County on Aug. 31. One bullet severed an artery in Trooper Longobardo's thigh; he died on Sept. 3. Trooper Baker left the hospital last week.

After his capture, Mr. Phillips told the police that he mistook the men, who were wearing camouflaged clothes, for bounty hunters and intended to wound them, prosecutors said. In Chautauqua County, though, he did not qualify his actions. When Justice Richard C. Kloch of State Supreme Court asked a shackled Mr. Phillips if he knew the rifle's .308-caliber ammunition would most likely cause a fatal wound, he responded: "Indeed I did."

Earlier in the day, in Chemung County, Mr. Phillips also admitted to shooting Trooper Sean M. Brown with a .38 revolver during a traffic stop outside Elmira on June 10. He walked into the Chemung County Courthouse in Elmira for his morning hearing wearing a black jumpsuit unbuttoned midway down his chest, and greeted members of the news media gathered outside with a smile, saying, "Have a good day."

Mr. Phillips, 44, appeared by turns uninterested and defiant, pleading "very guilty" to possession of the stolen vehicle he was driving when approached by Trooper Brown. When Justice Peter C. Buckley asked him if any promises had been made for his admissions, Mr. Phillips said, "Oh, no, absolutely not."

When asked if he knew Trooper Brown was a police officer when he pulled over before the shooting, Mr. Phillips said, "I didn't see he was a trooper because he was tailgating me — I pulled off because I thought it was a drunk tailgating me."

"That's just him," his sister, Mitty Cornelius, said of her brother's courtroom demeanor, which seemed at times at odds with the seriousness of the charges. "That's his sense of humor, and a way to get a little jab in, probably."

But Trooper Brown's commander, Maj. Steven White of the state police, said, "He showed absolutely no remorse, like it was comical," adding, "I really don't think he cares at all about the pain he's caused to so many people."

Other than mugging with mock surprise when he entered the crowded courtroom, Mr. Phillips sounded more contrite during his Chautauqua County appearance. He had changed into a horizontally striped, two-tone gray jumpsuit.

The summer-long search for Mr. Phillips brought roadblocks and shortened tempers to the small towns of Chautauqua County, where he was raised and the search primarily centered.

As Mr. Phillips remained at large and was blamed for a series of automobile thefts and break-ins, most at hunting cabins and seasonal homes, he became something of a folk hero to some, with T-shirts bearing slogans like "Run, Bucky, Run" and "Where's Bucky?" sold at local stores and on the Internet.

Most sympathy evaporated after the shootings of Troopers Longobardo and Baker. He went on the F.B.I.'s 10 Most Wanted List, and rewards totaling $425,000 were offered for information leading to his capture.

He surrendered in a field just across the state line in Pennsylvania at sundown on Sept. 8.

The Chemung County district attorney, John R. Trice, said Mr. Phillips's lawyer, Richard W. Rich Jr., approached him with the idea of resolving the entire case. He still faces escape charges, to which he is expected to admit at a Thursday morning hearing in Buffalo, as well as possible federal weapons counts stemming from the theft of 41 guns, including the rifle used to shoot troopers Longobardo and Baker.

The most serious of the charges, aggravated murder, carries a sentence of life in prison without the possibility of parole. Mrs. Cornelius said he admitted to shooting the troopers so that the charges against his former companion, Kasey Crowe, who is charged with hindering prosecution, and their daughter, Patrina Gloss, who is accused of endangering the welfare of Mr. Phillips' grandchild, would be dropped.

"He doesn't want to see his daughter lose her child — he's not happy with what he has to do, but he's doing it for them," said Mrs. Cornelius, who accused Mrs. Crowe and Ms. Gloss of pressuring Mr. Phillips into agreeing to the deal. "I can't believe they're letting him hang like this."

Mrs. Crowe and Ms. Gloss left court without comment.

The Chautauqua County district attorney, David W. Foley, said details of the plea agreement would not be made public until after Mr. Phillips's sentencing, scheduled for December.

Ralph 'Bucky' Phillips Pleads Guilty To Murder (ALBANYTU)

By Kate Perry And Dennis Yusko, Staff Writers

Albany Times Union, November 30, 2006

Former fugitive admits killing Joseph Longobardo in second court hearing, guaranteeing life sentence

MAYVILLE -- Ralph ``Bucky'' Phillips pleaded guilty this afternoon to murdering a state trooper and attempting to murder another in August, guaranteeing he will spend the rest of his life in prison without the possibility of parole. Earlier in the day, he admitted shooting a third trooper in June.

On Aug. 31, Phillips, 44, shot and wounded Trooper Joseph Longobardo, 32, of Greenfield, who later died of his injuries, and Trooper Donald Baker Jr., 38, of Halfmoon, who was severely wounded.

Phillips had not previously been charged with shooting Longobardo and Baker.

His appearance in State Supreme Court in Chautauqua County drew many of his family members, but was noticeably more staid than his earlier hearing at another court three hours east of here.

In Chemung County Court in Elmira this morning, an impatient Phillips pleaded guilty to shooting and wounding Trooper Sean Brown on June 10 at a traffic stop near Elmira during his months-long run from the law.

As the charges were read this morning, Phillips alternately rolled his eyes, grinned, stared vacantly and looked out the window. He admitted to stealing a car and shooting the trooper with a gun he had loaded himself.

At times, Phillips sarcastically answered Chemung County Court Judge Peter C. Buckley's questions about his actions, often replying ``Indeed, I did."

When asked if the gun he used to shoot Brown was loaded, he answered, ``Very."

Phillips said on the day of the shooting, he thought a drunk was tailgating him on a Chemung County road. It was not until the car's flashing lights were turned on that Phillips realized it was a trooper.

He said he was aware Brown was a trooper when he shot him.

Brown was not in court this morning. However, at least 22 uniformed officers, including state troopers and Chemung County Sheriff's deputies as well as police in civilian clothes, provided security or attended the proceeding.

A mother and daughter from Buffalo, Wendy and Katie Gambles, arrived outside the courthouse in a Jeep with ``We love Buck Phillips" written on the windows.

Inside the courtroom after the proceedings, the women blew him kisses, and he smiled and waved to them as he left, saying something inaudible.

Back outside, the women, who described themselves as lifelong family friends of Phillips, screamed his name and he said ``I love you."

His only words to reporters were to have a nice day.

Phillips pleaded guilty to attempted aggravated murder, second-degree attempted murder charges, criminal possession of a weapon -- a .38-caliber revolver -- and criminal possession of stolen property -- a 1995 Ford Mustang.

Chemung County District Attorney John R. Trice did not comment during the proceedings nor would he elaborate on the plea deal afterward.

He told reporters he was not disappointed the case will not go to trial. He said Phillips' attorney, Richard Rich Jr., approached the DA's office with the deal.

``I talked to Trooper Brown and I believe he's satisfied because (Phillips) pleaded guilty to exactly what he did on that day," Trice said.

The judge set sentencing for Dec. 20 in Chemung County.

State Police long suspected Phillips, who escaped from an Erie County jail in April and eluded authorities for six months, ambushed Longobardo and Baker as they closed in on Phillips at the home of his ex-girlfriend in Pomfret, Chautauqua County.

In April, Phillips cut his way out of an Erie County jail in Alden with a can opener and spent months as a fugitive running from police in western New York and northern Pennsylvania.

Phillips also is suspected of stealing 41 weapons from a Chautauqua County gun shop in August.

At this afternoon's appearance before state Supreme Court Justice Richard Kloch Sr., Phillips pleaded guilty to both aggravated murder and attempted aggravated murder.

Baker and Longobardo had been sent to western New York with the State Police's Mobile Response Unit to find Phillips.

Baker returned home last week after spending months in hospitals in Pennsylvania and Albany.

The Buffalo News, citing anonymous sources, said Phillips is expected to plead guilty in Buffalo on Thursday to the jail escape and is discussing a possible federal guilty plea in the gun theft case.

Phillips became one of the FBI's 10 Most Wanted fugitives and was caught Sept. 8 in a wooded field in Pennsylvania just south of the state line, bringing to an end one of the biggest police manhunts in state history.

Since shortly after his capture, he has been held in the Chemung County Jail in Elmira.

Ex-fugitive Admits Shooting NY Troopers (HC/AP)

By Carolyn Thompson And Ben Dobbin Associated Press Writers, The Associated Press

Houston Chronicle, November 30, 2006

MAYVILLE, N.Y. — An escaped convict who vowed never to be taken alive before he was captured in the biggest manhunt in New York history swaggered into court Wednesday and pleaded guilty to murdering one state trooper and wounding two others.

Asked by a judge if he knew the rifle he used was capable of killing, 44-year-old career criminal Ralph "Bucky" Phillips said: "Indeed I did."

Phillips broke out of a Buffalo-area jail in April by using an industrial can opener to cut a hole in kitchen ceiling, then became something of a folk hero as he led police along a trail of stolen cars, burglaries, sightings and shootings.

He pleaded guilty to murder for killing Joseph Longobardo and attempted murder for wounding Donald Baker Jr. as the troopers staked out his ex-girlfriend's home while searching for him Aug. 31. Longobardo's leg had to be amputated, and he died three days later.

Phillips also pleaded guilty to the attempted murder of Sean Brown, who was shot during a traffic stop near Elmira on June 10.

He is expected to get life in prison without parole when he is sentenced Dec. 20.

Phillips entered his pleas in back-to-back court appearances in Elmira and then Mayville.

He appeared upbeat as he entered the courtroom in Mayville, waving to relatives and mugging for the cameras.

"We love you Bucky!" supporters shouted when he arrived at court. "I love you, too!" he shouted back.

Mitty Cornelius, Phillips' sister, said she was not surprised by his bravado: "That's him. That's his sense of humor and a way to get a little jab in, probably."

"It was very disturbing to me to watch his mannerisms," State Police Maj. Steven White said. "My perception is that he was indifferent, demonstrated no remorse whatsoever and almost couldn't be bothered with today's proceedings."

Authorities finally closed in on Phillips near the New York-Pennsylvania line Sept. 8. He emerged from a field with his hands up, clearly worn down by the long chase.

Phillips also is expected to plead guilty on Thursday to escape.

Man Arrested For Allegedly Wearing Unearned Medal (MARINECT)

By John Hoellwarth, Staff writer

Marine Corps Times, November 30, 2006

A member of the Marine Corps League in St. Louis was arrested by FBI agents Tuesday evening after being photographed allegedly wearing a Navy Cross medal he doesn't rate at the league's Marine Corps ball earlier this month, according to a Fox News report.

Michael Weilbacher wore a Navy Cross, two Silver Stars and four Bronze Stars to the ball, where he told Marines he had earned the nation's second-highest valor award during drug interdictions in Colombia, according to Maj. George Dragan, the Corps' Marine for Life representative in St. Louis, who attended the ball.

This raised a red flag with Doug Sterner, who maintains a comprehensive database of every Navy Cross awarded. Sterner said that no Navy Cross has ever been awarded for actions in Colombia.

Personnel records at Marine Corps headquarters' Manpower branch show no record of Weilbacher ever serving in the Corps.

Manpower spokesman 1st Lt. Rob Dolan said, "I have more time standing on the yellow footprints than he does in the Marine Corps."

Under current law, Weilbacher faces a maximum of six months in jail and $5,000 in fines in connection with the misdemeanor charge of wearing unearned military decorations.

Legislation in the House would put more teeth into the law, making the crime a felony and doubling the maximum penalty. A version of the Stolen Valor Act was passed unanimously by the Senate in September but has been bottled up in the House Judiciary Committee, despite having attracted more than 100 co-sponsors, including five Judiciary Committee members.

Weilbacher would be unaffected by any change in the law.

After learning of Weilbacher's arrest, his congressman, Rep. Roy Blunt, R-Mo., said he would consider co-sponsoring the legislation after the next congressional session begins in January, according to Blunt's spokeswoman, Jessica Boulanger.

Kirkwood Man Charged With Impersonating A Marine (SLPD)

By Robert Patrick, ST. LOUIS POST-DISPATCH

St. Louis Post-Dispatch, November 30, 2006

The FBI has arrested a Kirkwood man accused of impersonating a U.S. Marine and wearing a Navy Cross and other medals he did not earn.

Michael Gerald Weilbacher, 48, of the 200 block of Horseshoe Drive was arrested by FBI agents last night, the U.S. Attorney's office said today.

In an affidavit filed in federal court, FBI Special Agent Mark Wood said that Weilbacher attended a Marine Corps Ball in St. Louis County on Nov. 11 wearing a number of medals, including the Navy Cross.

After a complaint, Wood investigated and said he discovered that Weilbacher had never been in the Marines and did not earn the medals.

Weilbacher, who is employed as a consultant, has been charged with wearing military medals without authorization, a crime punishable by 6 months in prison or a fine of $50,000, or both.

He was released on $1,000 bond today.

"Anyone who impersonates military servicemen does a dishonor to those who have made real sacrifices serving our country," U.S. Attorney Catherine Hanaway said in a prepared statement.

Tampa Men Convicted As Members Of Gambino Crime Family (WTSP)

WTSP-TV, November 30, 2006

Tampa, Florida - A federal jury in Tampa has found four men guilty of various crimes related to the Gambino Mafia family.

Ronald J. Trucchio (Ronnie One-Arm), Steven Catalano, Kevin M. McMahon, and Terry L. Scaglione were found guilty of conspiracy to violate the Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations ("RICO") statute.

The jury also found Scaglione guilty of one count of extortion. Trucchio and Catalano each face a maximum sentence of life imprisonment. McMahon and Scaglione each face a maximum sentence of twenty years' imprisonment.

Trucchio, Catalano, and McMahon are now in the custody of the U.S. Marshals Service. Scaglione remains free on bond pending his sentencing hearing.

Sentencing hearings for all four defendants have been set for March 2, 2007.

The US Attorney's Office says during the last 20 years, Catalano, McMahon, Scaglione, Trucchio were under the control of the Gambino Organized Crime Family of La Cosa Nostra in Tampa. The Gambino Crime Family is one "family" in a nationwide criminal organization commonly referred to as "La Cosa Nostra," or the "Mafia."

Federal officials say Trucchio was a captain in Family and he supervised the wide-ranging criminal activities of the crew. The crew's principal purpose was to generate money for its members and associates through the commission of various criminal acts.

The jury felt Trucchio supervised the crew that engaged in multiple acts and threats involving murder, robbery, extortion, dealing in controlled substances, interference with commerce by threats and violence, interstate travel in aid of racketeering enterprises, making extortionate extensions of credit, collection of extensions of credit by extortionate means, and interstate transportation of stolen property.

The Pinellas Resident Agency of the Tampa Field Office of the FBI, the Miami and Brooklyn-Queens Metropolitan FBI offices, the Pinellas County Sheriff's Office, the Tampa Police Department, the New York City Police Department, the Queens County District Attorney's Office, the FBI Legal Attache to Brazil, the Brazilian federal police, and Interpol coordinated this investigation.

Persistent Jury Convicts 4 Of Racketeering Charges (TAMPTRIB)

By Elaine Silvestrini

Tampa Tribune, November 30, 2006

TAMPA - Ronnie One Arm came close to talking his way out of another conviction, but not close enough.

After deadlocking on whether to convict Ronald Trucchio, jurors tried again and Wednesday afternoon announced they had reached a decision:

Guilty verdicts for Trucchio and his three co-defendants, Steven Catalano, Terry Scaglione and Kevin McMahon, on charges they worked as a crew for the Gambino crime family.

Carl Whitehead, special agent in charge of the Tampa FBI, called Wednesday's verdicts "a big blow to organized crime in the Tampa area and to the Gambino family operated out of New York."

The verdicts were announced as authorities in Port St. Lucie investigated an arson fire at Catalano's home late Tuesday night. No one was injured, although Catalano's wife and four of his seven children were home at the time, officials said. Authorities said they don't know whether La Cosa Nostra was involved.

The defendants showed no reaction to the verdicts.

Asked if he wanted to talk to reporters, Scaglione said, "No, thank you," as he walked out of the courtroom, the only one of the four defendants to remain free on bail after the convictions.

Afterward, Trucchio's attorney, Joseph Corozzo Jr., had a statement for reporters: "It's unfortunate that the jurors who think my client was not guilty didn't stand strong, and that they were pressured into a verdict, because my client's not guilty of the charges."

Corozzo missed the start of the trial because he was tied up in another case. Trucchio represented himself for a few days, rather than depend on a backup attorney, who Trucchio said didn't know the case. 'I Don't Deserve To Be Here'

In one of the trial's more colorful moments, Trucchio gave an opening statement including words such as "youse." He told jurors he didn't benefit financially from any of the crimes in the case. "Not one red cent did I get, and I swear that on my other arm, should I lose the use of it."

"My hand to God, I don't deserve to be here," he said

He called prosecutors "the real godfathers."

Prosecutors said Trucchio - who has a withered arm as the result of a childhood auto accident - is a capo in the Gambino crime family who headed the crew as it committed crimes, including robbery and murder, in Florida, New York and New Jersey. Trucchio is already serving 20 years for a similar conviction in Miami.

The Gambino family once was directed by "Dapper Don" John Gotti from his Queens, N.Y., Ravenite Social Club. Trial exhibits included a photo of Trucchio outside the Ravenite standing behind Gotti and Sammy "the Bull" Gravano as they celebrated Gotti's acquittal on federal charges.

All four Tampa defendants were convicted on a charge of racketeering conspiracy. Scaglione also was convicted of extortion for his role in the crew's efforts to muscle its way into the lucrative valet parking business in the Tampa area.

Whitehead said Trucchio was thought to be among the top five members of the family "and clearly the most significant [organized crime] figure that operated crews within the Tampa area."

When asked whether the mob continues to operate here, Whitehead said he couldn't discuss open investigations. In general, though, he said, "There are other businesses we have gotten information that they might try to infiltrate, different nightclubs, things like that."

Asked whether the prosecutions had eliminated organized crime in the area, Assistant U.S. Attorney Jay Trezevant smiled and said: "Nothing's ever eliminated. We've just got to keep fighting."

Trucchio and Catalano face possible life sentences. Catiline and McMahon face up to 20 years in federal prison when they are sentenced in March. Defendant's Home Hit By Arson

Before the verdict was read, Catalano waited restlessly in the courtroom. He said his wife had called at 3 a.m. and told him about the fire. He had tried to get permission to leave court to go to his family, but he hadn't had any luck.

Catalano said authorities told him an explosive normally used by the military had been used. Police later said they had no such information. Catalano said he had no idea who would do something like that.

The fire had damaged his 10-year-old daughter's bedroom, he said, but she was sleeping with her mother in another part of the house when it happened.

Capt. Derek Foxx of the St. Lucie County Fire District said the department received a call at 11:50 p.m. Tuesday and responded to a fire at 1697 Southwest Taurus Lane. Crews found an older model Cadillac engulfed in flames.

The car was parked in the driveway, 10 to 15 feet from the open garage door. The inside of the garage was fully involved in the fire, Fox said.

Investigators determined that the fire was caused by arson of the car, which had recently been purchased by Catalano's teenage son.

Catalano's attorney, Thomas Ostrander, asked U.S. District Judge Susan Bucklew to allow his client to remain free on bail.

Trezevant argued that Catalano was a danger to the community. One witness, Billy Kaso, found a note on his truck, Trezevant said. It read, "I'm a good man. I've always gone to church. Steven."

Suggesting the note was an attempt at intimidation, Trezevant said Catalano was a danger to the community.

Four Convicted In Mob Trial (SPT)

By Carrie Weimar

St. Petersburg Times, November 30, 2006

Early edition: A jury decided that the men were guilty of extortion and racketeering, and had ties to the Gambino organized crime family.

TAMPA — After five days of deliberation, jurors in federal court on Wednesday found Ronald “Ronnie One Arm” Trucchio and his three co-defendants guilty on all charges of racketeering and extortion in the name of the Gambino crime family.

DOJ_NMG_0100084

Trucchio and one co-defendant, Steven Catalano, face a maximum punishment of life in prison when they are sentenced March 2. Kevin McMahon and Terry Scaglione, the only Tampa defendant, could be sentenced to up to 20 years.

On Tuesday, jurors said they had reached a verdict for three of the defendants but were deadlocked on the fourth.

Court papers showed they were undecided on Trucchio, who is the alleged captain or "capo" of the Tampa crew.

"It's unfortunate that the jurors who didn't think my client was guilty did not stand strong because my client was not guilty of these charges," said Joseph Corozzo, Trucchio's New York-based attorney.

The trial began with an unusual twist when Trucchio opted to represent himself because his lawyer, Joseph Corozzo Jr., was stuck in another Mafia-related trial in New York City.

"My hand to God, I don't deserve to be here," Trucchio told jurors during his opening statement. "This is an abomination."

For almost a week, Trucchio cross-examined the government's witnesses. Corozzo took over when he arrived Oct. 30.

Despite the seriousness of the crimes alleged, there were some moments of levity during the month-long trial.

One witness, a valet parking attendant named Ian McGeehan, told jurors he thought it was a joke when he received a threatening phone call from Alite, who wanted information about the lot where he worked.

"It was almost a like a cliche," McGeehan said.

Corozzo asked him what he meant. "You mean, like the Sopranos? Gangsters from New Jersey?"

McGeehan paused.

"I don't have cable TV," he said. "It was more like Goodfellas."

The courtroom erupted in laughter.

The trial was also unusual in that the defendant accused of being the link between the New York mobsters to crimes in Tampa wasn't in the courtroom.

Prosecutors say John Alite, 44, was the crew's street boss who ran its everyday activities from Tampa. However, Alite fled the country before he was charged and is currently in a Brazilian prison fighting extradition.

Alite, a former University of Tampa student, is not being tried in absentia but faces prosecution if he returns to the United States. He has said he is innocent of all charges and is being pressured by the government because of his ties to John Gotti Jr.

The defendants were charged in the indictment with forming a criminal crew that reported to the Gambinos. Prosecutors said crew members engaged in a wide range of criminal conduct from New York to New Jersey to Florida, including murder, drug dealing, robbery and extortion.

Among the specific crimes alleged by the government are the robbery of a Sears department store in Vineland, NJ, the murder of a man inside a Queens, NY, bar and the robbery of a $25,000 Rolex from Tampa car dealer Ernie Haire following a scuffle at Thee Doll House.

Throughout the trial, defense attorneys tried to poke holes in the credibility of the government's witnesses. Many of them are convicted criminals hoping for reduced sentences in exchange for cooperating with the government. Several also admitted to being heavy drug users.

"I'm disappointed," said Bjorn Brunvand, McMahon's lawyer. He said the only evidence linking his client to the Gambinos came from two witnesses who are convicted criminals.

"Both had every reason to lie," Brunvand said.

Trucchio, Catalano and McMahon were all taken into custody. Scaglione was allowed to remain free on bond.

Throughout the trial, Assistant U.S. Attorney Jay Trezevant maintained Scaglione was not as culpable as the other defendants.

"There was very little testimony concerning physical violence engaged in or triggered by Mr. Scaglione," Trezevant said. "There was no evidence he traveled to Queens, NY, to participate in violent armed robberies or other acts. His involvement was less."

Asked if the jury's verdict purged Tampa of the mob's influence, Trezevant smiled.

"Nothing's ever eliminated," he said. "You've just got to keep fighting."

One Pleads Guilty In Gambling Ring, Four Others Expected (RRS)

By Mike Wiser, ROCKFORD REGISTER STAR

Rockford (IL) Register Star, November 30, 2006

ROCKFORD — One of nine men indicted for running a gambling ring that took bets on football and basketball games pleaded guilty Wednesday in federal court afternoon.

And Joesph Saladino's plea may be the first of several guilty pleas from men whom prosecutors allege were connected to a conspiracy that runs as far back as the 1980s.

“There’s a total of five” guilty pleas in the works, including Saladino, said Assistant U.S. Attorney John Scully as he left Judge Philip Reinhard’s courtroom.

The other possible guilty pleas are John P. “Tiger” Frisella, Joseph F. “Pep” Fiorenza, and Joesph’s two sons, Nicholas and Rick.

Wednesday, Reinhard set Friday afternoon hearing dates for the four. Their trial was initially scheduled to start Dec. 11.

It’s still not clear what will happen with the other men who were indicted in the case. They are Charles A. Purin, Frank C. Giardono, Nick Provenzano and John F. Salamone. A tentative trial date for them has been set for Feb. 12.

All of the men, except Saladino, were indicted and arrested in early February, just days before the Super Bowl, on gambling charges.

Federal prosecutors have been characteristically tight-lipped about details of the alleged conspiracy, but court papers filed this week list some of the evidence the Justice Department plans to present if the case goes to trial.

The documents say that Frisella and Saladino had, at least by 2001, set up a “wireroom” in a Rockford apartment building at 1912 17th Ave. where they would take bookmaking calls from bettors over two telephones that were listed under the name of a woman known to Saladino.

The feds also obtained phone records that show hundreds of calls made from the men to 800 and 888 numbers.

A government wiretap that was placed on one of the phones in the wireroom was activated Nov. 26, 2001, according to court documents.

“It was immediately apparent that Joseph Saladino was involved in a sports betting business and there were ultimately several thousand conversations intercepted on this phone,” the documents read. “Some of the calls were with the defendants and other conspirators, but the majority were with bettors.”

The Justice Department is also apparently prepared to present witnesses that placed bets with the members of the alleged ring or could identify some members as people who picked up or delivered gambling payments.

Among these witnesses is a person identified only as “a family member of Charles Purin” who would testify that they helped drum up business for the bookmaking operation run by Saladino and Frisella.

Saladino, who did not file an official plea deal with the court, faces up to five years in prison and the government is seeking to seize $500,000 in assets.

His sentencing is set for March 16.

Felon Loses Big-time Gamble (KNOXNS)

By Jamie Satterfield

Knoxville News Sentinel (TN), November 30, 2006

Appellate court upholds using confession at trial

That "anything you say can and will be used against you" warning, it turns out, is true.

Just ask five-time felon and Knoxville crack house manager Richard Jones Jr.

Plowing through uncharted legal terrain, the 6th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals on Wednesday approved the use of Jones' confession against him at trial.

The ruling proved vindication for similar decisions made by Knoxville federal Judges James H. Jarvis and Tom Varlan. Both U.S. District Court judges had backed up Assistant U.S. Attorney Mike Winck's move to hold against Jones his own incriminating words in a November 2004 trial.

It was quite a gamble, as there was little case law to guide Winck.

Jones actually had been busted in August 2000 after a raid at his home. At the time, authorities counted Jones as a garden-variety dope dealer with a rather nasty criminal history that included a first-degree manslaughter conviction.

Winck wasn't assigned to the case then. Instead, former Knoxville federal prosecutor David Folmar was. Folmar struck a deal with Jones, and Jones coughed up information on his cocaine suppliers. Part of the deal included giving Jones a shot at appealing the legality of the raid on his house.

The odds on appeal usually favor the government. But Jones beat the odds, winning his appeal. Flush with victory, he chucked his plea deal altogether.

Enter Winck.

The way Winck saw it, if Jones was nullifying his plea deal, all bets were off. That was especially bad news for Jones because, by then, FBI agent Steven Fisher had unearthed evidence that Jones was not just a crack dealer - he was a dangerous mastermind of an entire operation.

Trial testimony would later show that Jones had wined and dined young men with relatively clean criminal backgrounds to lure them into the crack trade. He set them up in Knoxville crack houses, supplied them with drugs to peddle and guns to protect the trade.

Winck secured a new indictment against Jones and then rolled the dice at trial, sending Fisher to the witness stand to detail the confession Jones had made as part of the plea deal he later rejected.

Jones' attorney, James W. Bell, contended Jones was being punished for beating the government on appeal. He also argued that Winck was legally barred from using Jones' confession against him.

Winck countered that Jones "simply wanted to have his cake and eat it, too" by backing out of his plea deal but still using it as a shield to protect him against his own guilty statements to Fisher.

In its opinion, delivered by Senior Judge Gilbert S. Merritt, the 6th Circuit sided with Winck.

If Jones did not want his words to come back and haunt him, he should have been a better negotiator or kept his mouth shut, the court opined.

"If Jones wanted to prevent the government from using his statement against him, he could have attempted to negotiate a provision in the plea agreement that barred use of the statement against him after a successful appeal," Merritt wrote. "Instead, he chose to provide a statement to the government that could be used against him in the event of a successful appeal."

It has proven a costly gamble for Jones. Under the original plea deal, Jones was sentenced to 210 months. After his conviction on the new indictment, Varlan slapped him with a 420-month prison term.

The appellate opinion revealed yet another gamble Jones made in the handling of his own fate. According to the opinion, Winck offered Jones a plea deal before trial that would have netted him the original 210-month sentence. Jones turned it down.

It's unlikely the U.S. Attorney's Office will be offering up any more deals for Jones. Authorities have since revealed that Jones had threatened to attack Winck at his sentencing hearing. A jail snitch foiled the plot, and deputies with the U.S. Marshals Service kept Jones shackled and chained during the hearing.

Attorneys Seek DNA Tests For Man Reputed To Be Behind Infamous Child Murders (LAW)

By R. Robin Mcdonald, Fulton County Daily Report

Fulton County (GA) Daily Report, November 30, 2006

Attorneys for convicted killer Wayne Williams, long reputed to be the man behind Atlanta's infamous child murders, are asking a Fulton County, Ga., judge for permission to perform DNA testing on 25-year-old evidence.

On Tuesday, Williams' defense lawyers John R. "Jack" Martin and Lynn H. Whatley filed a motion in Fulton County Superior Court seeking comparative DNA tests on samples of animal and human hair recovered from the bodies of 11 men and boys whose deaths were attributed to Williams.

Williams was convicted in 1982 of the murders of Jimmy Ray Payne, 21, and Nathaniel Cater, 28 -- two of 29 black men and children who were among what became known as "Atlanta's missing and murdered children" cases. (The list included one still-unsolved disappearance.) After Williams' convictions in the slayings of Payne and Cater, prosecutors closed the books on 22 other cases.

For two years, from 1979 to 1981, the bodies of 29 victims -- all of them black and all but two of them men and boys -- were found dumped throughout metro Atlanta in vacant lots and buildings, on roadsides, in gullies, in wooded areas and in the South and Chattahoochee rivers. Fear gripped Atlanta during what many regard as one of the darkest periods in the city's history.

With the discovery of each new body, authorities became increasingly desperate to identify the killer. Parents in black neighborhoods formed vigilante patrols, and many came to believe the Ku Klux Klan must be behind the killings since only blacks were slain. Mayor Maynard Jackson offered a $100,000 reward for information that might lead to an arrest. Finally, before dawn on May 22, 1981, police staking out a Chattahoochee River bridge near where one body had been found heard a splash. Seconds later, officers spotted Williams' station wagon driving slowly across the bridge. Williams was stopped, questioned, but released.

A month would pass before police finally arrested Williams, a 23-year-old self-styled talent recruiter and freelance photographer. Prosecutors would later argue that only after Williams' arrest did the string of serial slayings stop. Still, many were never satisfied that police arrested the right man. As recently as 2005, former DeKalb County police chief Louis Graham reopened an investigation into five of the deaths and declared his belief that Williams was not Atlanta's child killer.

Williams always has maintained his innocence.

Attached to the motion filed Tuesday was a statement of verification signed by Williams, who, according to Martin, is certain that DNA tests will clear him of the crimes for which he has been imprisoned since his arrest in June 1981.

"We hope to find that the DNA shows no matches," Martin said Tuesday. "Wayne's taking a risk. But he's all for it."

"I'm really more excited about this than some of the appeals," said Whatley, who has been Williams' appellate lawyer for 25 years. "We're dealing with science now."

WEB OF CIRCUMSTANTIAL INFORMATION

The human and dog hairs that Williams' defense hopes to test were part of a tightly woven web of circumstantial evidence that convicted Williams. Fabric fibers found on the victims' bodies that microscopically matched fibers found in Williams' car and home, as well as samples of human and animal hair recovered from the victims, were critical in securing Williams' conviction in what has become a landmark case in the annals of forensic science. Samples of bloodstains were recovered from the rear seat of Williams' station wagon that, according to state witnesses, matched the blood types and specific blood enzymes of two of Williams' suspected victims.

At the time Williams was tried, however, comparative DNA testing had never been used in a criminal case and the technology for testing of animal DNA did not exist. Forensic experts called by the prosecution testified that microscopic comparisons of animal hairs recovered from the bodies of Payne, Cater and nine other slaying victims were consistent with the characteristics of hairs obtained from Williams' mixed-breed German shepherd. Prosecutors argued that those comparisons strongly suggested that Williams' victims had been in close contact with him shortly before their deaths.

In addition, forensic experts testified that a microscopic comparison of two human scalp hairs recovered from 11-year-old slaying victim Patrick Baltazar were consistent with Williams' scalp hair.

"The evidence of dog hairs found either on the bodies or the clothing of both of the victims for whose murders [Williams] was convicted, as well as nine of the other alleged murders offered to prove [Williams'] identity as the person who perpetrated the murders of Mr. Payne and Mr. Cater, was powerful evidence of the defendant's guilt emphasized by the prosecution," Williams' motion acknowledged.

But, it continued, "Should DNA testing prove that the dog hairs did not come from [Williams'] dog, this circumstance would raise a reasonable probability that the defendant would have been acquitted if the results of DNA testing had been available at the time of the conviction."

"Indeed," the motion said, "if the testing shows that the animal hairs did not come from the defendant's dog but all came from the same, but some other dog or animal, then this would be powerful evidence that these terrible crimes were committed by a single perpetrator who is not Wayne Williams and who has never been brought to justice."

If DNA tests of the foreign scalp hair recovered from Baltazar's body fail to match DNA extracted from Williams' scalp hair, "this evidence would further undermine the state's case for guilt and would at least raise a reasonable probability that [Williams] would have been acquitted if the results of DNA testing had been available at the time of trial," Williams' motion said.

On Tuesday, Lyn Vaughn, a spokeswoman for Fulton County District Attorney Paul L. Howard, said Howard and his staff will review the motion "and make a determination following that review."

Russell D. Willard, a spokesman for Georgia Attorney General Thurbert Baker, said the attorney general's office will work with the Fulton DA "to assure that an appropriate response is filed."

Williams first began calling for DNA tests in 1999. That year, Whatley told The Associated Press that he was considering whether to seek a court order to run DNA tests on the bloodstains found in Williams' car. Williams told the AP, "If you want to prove Wayne Williams did this conclusively, then let's get the DNA tests."

It wasn't until Tuesday, however, that Williams' defense team initiated the legal steps required to conduct the DNA tests.

OUTSIDE INVESTIGATION

In 2005, after Graham announced he was reopening an investigation into five of the slayings that were administratively closed with Williams' 1982 conviction, the Daily Report embarked on a yearlong search for the forensic evidence in the case.

The newspaper spent months locating and then combing through trial testimony and lists of exhibits, filed numerous public records requests to confirm that evidence still existed and, eventually, determined where it was stored. The Daily Report recruited two of the top fiber experts in the country to examine magnified photographic images of fiber recovered in the investigation. Those experts concluded that, 25 years later, the fiber evidence against Williams remains compelling and credible. (Daily Report, June 30, 2006.)

The newspaper also enlisted the help of the Georgia Innocence Project and, in April, formally asked Fulton County Superior Court Chief Judge Doris L. Downs to permit the Innocence Project to conduct comparative DNA tests of the blood and hair evidence admitted during Williams' trial. Downs rejected that request, explaining that Georgia's open records law did not permit the newspaper to remove evidence from the courthouse to have it tested at a forensic lab, even under the supervision of the Innocence Project.

As chief judge, Downs handled the public records request because Williams' trial judge, Clarence Cooper, is now a U.S. District Court judge.

However, Downs allowed a supervised inspection of the evidence by the Daily Report. On May 22 -- accompanied by Williams' defense attorneys, lawyers representing the Fulton County district attorney and the state attorney general -- the newspaper, under court supervision, located and inspected numerous forensic slides on which the animal and human hair evidence had been preserved.

Blood evidence collected in the investigation, including a blood-stained seat taken from Williams' car, couldn't be located.

After that inspection, Martin and Whatley vowed to ask for DNA tests on Williams' behalf and sought the advice of the Innocence Project in finding a qualified laboratory. At the time, Williams had a motion for reconsideration of his habeas corpus appeal pending before U.S. District Judge Beverly B. Martin (who is no relation to Jack Martin). The federal judge already had rejected Williams' appeal in a 251-page order she handed down in February. Last month, she turned down Williams' motion for reconsideration of her earlier ruling. Williams' lawyers are appealing that decision to the 11th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals.

If the DNA tests produce no matches between Williams, his dog and evidence recovered from the victims that prosecutors directly linked to Williams at his trial, defense lawyers say they will file an extraordinary motion for a new trial based on the newly discovered evidence. "Much of the case [against Williams] was circumstantial," Jack Martin said Tuesday. "They built the case on fibers and hairs." However, if comparative DNA tests "prove he [Williams] is not guilty but innocent, then the circumstantial case starts to unravel."

State forensic experts testified that more than 100 animal hairs recovered from 11 victims were consistent with hair taken from Williams' dog. Williams' motion proposes that a representative sample of dog hairs taken from the victims, as well as samples of hairs from Williams' dog that were preserved, be tested by the forensic laboratory at the University of California at Davis, which pioneered the study of animal DNA. The forensic laboratory at the Georgia Bureau of Investigation currently does not have the capability to perform such tests, according to Williams' motion.

Williams' motion also asks the state to pay for the tests, which will cost from $150-$500 per animal hair, depending on the test.

Williams' motion also seeks a court order to locate the missing blood evidence and bloodstained car seat that were shown to jurors. According to Williams' motion, his lawyers have "endeavored without success" to locate the blood evidence and speculated that it may still be in the custody of either the Fulton County district attorney or Atlanta police.

In response to a 2005 public records request by the Daily Report, the GBI acknowledged that its forensic laboratory disposed of dated biological evidence years ago and transferred the majority of evidence attached to the Atlanta child murders to the Atlanta Police Department. Atlanta police never responded to several public records requests made by the Daily Report to document the existence of forensic evidence in the Williams case.

Defense lawyers acknowledged a risk in asking for the DNA tests. "If the dog hairs found on the victims truly match [Williams'] dog or if the scalp hair found on victim Baltazar truly matches [Williams'] hair, doubts about [Williams'] guilt would obviously vanish. However, [Williams] is so confident in his innocence that he urgently asks that this testing be done."

"Why would the state oppose this?" Martin asked Tuesday. "It seems they would be as interested in finding out the truth as anyone else."

Said Whatley: "This cloud has been on the city too long."

Meet The Genovese Crime Family's New Boss (NYS)

By Jerry Capeci

New York Sun, November 30, 2006

Less than a year after the death of legendary Mafia boss Vincent "Chin" Gigante, a cagy wiseguy who understands the wisdom of keeping a low profile has taken the reins of the powerful Genovese crime family, Gang Land has learned.

Meet Daniel Leo, 65, a reputed member of the violent, East Harlem-based Purple Gang during the 1970s who now resides in a $2 million home in Rockleigh, N.J., a town on the Palisades that boasts the highest median household income in the state, according to the 2000 census.

There is scant public record on Leo, but several top law enforcement sources told Gang Land this week that he is currently at the pinnacle of the crime family whose members and rackets surpass all the others. The officials disagree about his title.

"We're carrying him as the acting boss," a law enforcement official who has been involved in several major investigations into the family's sophisticated labor racketeering schemes said.

Two other highly placed mob busters said they were not sure about Leo's official mob rank, but agreed that Leo is a low-key and "well-respected" family leader who has beaten the system.The lawmen agreed that in the wake of Gigante's death — and after the recent prosecutions of many top Genovese mobsters — no other family gangster now has more power and influence than Leo.

"Leo is a heavyweight, a major player, and he may be the acting boss, but we don't know for sure, yet," one source said. "This is the family that didn't tell the other four families for years that Chin was really the boss and that 'Fat Tony' Salerno was merely a figurehead."

All the sources do agree that Leo has served for many years as a top official in the crime family with little fanfare.

Leo, whose two-story brick house sits on a 1-acre plot on Rockleigh Road that in the 1680s was rich Colonial Dutch farmland, also owns a condominium in Boca Raton, Fla., according to real estate records. He did not respond to a call to his home for comment.

Bank Robber Denied Further Leniency, Gets 11-year Term (KNOXNS)

By Jamie Satterfield

Knoxville News Sentinel (TN), November 30, 2006

Give a bank robber an inch, and he'll ask for a mile.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Tracy Stone argued Wednesday in U.S. District Court that he already had given serial bank robber Thomas J. Hunt Jr. a 25-year sentencing cut by dropping one of three cases against him.

Still, Hunt stood before Senior U.S. District Judge James H. Jarvis with Assistant Federal Defender Paula Voss asking for more leniency.

Hunt, who pleaded guilty to robbing a bank in Greenback and another in Maryville earlier this year, escaped as part of his plea deal a gun conviction that could have netted him an automatic 25-year prison term required by law to be stacked onto whatever other punishment he would have drawn, Stone noted.

Jarvis sided with Stone, imposing a sentence of 135 months, or just more than 11 years, which the prosecutor recommended.

Hunt, nabbed shortly after the robberies by FBI agents, told the judge he had longtime addictions to alcohol and drugs.

Laney also jailed for 5 years for illegal trafficking in firm's software

A former southwest Washington man was sentenced Wednesday to pay $9.4 million in restitution to Microsoft Corp. and serve five years in prison for illegal trafficking in the company's software.

Scott Laney, 35, pleaded guilty to money laundering and counterfeiting conspiracy charges. The scheme involved acquiring Microsoft programs at cut rates -- in some cases from employees who were abusing the company's internal ordering system -- and reselling them with falsified labels, documents and licenses that boosted their value.

As part of the case, Laney admitted that he and his co-conspirators sold up to $20 million of software with counterfeit labeling and licenses. Microsoft alleged that it lost at least $12.4 million. Symantec Corp. programs also were resold illegally, according to court papers, although the security software company didn't claim any restitution.

Tobias Grace, of Vancouver, Wash., who was charged with conspiring with Laney, is scheduled for sentencing Jan. 19. Laney, a resident of Battle Ground at the time he was charged, has since moved to Ogden, Utah, prosecutors said.

According to court papers, the two obtained discounted software intended for computer manufacturers or academic institutions and altered the labels to sell it near full price. In other cases, they altered server software licenses to allow for more users, boosting the price.

Businesses that bought the software often didn't know it wasn't legitimately licensed until they called for product support, prosecutors said.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Annette Hayes had asked for a long sentence against Laney. She cited a U.S. Chamber of Commerce survey estimating that U.S. businesses lose $200 billion to $250 billion over counterfeiting of products.

Judge Franklin Burgess at the U.S. District Court in Tacoma sentenced Laney. His lawyer, Richard Troberman, couldn't be reached.

The FBI, IRS and U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement investigated the case. Grace and Laney both were charged in August 2004.

Several former Microsoft employees have been charged separately with taking advantage of previous loopholes in the company's internal software ordering system. Microsoft says it has changed its system and procedures to prevent such abuses.

Man Gets 5 Years For Software Fraud (HC/AP)

The Associated Press
Houston Chronicle, November 30, 2006

TACOMA, Wash. — A 35-year-old man was sentenced Wednesday to five years in prison and $9.4 million in restitution for selling computer software with fraudulent licenses.

Scott Laney, formerly of Battle Ground, near Vancouver, and now of Ogden, Utah, was sentenced in federal court nine months after he pleaded guilty to conspiracy to traffic in counterfeit labels and computer program documentation, as well as conspiracy to engage in money laundering. His coconspirator, Tobias Grace, of Vancouver, is to be sentenced in January.

Prosecutors said the two obtained some of their software at a fraction of the retail value from Microsoft Corp. workers who exploited the company's internal ordering system. Laney and Grace created a web of companies to relabel and sell the software as if it were legitimate.

They also altered the software licenses for expensive server software to authorize more users than originally provided for, enabling them to reap a greater profit.

Microsoft said it lost $12.4 million as a result of the fraudulent activity. Several of the workers who abused the internal system have been charged and convicted in federal court.

Alabama Residents Indicted In FEMA Fraud (AP)

AP, November 30, 2006

BIRMINGHAM, Ala. (AP) — Fraud charges were announced Wednesday against 23 north Alabama residents, most accused of making false claims to get $2,000 in expedited disaster relief, with one accused of wrongly pocketing $14,749 in Federal Emergency Management Agency funds.

"Theft of disaster relief funds will be prosecuted to the fullest extent of the law," said U.S. Attorney Alice H. Martin in a statement. "I continue to ask the public to report illegal claims to law enforcement."

Fourteen of those charged are from Bessemer, including Linda Williams, accused of making false claims, theft of government money and mail fraud for allegedly receiving $14,749 in Katrina disaster relief funds she was not entitled to. Four were from Midfield, two from Birmingham, and one each from Jasper, Brighton and Homewood.

FEMA made the $2,000 available to eligible evacuees for immediate food, shelter and clothing needs.

Eligibility was based on housing needs. The damaged home had to be located in disaster areas and had to be where the applicant was living at the time of the disaster.

The charges include making false claims against the government, theft of government money or property and mail fraud for falsely claiming to be a resident of an affected area.

AP, November 30, 2006

JACKSON — One man has pleaded guilty to filing a false Hurricane Katrina claim and five others have been arrested for fraud against the Federal Emergency Management Agency.

Robert A. Martin, of Gulfport, pleaded guilty to submitting a false claim for disaster assistance funds in the wake of Katrina and will be sentenced in federal court in February, the Department of Justice said Tuesday in a news release.

At the time Katrina hit the Mississippi Gulf Coast Martin was at the Harrison County Correctional Facility.

Yet, Martin received $5,864 from FEMA by providing a false address in Gulfport and claiming damage at that property.

He faces up to five years in prison and a $250,000 fine.

Five more Gulf Coast residents have been accused of defrauding FEMA. Authorities said all five provided false addresses in Gulfport or Biloxi, then made claims on those addresses.

All were indicted on Nov. 7 and arrested Tuesday.

Shirann M. Everett of Gulfport is accused of receiving $19,921.13 after filing a false claim.

The other four accused of the crime are all from Biloxi and received less than $6,000.

They are Curtis Morrow ($4,358), Carolin Morrow ($5,648), Ronald Nguyen ($4,358) and Greg J. Parish ($4,358).

They face prison sentences ranging from 40 to 80 years and fines ranging from $1 million to $1.5 million.

The arrests were made with the help of the national Hurricane Katrina Fraud Task Force, created in September 2005 after the Aug. 29, 2005, storm devastated Gulf Coast communities in Mississippi and Louisiana.

The group is designed to investigate and prosecute crimes such as charity fraud, identity theft, procurement fraud and identity theft.

Kan. Man Sentenced In Internet Sex Sting (LAT/AP)

The Los Angeles Times, November 30, 2006

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — A lawyer convicted in an Internet sex sting was sentenced Wednesday to five years in prison, capping a legal battle that challenged a common tool police use to catch sexual predators online.

Moments after a federal jury convicted Jan P. Helder Jr. in August 2005, the judge set aside the verdict and ordered him acquitted.

U.S. District Judge Dean Whipple said Helder couldn't be guilty because the person he communicated with online was actually an undercover detective in Platte County, Mo., not a 14-year-old girl as he had believed.

Defense attorneys in similar cases around the country had raised the same argument as such stings became a common tool for trapping Internet sexual predators. Whipple's ruling was believed to be the first in which the argument succeeded.

The 8th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in St. Louis reinstated the jury's verdict against Helder and sent the case back to Whipple for sentencing. The appeals court said the critical issue was that Helder thought he was seducing a minor, not whether the minor truly existed.

Helder, 43, of Mission Hills, will not be eligible for parole under.

Man Gets Prison Term For Threatening President George W. Bush, But Freed For Time Served (FINDLAW/AP)

By Jim Suhr, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 30, 2006

(AP) - EAST ST. LOUIS, Illinois-A mental patient who threatened to castrate President George W. Bush was sentenced to federal prison, but a judge ordered him freed because of time he has already served.

Arafat Nijmeh, 27, who is of Palestinian descent, was sentenced Tuesday to seven months in prison after pleading guilty to two counts of threatening the president.

"This would have been an interesting trial," said his attorney, John O'Gara.

He was released after U.S. District Judge David Herndon credited him with the eight months he spent in custody. Nijmeh had been jailed without bail after being declared a flight risk and a threat to society.

Nijmeh was accused of threatening to harm Bush in comments March 18 to workers at the Alton Mental Health Center and to two Secret Service agents the next day.

The indictment alleged Nijmeh told the agents his earlier threat to castrate Bush was "not too harsh, considering what he has done to my country."

O'Gara said Nijmeh is a U.S. citizen.

Secret Service agent John Brooks has testified that Nijmeh was placed in the center against his will by his mother, who said Nijmeh threatened to slice his brother's throat, crashed his car into the brother's garage and tried to hit a nephew with his car.

Brooks said Nijmeh also told a supervisory nurse at the center he was going to "make her life a living hell" and threatened to kill Jews.

Widespread County Fuel Thefts Suspected In Fairfax (WP)

By Lisa Rein

The Washington Post, November 30, 2006

They sometimes filled up their tanks in the dead of night, keying in a generic code at any of dozens of Fairfax County fuel pumps, then sticking the nozzle into the tanks of their personal cars or into drums to bring home for snowblowers or lawn mowers.

The county's auditor and several county supervisors say they suspect the abuse of fuel pumps by employees assigned government cars went on for years. They are uncertain how many workers were involved -- it could have been hundreds -- or how much fuel was stolen, inflating a monthly fuel bill that has doubled in three years because of rising prices.

But in a report that the Board of Supervisors is scheduled to receive Monday, the county is getting a handle on the scope of the fraud with help from new controls. The county auditor will report that the Fairfax fleet is on track to use close to 75,000 gallons less this year than last, and officials suspect that most of that amount was stolen.

"It was people playing games," said Supervisor Elaine N. McConnell (R-Springfield). "It was going on forever. I don't think anybody had checked on it before."

The most egregious case officials know of involved a worker in the Department of Facilities Management who was stealing diesel fuel and gasoline for more than two years. Fairfax police staked out Bryan Coup after investigating him for several months. They caught him filling up the tank of his county car one night last January and then putting diesel into large drums.

Police followed him to his home in Shady Side, where he planned to use the diesel to heat his home, officials said. Coup, 36, was fired, and he was found guilty of embezzlement in August. He made restitution for hundreds of gallons of stolen fuel, auditor John Adair said. Another employee was charged with stealing fuel, although Adair and police officials could not provide details.

The projected fuel savings in the report represent 1.87 percent of the 3.9 million gallons of fuel consumed each year by the county's fleet of 3,500 cars and trucks, including police and fire vehicles and those used by homeless-outreach and park workers. But fuel consumption started to drop as soon as the county made it harder for employees to fill up their government cars.

"Month by month, the savings are all over the place," across numerous agencies, Adair said. At first, he said, he thought that the drop might be explained by fuel conservation, but now he suspects it's the crackdown on fraud.

With about 1,300 cars, the Police Department has the largest agency fleet. But spokeswoman Mary Anne Jennings said that the large number of cars does not prove any abuse.

"I'm failing to see the connections," Jennings said. "I have not heard of any issues within the Police Department of anyone using gas for personal use."

Board Chairman Gerald E. Connolly (D) said a drop in fuel consumption by police could be a result of an effort by Chief David M. Rohrer to reduce the number of take-home cars in the department.

The possibility that employees were stealing fuel came to the attention of the board's audit committee last spring, when gas prices hit $3 a gallon. Coup and the other employee had been arrested, and some officials suspected fraud at the pump. "We wanted to be sure no one was yielding to temptation," Connolly said.

The system was open to abuse. To fill up at the 47 county pumps, employees with county cars were supposed to punch in a vehicle number, an agency number and an odometer reading. But a "miscellaneous" code could be used to obtain fuel for other equipment or if there was a problem using the code assigned to a car.

Operators of dozens, if not hundreds, of cars in each agency knew the miscellaneous code, and its use grew to 352,000 gallons in fiscal 2006, according to a September audit on the fuel program. An employee using the code could get fuel without creating a record.

Now an employee has to punch in a number that identifies the car and the employee, and the county tracks the day and the time. Only a select group of employees can use the miscellaneous code.

"The good news for taxpayers is that we're effectuating a significant saving and reversing a trend of ever-increasing fuel consumption," Connolly said. The savings this year are estimated at $184,000.

Jim Gorby, the head of the county's Department of Vehicle Services, expressed concerns about fraud as far back as 2003, when he instituted a limit of three gallons for cars using the "miscellaneous" code. However, thousands of police and fire vehicles were exempted from the limit, and the code could be typed in repeatedly, Adair said.

"Now," he said, "we at least know who's taking what fuel and when."

Ex-CIA Worker Admits Theft Of Items Pricey And Peculiar (WP)

By Fredrick Kunkle

George C. Dalmas III, a CIA employee for almost 20 years, yesterday admitted to breaking into 10 homes in the McLean area about a year ago and taking valuables and curiosities.

The loot from his daylight burglaries included Camp David cuff links, a Daughters of the American Revolution pin, a gold Phi Beta Kappa necklace, Cartier hoop earrings, a Tiffany gold scarab ring, a sapphire-diamond necklace, rhinestone bracelets, a Rolex watch and even a Fauquier High School ring. He also helped himself to several antique clocks and old radios -- all treasures he told his wife he had picked up at yard sales.

Dalmas did not explain why he did what he did, and the format in Fairfax County Circuit Court for accepting his guilty plea did not really allow for it. Neither his attorney nor the prosecutor mentioned the most intriguing object of Dalmas's criminal treasure-hunting expeditions: women's panties.

Search warrants list 1,074 pairs of women's undergarments that he stole, many of which were stuffed in shopping bags inside a filing cabinet at his Fulton Avenue home in Falls Church.

"I don't profess to be that knowledgeable about ladies' undergarments," Assistant Commonwealth's Attorney Ian M. Rodway said afterward when asked to describe the evidence. "They ran the gamut from frilly things to mundane things."

Police believe Dalmas kept the undies as trophies. In fact, they believe Dalmas squirreled away everything he took. Court documents say he never tried to pawn or sell any of the jewelry or other valuable goods. Rodway described Dalmas as a packrat.

"He's as strange as you're going to find," Rodway said.

Dalmas, 48, pleaded guilty to 10 burglaries that each carry a maximum sentence of 20 years in prison. Dalmas, who has no prior criminal record, was fired from his mid-level administrative post at the CIA. Mark Mansfield, a CIA spokesman, said Dalmas joined the agency in November 1986. He was suspended without pay in February and terminated in August.

Wearing wire-rim glasses and a fastidious beard, Dalmas looked like a kindly high school science teacher when he entered the courtroom, except for the county jail jumpsuit that hung loosely on his slight frame. Dalmas kept his hands folded in front of him and addressed the judge in a thin, almost timid voice. An immaculate swept-back wing of silver hair bobbed in response to questions.

Dalmas admitted breaking into the homes beginning in October 2005. He was arrested after a McLean homeowner surprised him in her house Jan. 24, pursued his vehicle and obtained a license plate number that was tracked to him. It was the second time a resident came upon Dalmas during a break-in, the prosecutor said.

But Dalmas's attorney said he would "never harm a flea."

"He's a bright, articulate guy. He's the nicest, most gentle guy," defense attorney Gary Moliken said after the hearing.

Dalmas was driven to take things for reasons that could not be easily fathomed, especially because he grabbed many things of little value, Moliken said.

"He doesn't really touch a lot of valuable things, which I think is demonstrable that mental health issues are involved," Moliken said. "This was not driven by a need for financial gain."

Dalmas's wife and two young children have moved to the Midwest, but she remains loyal to him, Moliken said.

"She is supporting him and standing by him, and hopefully they'll get through this and resume a normal life," Moliken said. He said his client's predicament has left him depressed and at times confused.

Fairfax County Circuit Court Judge Robert W. Wooldridge Jr. set sentencing for Feb. 9.

Theoretically, Dalmas faces up to 200 years in prison, but the prosecutor and the defense attorney said he is likely to receive less, though the plea agreement did not set a recommended range of penalties.

KBR Agrees To Settle Army Fraud Allegations (CNN)

By Terry Frieden And Katy Byron

Military contractor agrees to pay $8M after Feds claimed firm overcharged U.S. Army for services in Balkans in 1999 and 2000.

WASHINGTON (CNN) -- Halliburton subsidiary KBR has agreed to pay $8 million to settle allegations the firm overcharged the U.S. Army for logistical support of military operations in the Balkans in 1999 and 2000.

The allegations involved double billing and delivery of products that did not conform to requirements for use in construction of an Army camp in Kosovo. Other claims involved inflation of prices for various goods resulting from the alleged failure to ensure competitive procurements, the Justice Department said.

"The Department of Justice remains committed to vigorously pursuing allegations of procurement abuses affecting the military," said Peter Keisler, assistant attorney general for the department's Civil Division.

The Justice Department said the settlement resolves allegations that concerned various purchase orders awarded to 10 foreign KBR subcontractors or vendors.

Company spokeswoman Melissa Norcross issued a statement noting that "the government closed its investigation without making allegations of fraud or filing a complaint."

"KBR has agreed to make a payment totaling $8 million to the government, representing an adjustment to the contracts under which KBR provided logistical support to the U.S. military in the Balkans," she said.

"Of that amount, $2.1 million was previously credited to our customer in January 2001 as the result of an internal investigation. The remaining sum will be paid directly to the U.S. Treasury because the appropriations accounts under which a contract credit could have been made have since expired."

KBR also has been the subject of investigations into military contracts it gained to support military operations in Iraq.

Halliburton (up $0.96 to $33.59, Charts) has initiated steps to spin off the KBR unit, which issued an initial public offering of stock earlier this month.

KBR (up $0.03 to $21.98, Charts) shares edged lower in afternoon trade Wednesday on the New York Stock Exchange.

Contractor KBR Settles Overbilling Claims For $8 Million (AP)

By Lara Jakes Jordan, Associated Press

AP, November 30, 2006

WASHINGTON – One of the government's largest military contractors will pay $8 million to settle six-year old claims it overcharged the Army for construction and other support services in the Balkans, the Justice Department said Wednesday.

Kellogg, Brown & Root, a subsidiary of Houston-based Halliburton Co., was accused of double-billing the government and ordering unusable products while helping build Camp Bondsteel in Kosovo, prosecutors said.

The contractor also allegedly inflated prices for some unspecified goods that were not put out for competitive bid, the department said.

Prosecutors said those incidents occurred between 1999 and 2000.

The department "remains committed to vigorously pursuing allegations of procurement abuses affecting the military," Assistant Attorney General Peter D. Keisler said in a statement.

Halliburton spokeswoman Melissa Norcross said the company was pleased with the settlement, which was reached without charges being filed.

"The government closed its investigation without making allegations of fraud or filing a complaint," Norcross said in a statement.

Halliburton Unit To Pay 8 Mln Dlrs To Settle Army Fraud Claims (AFP)

AFP, November 30, 2006

A Halliburton subsidiary, KBR, has agreed to pay the US government eight million dollars to settle fraud claims related to an Army supply contract, the Justice Department said.

The agreement follows a Justice Department probe into allegations of overcharging and other "procurement irregularities" related to KBR's billings on an Army contract for services provided in the Balkans between 1999 and 2000.

"The settlement resolves allegations under the False Claims Act that concerned various purchase orders awarded to 10 different foreign KBR subcontractors or vendors," a Justice Department statement said.

"The Department of Justice remains committed to vigorously pursuing allegations of procurement abuses affecting the military," said Peter Keisler, an assistant attorney general for the department's civil division.

Some of the allegations against KBR concerned double-billing and the delivery of "non-conforming products" by suppliers for use in the construction of Camp Bondsteel in Kosovo.

KBR is an engineering, construction and services subsidiary of the Houston-based energy firm Halliburton, which was formerly led by Vice President Dick Cheney.

Halliburton and KBR have weathered numerous contracting controversies since Halliburton was awarded a no-bid 2.4 billion dollar contract to supply the US military on the eve of the US-led invasion of Iraq in 2003.

Halliburton, Army Settle Balkans Case (HC)

$8 million ends the long-running billing dispute

WASHINGTON - Houston's Halliburton Co. has agreed to pay $8 million to settle a long-running dispute with the U.S. Army over alleged overbilling when providing logistical support during the conflict in the Balkans.

The agreement, announced by the Justice Department Wednesday, resolves allegations under the False Claims Act regarding purchase orders Halliburton subsidiary KBR awarded to 10 foreign subcontractors in 1999 and 2000.

KBR, which has admitted no wrongdoing, had been accused of double-billing and providing products that did not conform to the Army's specifications during construction of Camp Bondsteel, a sprawling base in Kosovo built to accommodate 5,000 troops and contractors.

The government also had alleged the company inflated prices by failing to ensure adequate competition existed when making procurements.

"The Department of Justice remains committed to vigorously pursuing allegations of procurement abuses affecting the military," Peter Keisler, assistant attorney general for the Justice Department's civil division, said in a prepared statement.

Company spokeswoman Melissa Norcross, in an e-mail, said "KBR is pleased to confirm the close of the United States' investigation into KBR's government contracting in the Balkans in 1999 and 2000."

The government closed the investigation, Norcross added, "without making allegations of fraud or filing a complaint."

The company already has paid $2.1 million and will pay another $5.9 million within the next few days.

In a recent filing with the Securities and Exchange Commission, company officials noted the disputed charges were "part of the Balkans contract under which approximately $100 million in work was done."

Justice Department officials provided few other details, while none of the several Pentagon officials contacted Wednesday could address the matter.

KBR was first awarded a contract by the Army in 1992 to provide a broad array of support services for the troops, from serving meals to operating fire departments.

When the U.S. military moved into the Balkans in 1995, KBR was ordered to build bases and provide basic services.

Two years later, the logistics contract expired, and a new agreement was awarded to another company, DynCorp.

But wanting to keep KBR in place, the Pentagon split off the Balkans operations into a new sole-source contract.

KBR eventually won back the broad logistics contract and has been building bases and providing an array of services for U.S. troops in Iraq. But the company's work there has come under repeated criticism for possible overcharges.

Such disputes, however, have not kept KBR from winning new Pentagon contracts. Earlier this month, for instance, the Army's Field and Installation Readiness Support Team awarded KBR a new contract to provide professional, administrative and management support services, according to a federal government Web site.

Neither Halliburton nor the Pentagon would provide any details about that new contract. Halliburton is in the process of spinning off KBR.

Farmer Must Pay $2 Million For False Insurance Claims (SANEWS)

By Lania Coleman, The Saginaw News

The Saginaw News (MI), November 30, 2006

BAY CITY -- Federal authorities have ordered a Bay County farmer to pay more than $2 million for false crop insurance claims.

Bli Farms, Richard Bli and the estate of his brother, James E. Bli, must repay $2,128,920 to the federal government for claims filed for their 1992, 1994 and 1995 potato crops, U.S. Attorney Stephen J. Murphy said Monday.

U.S. District Judge David M. Lawson, after a bench trial, found that Richard Bli, acting on behalf of the partnership the Bli brothers formed in 1992, knowingly violated the False Claims Act.

Lawson said Bli submitted false claims for crop insurance indemnities and false certifications of potato production for the crop years in question.

The court found that the claims were false because Bli Farms had "substantial unreported sold potato production" for the specified years.

"Had Bli Farms reported all of its 1994 sole potato production, it would have received a significantly reduced indemnity for losses on its insured potato crop," Murphy said in a statement from the Justice Department.

Bli Farms received $704,640 in crop insurance indemnities to which it was not entitled, he said.

"Under the False Claims Act, these damages are trebled, to $2,113,920," Murphy said.

The court also imposed penalties totaling $15,000.

In addition, Bli Farms and Richard Bli now face exclusion from federal programs.

"The public should not bear the cost of false or exaggerated claims for crop insurance," Murphy said. "(It's) fraud, pure and simple." v

Treasury Ordered To Redesign Money For The Blind (LAT)

By Mima Mohammed And Moises Mendoza, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, November 30, 2006

The Treasury Department on Wednesday began considering its response to a federal court ruling that ordered changes to paper currency so each denomination could be easily identified by blind and visually impaired people.

The ruling by U.S. District Judge James Robertson came in a lawsuit filed against the department by the American Council of the Blind, a Washington-based advocacy group. The group argued that the government's failure to differentiate among denominations amounted to illegal discrimination, and Robertson agreed.

"We are still reviewing the court order, and the government has made no determination as to what its next step will be in this matter," said Charles Miller, a spokesman for the Justice Department's civil division.

The Treasury Department has 10 days from Tuesday's ruling to decide whether to appeal.

In his opinion, Robertson ordered the Treasury Department to consider such options as changing the size and color of banknotes for each denomination and adding tactile differences, such as foil, raised numbers or perforations, to the bills.

Other currencies, such as those of the European Union, Japan, Switzerland and Saudi Arabia, include such differences, he said, adding that the United States could have incorporated similar changes during recent redesigns that added anti-counterfeiting features.

The government has argued that doing so would prove a financial burden. But Robertson said that making one change — adding a raised numeral — would have increased the government's $4.2-billion cost of manufacturing currency over the last decade by only 5%.

"Of the more than 180 countries that issue paper currency, only the United States prints bills that are identical in size and color in all their denominations," the judge wrote.

That puts blind and low-vision individuals at the risk of being cheated if they are unable to identify the value of paper money without help from others, he said.

The issue has divided the visually impaired community, with some believing that the ruling reinforces negative stereotypes.

"We believe in solving real problems of discrimination — not in doing gimmicks that look like they solve a problem and could make things actually worse," James Gashel, executive director for strategic initiatives at the National Federation of the Blind, said Wednesday. "For a federal court to say that we are being discriminated against is simply wrong."

But the American Council of the Blind, which filed the lawsuit four years ago, was "very happy" with the ruling, said Executive Director Melanie Brunson.

"We don't see it as a negative, and we believe that it could improve opportunities for blind people," she said, enabling them to work at cash registers or as vendors.

According to the National Institutes of Health, about 3 million Americans have a visual impairment that cannot be corrected with glasses or contact lenses.

Vendors Protest Mandated Currency Changes For Blind (WT)

By Bryce Baschuk

The Washington Times, November 30, 2006

The vending machine industry would have to spend hundreds of millions of dollars so its machines could handle new currency that blind people could use if a new ruling on U.S. bills is enforced.

U.S. District Judge James Robertson ruled Tuesday that the current bills discriminate against blind people. He ordered the Treasury Department to find a solution.

"If the government is mandated to change U.S. currency, there would be a tremendous financial impact across a number of industries, including the automated vending industry," said Jim Brinton, a director of the National Automatic Merchandising Association (NAMA), a trade association of the food and refreshment vending industry.

There are 7 million food and beverage machines in the United States, and 1.5 million of them accept both $1 and $5 bills, according to NAMA.

The vending machine industry would have to spend an estimated $200 to $300 to retrofit each machine, Mr. Brinton said.

"I couldn't afford to spend $300 per machine. I simply wouldn't be able to do it," said Mr. Brinton, who is also the president of Evergreen Food Services Inc., a vending company in Tukwila, Wash.

The American Council of the Blind filed the lawsuit against the government in 2002, saying U.S. currency should be redesigned to help blind and visually impaired people distinguish among denominations.

"We're not deliberately setting out to overturn American industries," said Melanie Brunson, executive director of the American Council of the Blind in Washington.

"We wanted the government to add accessibility [to the U.S. currency], and we wanted to make it an issue while our currency was being redesigned," she said.

Ms. Brunson couldn't say exactly what impact the decision might have on the nation's industries, but conceded that "the cost to retrofit vending machines could be somewhat substantial."

NAMA filed a brief during the trial, noting that a decision to change U.S. currency would cost the vending industry substantial amounts.

Metro officials yesterday could not estimate how much it would cost to retrofit their fare-card machines to handle new currency.

"A lot will depend on what the U.S. Treasury will do," said Stephen Taubenkibel, a representative from the Washington Metropolitan Area Transit Authority.

Metro's fare-card machines accept denominations of $1, $5, $10 and $20.

"At this point, it's too early to tell what the impact would be on our vending machines," he said.

Treasury has 10 days to file an appeal based on financial and administrative burden.

Government attorneys argued during the trial that changing the size of currency could cost up to $228 million in initial costs and $52 million annually to make currency in different sizes.

The least expensive change, adding a raised numeral, would cost $45.5 million initially and $16 million annually. The government estimated it would have to spend an additional $70 million to $90 million in public education for any changes.

The National Federation of the Blind (NFB) criticized the decision yesterday, saying it misinforms the public about the abilities of blind people. The organization of blind people has more than 50,000 members.

"This ruling puts a roadblock in the way of solving the real problem, which is the 70 percent unemployment rate among working-age blind Americans that severely limits our access to cash," said NFB President Marc Maurer. "The ruling will do nothing to alleviate that situation."

Blind people have developed ways to identify denominations by folding bills in different ways. Readily available machines identify paper money as well, the nonprofit said.

Mr. Maurer said the decision hurts public perception of blind people's capabilities.

"It argues that the blind cannot handle currency or documents in the workplace and that virtually everything must be modified for the use of the blind."

Justices Hear Cases Related To Global Warming, Banking Regulation (WSJ)

By Jess Bravin And Mark H. Anderson

The Wall Street Journal, November 30, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The Supreme Court heard arguments in two fights between the federal government and states, one a closely watched case on emissions that may cause global warming, the other a dispute over bank regulation.

The environmental case involved carbon-dioxide emissions and other "greenhouse gases" blamed by many scientists for global warming. Joined by environmental groups, Massachusetts and 11 other states have urged that the administration regulate such gases as pollutants.

Read the case docket1 in Massachusetts v. EPA, courtesy of FindLaw2.

The administration, reversing a Clinton administration opinion, argued that such emissions don't fall under the Clean Air Act's definition of pollutants -- adding that even if they did, the agency need not regulate them because of uncertainty and a preference for international action over a unilateral approach.

The states contend the law requires the Environmental Protection Agency at least to begin the formal process that could lead to regulation. A federal appeals court rejected the argument, and the Supreme Court appeared sharply divided on whether states had standing to sue over their claim.

"I thought standing requires imminent harm," said Justice Antonin Scalia. "When is the predictable cataclysm?"

Massachusetts Assistant Attorney General James Milkey, representing the states, told the court his state has been harmed by the EPA's refusal to regulate automobile emissions through, among other things, loss of land from rising oceans. "It's not so much a cataclysm as an ongoing harm," he said.

Justice Anthony Kennedy appeared to be the swing vote. The court's conservative justices appeared prepared to side with the federal government, while more moderate to liberal justices appeared ready to order additional deliberations in the case.

Deputy Solicitor General Gregory Garre told the court that "this is an extraordinarily complex area of science" in which the EPA deserves deference from federal courts on its regulatory decisions. He also cautioned that EPA regulation could have a significant economic impact.

(Massachusetts v. Environmental Protection Agency)

The bank case involved an effort by some states to assert authority over mortgage lenders that federal officials say they can pre-empt.

Michigan asked the court to strike down a federal policy that pre-empts state consumer laws for state-chartered operating subsidiaries owned by national banks but affords those banks liability protections under state law.

A win for Michigan could open the door to tougher state consumer protections, while making it costlier for banks to do business because they must meet each state's rules.

U.S. banking regulation is governed by a system in which banks themselves select which entity will regulate them -- the federal Office of the Comptroller of the Currency or a state banking agency. This dual banking oversight has led to competition between federal and state regulators seeking to sign up banks, which support the agencies' budgets with regulatory fees.

State banking regulators traditionally have charged lower fees and claimed to be more nimble in responding to local needs than their federal counterparts. But the OCC has lured banks with its power to pre-empt state laws. Federal courts have construed that power broadly, allowing the OCC to set aside state and local laws that limit automatic-teller machine fees, require additional disclosures to consumers, and impose other burdens.

But as banking companies have expanded and gotten more complex, it has become harder to tell which entities controlled by national banks remain susceptible to at least some state regulation.

Michigan maintained that its consumer-protection laws applied to state-licensed mortgage-lending subsidiaries owned by national banks. The OCC disagreed, concluding that since a national bank could engage in mortgage lending free from state oversight, so could a state-licensed operating subsidiary.

Michigan lost in the lower courts, and the Supreme Court's decision to hear the case was a surprise. When granting review, the justices hinted of broader constitutional concerns, asking attorneys to consider how the 10th Amendment, which reserves unspecified powers to the states, fits into the puzzle.

At oral arguments, the justices asked no 10th Amendment questions. Questioning Wachovia Bank attorney Robert Long, Chief Justice John Roberts suggested the bank wanted to have its cake "and eat it too," by pre-empting Michigan laws against predatory lending, while being shielded from any liability the subsidiary might incur. Mr. Long didn't dispute the liability protections of structuring the business that way, but said "managerial reasons" made the state subsidiary-national bank parent model a "useful tool of banking."

Federal Oversight Of Banks Risks Abuse, States Argue (WP)

By Tomoeh Murakami Tse

The Washington Post, November 30, 2006

All 50 states and the District of Columbia yesterday urged the Supreme Court to overturn lower court rulings that they said would give federal authorities the ability to block states from prosecuting financial institutions for predatory lending practices.

In oral arguments, the justices posed tough questions about the implications of a mortgage-lending case that could affect the way state-chartered subsidiaries of national banks are regulated. Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. expressed concern about the banks' apparent effort to seek immunity from state regulations, but other justices suggested that banks are stumbling under excessive regulation by being required to report to both state and federal officials.

The case, Watters v. Wachovia Bank, is the latest in a series of legal skirmishes between state officials and the banking industry. Although the case centers on the lending practices of banks, legal experts said that it has broader implications for other industries that are also regulated on both the state and federal levels, in such areas as transportation safety, civil rights and environmental protection.

At issue is whether state-chartered subsidiaries of national banks should be subject to the regulations of state governments or be solely under the purview of the federal Office of the Comptroller of the Currency.

For 35 years, states have regulated the mortgage-lending practices of state-chartered subsidiaries of national banks. The parent national banks are regulated by the OCC. In 2001, the OCC ruled that those lenders should be overseen by the federal government under the National Banking Act of 1864, not by state regulators. And in 2003, officials at North Carolina-based Wachovia decided that their state-chartered subsidiaries, which are mortgage lenders but are not themselves banks, would no longer abide by the regulations of local jurisdictions and would answer only to the OCC. Michigan protested, so Wachovia sued for release from state oversight. The bank won on the lower court levels, and Michigan appealed to the Supreme Court.

Critics of the OCC have long said the federal agency falls short in consumer protection and that it bases its regulatory decisions on maintaining the banks' safety and soundness.

In oral arguments, E. John Blanchard, who represented Michigan and whose case is supported by the 49 other states, argued that "preemption" of local authority by the OCC would prevent states from protecting their residents. "Michigan and the states want to be able to help their citizens with abusive and predatory lending complaints," he said.

A lawyer for the banking industry countered that courts have long acknowledged the primacy of federal regulators over local authorities when evaluating large banks and that this instance was no different. Bankers have also complained of the burden of excessive regulation on the local and federal levels.

"The court has recognized for a century that in that area, when national banks have powers, including incidental powers recognized by the comptroller, they generally preempt any state law," said Robert A. Long Jr., who represents Wachovia, but whose case is supported by the entire banking industry.

Roberts said it seemed that banks wanted to be viewed as federally governed on regulation issues but state-based to shelter themselves from liability issues. "You are really trying to have your cake and eat it too," he said.

Justice John Paul Stevens questioned whether the OCC had the manpower to handle the increased responsibility it took when it preempted state law in 2001. He asked specifically how many additional investigators the OCC had hired when it took over this responsibility.

"Well, I don't have an empirical answer to that question," said Sri Srinivasan, assistant to the solicitor general of the Justice Department.

Justice David H. Souter, however, noted that banks could be forced to go through two separate rounds of inspection -- state and federal. "Regulation costs the regulated entity something," he said. "It is a burden on them."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

US Is Said To Probe Bay State Elections (BOS)

By Donovan Slack And Yvonne Abraham, Globe Staff

The Boston Globe, November 30, 2006

At issue is access by disabled voters

The US Department of Justice has launched an investigation into the state's failure to ensure that equipment for disabled voters was provided at polling places across Massachusetts during this year's elections, according to three people who spoke with federal investigators this week.

Two investigators from the voting section of the Justice Department's Civil Rights Division -- trial lawyer James "Nick" Boeving and special litigation counsel Susana Lorenzo-Giguere -- are to arrive in Boston today to begin gathering documents and conducting interviews, according to one of the two people.

Boeving is planning to inquire about the state's failure to comply with the federal Help America Vote Act, which requires that every polling place have at least one machine that allows disabled people to vote privately and independently, said Brenda Wright, managing attorney at the Boston-based National Voting Rights Institute. Wright received a call from a Department of Justice lawyer Tuesday.

Problems with access for disabled voters would be just the latest accusation to plague election officials in Massachusetts, where irregularities in four cities have been investigated in recent years. Boston agreed last year to federal monitoring after the Justice Department accused the city of failing to protect the rights of voters with limited English skills. In September's primary, workers failed to count hundreds of ballots, and in the final election some 30 polling places ran out of ballots.

"The investigating attorney appeared to be looking at the question of whether the state is in compliance with the HAVA requirements," Wright said. "They seemed to be aware of the press reports that have been fairly clear in indicating the state was not going to be in compliance, either in the primary or the general" elections.

Wright said the attorney was looking for people who had monitored polling places across the state on Election Day and that investigators would speak with advocates from voting rights and disability rights organizations. Giovanna Negretti, executive director of the voting advocacy group F;Oiste?, and another person who asked not to be named said the attorney also appeared to be interested in other election irregularities.

Justice Department spokeswoman Cynthia Magnuson would neither confirm nor deny the existence of an investigation.

The 2002 Help America Vote Act requires that states provide voting machines that are accessible to the disabled in every polling place by this year's elections. Secretary of State William F. Galvin said in October that Massachusetts would fall short in at least two-thirds of the state's 1,700 polling places.

Galvin said last night that he had not been notified of the federal probe, though he added, "I'm not surprised."

"I'm sure we'll cooperate with them as we always do," Galvin said. "We'll be happy to review with them exactly what we've done."

He said that his office has been testing various types of equipment for disabled voters and that he plans to decide which to purchase in the coming months and have them in polling places by the presidential election in 2008. Galvin said his staff has been meeting with a monitor from the Justice Department who is aware of the state's failure to meet this year's deadline.

Nearly two weeks ago, a coalition of 16 voting and civil rights groups called on Governor-elect Deval L. Patrick to appoint an independent commission to investigate Galvin's oversight of the elections. The coalition, which includes the Institute for Race and Justice at Harvard Law School, the American Civil Liberties Union of Massachusetts, and Common Cause of Massachusetts, charged that disabled and minority voters' rights have been violated repeatedly in recent years in several municipalities, including Boston and Springfield.

"The reality here is that the vast majority of communities in the state were not at all providing the kind of accessibility that is required under HAVA," said John Bonifaz, founder and general counsel of the National Voting Rights Institute, who ran against Galvin in this year's Democratic primary. Bonifaz and others said that responsibility for compliance with federal requirements is Galvin's.

Voting problems in Massachusetts in recent years have resulted not only in the lawsuit filed by the US Department of Justice against the City of Boston regarding voters with limited English skills, but also Justice Department probes in Lowell, Lawrence, and Springfield. In September's primary, a recount in a Boston Senate district was triggered by the discovery of uncounted ballots, and, in the final election this month, some 30 Boston polling stations ran out of ballots as crowds were forced to wait.

A Harvard University elections consultant hired by Mayor Thomas M. Menino said yesterday that the Boston problems came about in part because the city's Election Department is understaffed, poorly trained, and ill-prepared to make problem-solving decisions to avert crises.

Giving his initial impressions of the Election Department in an interview with the Globe, David King said the department has "no effective mechanism for saying: 'This is priority one. This is priority two.' "

King, who is to issue a report early next year, plans a thorough investigation before making detailed recommendations in March. Still, he said numerous problems are evident.

A four-member Election Commission charged under city law with overseeing the department has not met or exerted any authority for years. There are only three members, and all are employees of the Election Department, a situation that King says makes the commission vulnerable to political pressure.

King also said that "training within the department needs to be dramatically improved."

Election Commissioner Geraldine Cuddyer, in an interview with the Globe yesterday, said the department is doing the best it can with the resources it has. She declined to comment about what happened during this month's election because Galvin's office has launched an investigation of the election.

King began reviewing documents and speaking with election employees last week.

He said task force members reported several concerns aside from ballot shortages during this month's election. They said that on Election Day, roughly 70 special touch-screen voting machines for the disabled did not record votes; that there were no Spanish-speaking workers in at least one East Boston precinct, and that several polling places in Dorchester and Roxbury were not accessible to the handicapped, King said.

Texas Seeks Approval Of Election Date (AP)

By Suzanne Gamboa, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 30, 2006

WASHINGTON — Texas is asking the Justice Department to approve Dec. 12 for a congressional runoff election - a date opposed by a Latino civil rights group because it is a religious day for many Hispanics.

The runoff between incumbent Republican Henry Bonilla and Democrat Ciro Rodriguez, a former congressman, is in Texas' 23rd congressional district, which includes portions of San Antonio. The district was redrawn after the U.S. Supreme Court ruled previous boundaries discriminated against Latino voters.

Dec. 12 is the Feast of the Virgin of Guadalupe, the patron saint of Mexico and Latin America. The League of United Latin American Citizens (LULAC) wants the election held on Dec. 19, arguing that the earlier date discriminates against Hispanic voters and benefits Bonilla, whose support among Latinos has eroded.

States like Texas that have had a history of voting discrimination against minority groups are required under federal law to get Justice Department approval, known as preclearance, of election changes or decisions.

Texas officials, who filed the date request Tuesday, said the state doesn't need federal approval because a court ordered the runoff election set for the earliest time possible.

Scott Haywood, spokesman for the Texas secretary of state, said he doesn't believe his office knew the date was a Latino holy day, but putting the runoff back another week would push the election into Hanukkah, which begins at sundown Dec. 15, and close to Christmas.

"The date ordered is fully compliant with the law," he said.

Luis Vera Jr., national counsel for LULAC and Rodriguez's campaign treasurer in the runoff, said he will ask the Justice Department to reject Dec. 12.

"The vast majority of Hispanics in South Texas are Latinos and they honor that day," Vera said. "They way it works, they go to Mass, go to work and then go to Mass. They fast. They pray. They are in church all night. ... Voting is way at the bottom of the list." Some communities also hold processions and family gatherings.

After the district was redrawn to restore Latino voting strength, the congressional race drew eight contenders. Bonilla led with 49 percent of the vote, just under the 50 percent required to win. That prompted the runoff with Rodriguez, the next highest vote-getter at 20 percent.

Sharpton And Jesse Jackson Lead Angry Group To Site Of Deadly Police Shooting (NYT)

By Sewell Chan And Daryl Khan

The New York Times, November 30, 2006

The Revs. Jesse Jackson and Al Sharpton led relatives and community members on an angry and emotional visit yesterday morning to the Queens street where Sean Bell, an unarmed 23-year-old black man, was shot to death in a hail of police bullets early Saturday morning.

As the two civil rights leaders led their group, police officers continued searching the site for evidence yesterday, and investigators were seeking additional witnesses.

The police were trying to locate a man who may have been in Mr. Bell's car on Saturday morning and another who witnesses say was at the heart of arguments outside Club Kalua, a cabaret, with groups that included Mr. Bell. That man was last seen dressed in black and standing in front of a sport utility vehicle with silver wheels in the moments before the shooting. It is unclear what role, if any, he played, the police said.

The police described the man who may have been in Mr. Bell's car as being last seen wearing a beige jacket and running away from the shooting onto 95th Avenue, the police said.

As investigators working on the case seek the two men, the police are asking everyone arrested in the city whether they have any information about the case.

The case has attracted national attention, a fact underscored by the arrival of Mr. Jackson and by a call from Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg to Bruce S. Gordon, president and chief executive of the N.A.A.C.P., which wants the Justice Department to review whether the shooting violated federal civil rights laws. Mr. Jackson echoed that sentiment yesterday.

Mr. Gordon said the mayor, who has made fighting poverty a priority of his second term, had expressed interest in improving education and job opportunities for young black men. "I at least find his approach to be refreshing," Mr. Gordon said, "but in no way am I comforted, because this incident just points out the disparities and abuses in the system that have to be changed."

On Monday the mayor called the shooting "excessive," a characterization that Gov. George E. Pataki agreed with.

"Obviously, 50 bullets fired into or at an unarmed individual in New York is excessive force," Mr. Pataki said yesterday in a news conference broadcast by satellite from Kuwait, "but the appropriate response to that is something that I think the investigation of the mayor and the police commissioner will reveal."

Mr. Sharpton hinted yesterday that he might call for a shopping boycott to protest the shooting.

Shortly before 9 a.m., Mr. Sharpton and Mr. Jackson led elected officials and clergy members to the spot in Jamaica, Queens, where five officers fired 50 shots at Mr. Bell's car during a confrontation in which he drove into one of the officers and an unmarked police van. Two friends of Mr. Bell, Trent Benefield, 23, and Joseph Guzman, 31, were also in the car and were seriously wounded.

On Liverpool Street, at an impromptu sidewalk memorial of white carnations, red roses, candles and photographs taped to a brick wall, Mr. Bell's aunt, the Rev. Diane Shepherd-Oliver, a minister at the New Life Temple of Praise in Syracuse, called for God's help. "Pray for the policemen and the other individuals who are injured," she said.

Mr. Bell's parents, William and Valerie, and his fiancée, Nicole Paultre, whom he was to wed the day he was killed, were among those in the group.

"We appeal to people: Don't do anything disruptive or in any way contrary to the memory of Sean Bell," Mr. Sharpton said. "We do not want the world to see him as anything other than what he was. He was not violent. He was not a thug. He was not in the street. Don't use your anger to distort who he was."

Mr. Jackson said of the shooting: "This is a symbol, not an aberration. Our criminal justice system has broken down for black Americans and the young black males."

Mr. Guzman's sister, Yolanda, who has been at his bedside at Mary Immaculate Hospital, said of her brother, whom she helped raise: "He's critical. He cannot talk. He has 19 holes in him."

Mr. Guzman's companion, Ebony Browning, squeezed the hand of their son, Juan, 6, and lighted a candle and taped up a photo of Mr. Guzman. "Pray for my child and pray for my husband, too," she said.

Police Commissioner Looks Ahead, And Back (NYT)

By Patrick Healy

The New York Times, November 30, 2006

Police Commissioner Raymond W. Kelly has overseen the streets of New York for the last five years in the style of a global warrior against terrorism. With a self-confidence that strikes some people as imperious, and some as impressive, Mr. Kelly has created a network of police officials overseas, recruited former C.I.A. officers and built a 1,000-member terror unit.

Yet over the last few days, Mr. Kelly has had to return to an earlier, less-novel role: the face of a police department involved in yet another public furor, this one a fatal shooting that has the makings of a combustible controversy involving race, politics and the police use of deadly force.

Mr. Kelly's role in the investigation and his handling of that shooting in Jamaica, Queens last Saturday, in which a young black bridegroom died, has all but been a flashback to his first tour as commissioner, in 1992 and 1993. Then, as the choice of New York's first black mayor in the aftermath of confrontations in Crown Heights, Brooklyn, Mr. Kelly took charge at a moment of considerable daily violence and raw racial emotion, in a city of metastasizing mistrust between black and Hispanic New Yorkers and police officers.

Those tensions have in some ways eased, and Mr. Kelly's relationship with police critics like the Rev. Al Sharpton is good enough that the two men talked just hours after the Queens shooting. The commissioner said in an interview: "We have an arms-length relationship, but we've dealt with each other for years, and I've always found him to be forthright. He is telling it as he sees it, and not being duplicitous in any way. I think he would say the same about me."

Mr. Kelly also took the more forceful step of putting the five officers who together fired 50 rounds in the 4 a.m. confrontation with the group of young black and Hispanic men on paid administrative leave and stripping them of their weapons.

But the return to this delicate public role as a truly local commissioner also brings new complications for Mr. Kelly, 65. He is routinely discussed in political circles as a possible candidate for mayor in 2009, something he has not ruled out, and his actions are apt to be seen as having potential political consequences.

He is also, for the moment, caught between a mayor who has called the shooting "inexplicable," an array of black leaders who want answers that Mr. Kelly has yet to deliver, and his own officers.

"This is a tough situation for everybody involved, and especially Ray," said former Mayor David N. Dinkins, who named Mr. Kelly commissioner more than a decade ago. "He's a straight arrow and I would expect the best from him. There's also a lot of people who expect a lot from Ray in this."

Mr. Kelly said that he is as comfortable as ever being the face of the police in a controversy, though he is not so cocky as to predict outcomes.

"I think you build relationships, and you can go back to other incidents perhaps where people relied on something I've said or I've done, and hopefully that's built up a certain level of trust," Mr. Kelly said. "You hope that is something that is going to play a role."

"I've always prided myself on being forthright and open with the community, and not holding very much back — what you see is what you get with me," he added.

In the hours after the shooting and since then, Mr. Kelly has been more visible than usual in his take-charge role, and it has been far from simple.

He was at the scene in Queens within hours of the shooting, and spent the day gathering details and sharing them with the mayor's office, other leaders, and Mr. Sharpton, who was designated as an adviser by the family of the slain man, Sean Bell. Mr. Kelly delivered the city's explanation of the shooting, at a news conference that night.

The next day, Sunday, Mr. Kelly took the guns from the officers.

"There were, and are, still too many unanswered questions," Mr. Kelly said in the interview. "It's a privilege to have a gun; you don't have a right to have a gun."

And on Monday, the commissioner calmly answered his critics at a private meeting with black leaders and department critics, including one who called for Mr. Kelly's resignation. He also found himself standing by as Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg described the 50 shots that killed Mr. Bell as unacceptable.

Later that day, on an NY1 News political talk show, Mr. Kelly was no longer discussing Qaeda sleeper cells and was instead trying to address all sides in the Queens case.

"The mayor is certainly entitled to his opinion," he said on NY1. "I think we need an in-depth examination of all the facts. It is unusual to have this number of shots fired."

Explaining police culture in pithy, made-for-television language is not always a skill commissioners possess, but it is a trademark of Mr. Kelly's — not to mention a political asset, said Lee Brown, who preceded Mr. Kelly as commissioner under Mr. Dinkins.

"Ray brings, to any issue, his experience as a well-educated, well-trained, well-disciplined former marine who knows how to talk like people talk," Mr. Brown said. "When things occur, like his work with us in restoring calm in Crown Heights, you can expect him to stand on that foundation."

Mr. Kelly has earned some praise for sharing information with sometime critics like Mr. Sharpton, even if doing so made him seem unconcerned with irritating some of Mr. Sharpton's detractors in his department.

Mr. Sharpton had his own blunt way of saying what is still at stake for Mr. Kelly.

"Ray Kelly's word is seen as good in a lot of our community, but now his word is on trial," Mr. Sharpton said. "He has to come up with more definitive answers about why this young man was shot and killed in Queens. I think this is the greatest challenge of his career. It could result in Ray Kelly having a halo around his head, or the undoing of a very popular image."

But there are also skeptics, and there is anger. Complaints about Mr. Kelly this week have boiled down to this: Despite his personal touch, relations between the police and minorities remain in many ways strained, and sometimes explosive.

"Ray Kelly may be the same man who was police commissioner under Mayor Dinkins, but I think he is a different kind of commissioner today, and that worries me," said the Rev. Charles L. Norris, pastor of Bethesda Missionary Baptist Church, in Jamaica. "I'm not confident anymore that he is solving the problem."

Mr. Kelly said he has a long history inside the department and as a government official in Washington of improving the culture of agencies, combating racial profiling, and holding his own people accountable. He also said his diplomatic skills in times of crisis have not atrophied in the years that his focus has been pulled toward domestic security, an effort that is without precedent in the department.

He cited the case of Timothy Stansbury Jr., the unarmed 19-year-old who was fatally shot by a police officer in Bedford-Stuyvesant, Brooklyn, in 2004, as an instance in which, early on, he judged a shooting to be unjustified.

"In the Stansbury case, we had information because of statements from the nonshooting officers, so we put out the information," Mr. Kelly said. "We don't have enough information yet in this case. I make a determination about what to say based only on the facts."

Some observers have said that Mr. Kelly's recent reimmersion into the world of shootings and racial politics and the perceptions of police officers in southeast Queens, rather than those in Scotland Yard, may have a political payoff if he indeed runs for mayor. Mr. Kelly said he was not thinking about 2009, but declined to flatly rule out a bid. If it is not on Mr. Kelly's mind, though, his performance this week nevertheless has displayed some political prowess.

"I think the way he conducts himself in front of the press, acting as the objective conveyer of information, while still appealing to everybody to reserve judgment, shows how he would handle a city crisis, political or otherwise," said Richard Aborn, president of the Citizens Crime Commission, a nonpartisan group that monitors police policies in New York. "You can't see every police commissioner as a political candidate, but you can with Ray."

Badges, Guns And Another Unarmed Victim (NYT)

By Bob Herbert

This time it was 50 shots from five officers. With Amadou Diallo it was 41 shots from four officers. With Eleanor Bumpurs, an aging, overweight, disoriented grandmother, it was a pair of shotgun blasts from a single officer — inside her apartment!

The decades pass. The stories remain the same. Nathaniel Gaines Jr., a 25-year-old Navy veteran, was shot to death by a cop on a subway platform in the Bronx on the Fourth of July in 1996. The mayor at the time, Rudolph Giuliani, no softy on crime, said of the shooting: "There does not seem to be any reason for it."

On an April morning in 1973 a veteran cop named Thomas Shea pulled his service revolver and blew away a black kid on a street in Jamaica, Queens. There was no reason on God's glittering earth for that killing. The kid, Clifford Glover, was 10 years old. The cop shot him in the back.

On Thanksgiving Day in 1976 an officer named Robert Torsney fired a bullet into the head of Randolph Evans, 15, outside a housing project in Brooklyn. No one could explain that killing, either.

Yesterday, under an overcast sky and with a crush of reporters around them, the relatives and fiancée of Sean Bell visited the narrow street in Queens where he was killed in a sudden frantic fusillade of police bullets early last Saturday morning, just a few hours before he was to be married.

Mr. Bell and two friends who had attended his bachelor party at a nearby club were in his car when they were set upon by a group of undercover cops who had been staking out the club. The two friends were seriously wounded in the shooting.

Here is my first quick take on this case: If I was in my car outside a rowdy nightclub in the wee hours of the morning and someone who looked like a club patron came running toward me, screaming and waving a gun, I would immediately slam the gearshift into drive, hit the accelerator and try to get the hell out of there.

This appears to be what happened. The cops, dressed to blend in with the club crowd, were single-mindedly looking for trouble — evidence of prostitution, underage drinking, illegal guns, and so forth. They were looking so hard for criminal behavior that they seem to have imagined it where none was occurring.

One officer is said to have believed that one of Mr. Bell's companions may have had a gun. No gun was found and there is no evidence that any of the three men were armed at any time.

"It sounds to me like excessive force was used," said Mayor Michael Bloomberg, who characterized the 50-shot barrage as "unacceptable" and "inexplicable." Referring to Mr. Bell and his two friends, the mayor said, "There is no evidence that they were doing anything wrong."

The thing that is most unacceptable about this case is not the total number of shots fired, but the fact that five New York City cops were so willing to begin firing at all — willing to take the life of another human being, and maybe a number of human beings — without ever establishing that there was a good reason for doing so.

Under Mayor Bloomberg, there is a much better tone in the city with regard to police-community relations, and race relations in general. But when it comes to the Police Department, an improved tone won't count for much if policies and procedures aren't changed to prevent cops from blowing away innocent individuals with impunity.

This has gone on for far too many decades. Yet there is still no sense among public officials that big changes are necessary. The cops who killed Sean Bell and wounded his two friends haven't even been questioned yet by the police or investigators from the Queens district attorney's office. The D.A., Richard Brown, is preparing a grand jury investigation but he told me it could still be weeks before the cops are questioned.

Meanwhile, the community, which is sick of these killings, is simmering. Along with the candles and flower arrangements that have been placed at the site of the shooting were bitter signs denouncing "police murder" and, in some instances, calling for violence.

The Rev. Al Sharpton, who represents the Bell family, has publicly called for patience and calm. But he added, and I agree, that the mayor and Police Commissioner Ray Kelly have an obligation to develop effective new strategies for reining in reckless police behavior.

The crucial first step, in my opinion, is to insist that police officers, including those who are black, recognize the essential humanity of all the people they are supposed to be protecting and serving. Not everyone with dark skin is a perp.

Officer Accused Of Lying In '01 Wreck (AJC)

By S.a. Reid, The Atlanta Journal-constitution

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, November 30, 2006

An Atlanta narcotics officer tied to last week's deadly drug raid on a elderly woman's home was the subject of a 2002 lawsuit that said he "fabricated" the events that led to his head-on traffic collision with a motorcyclist.

That rider, Samuel T. Gulley Jr., received a $450,000 payment from the city last year to settle his claims against Officer Arthur B. Tesler, the city and the Atlanta Police Department. The civil case was dismissed from Fulton County State Court after the settlement in September 2005.

That lawsuit alleged Tesler and other unnamed officers "fabricated traffic charges against Plaintiff, ignored evidence ... and improperly initiated criminal proceedings" against Gulley to cover up the fact that Tesler was at fault in the accident that left Gulley with a broken pelvis and broken leg.

Now the credibility of Tesler and other officers involved in last week's killing is being called into question. Tesler was one of two officers who told a judge they directed a confidential informant through the process of an undercover drug buy at the house occupied by Kathryn Johnston, according to court records.

After the fatal raid, the informant told the Atlanta police internal affairs unit and a local television station that he wasn't involved in the buy that led to the shooting, and that police officers asked him to fabricate his role in the incident.

Denies allegations in lawsuit

In a phone interview, Tesler denied the allegations in the lawsuit but refused to discuss the matter in detail. He said he was aware that the city had settled the traffic case but didn't know the amount.

He refused to comment on the drug raid.

"I really don't want to comment on anything or on any other specific cases until everything is done with," he said in a telephone interview Tuesday.

Tesler is one of seven narcotics officers and one sergeant on administrative leave pending the outcome of internal, state and federal investigations into the Nov. 21 firefight between three drug officers and Johnston, who was buried Tuesday. Johnston has been identified as 88 years old by authorities but as 92 by family and friends.

Johnston fired on the officers, wounding all three, after they broke down the front door of her Neal Street home in an attempt to serve a "no-knock" search warrant. She died from gunshots to her chest and extremities.

Gulley, who accused Tesler in the civil case, did not return calls left with his father. Steven Barnhart, his lawyer in the case, on Wednesday doubted that Gulley would be willing to talk.

In his lawsuit, Gulley said he was seriously injured when Tesler's patrol car hit his motorcycle head-on after the officer swung wide as he pulled out of a parking lot and into his southbound lane, going the wrong way, the night of May 27, 2001, on Marietta Boulevard in northwest Atlanta.

The lawsuit accused Tesler of giving an inaccurate description of the events leading up to the accident, which resulted in traffic charges against Gulley that were later dropped.

Deputy City Attorney Jerry DeLoach said Gulley's injuries and medical expenses, as well as liability issues, justified the $450,000 settlement, which shouldn't be considered an admission of guilt.

"Looking at all the facts and evidence," he said, "we thought it would be to the city's advantage and the employee's advantage if we minimized our exposure."

A police report written by Officer Jackson Christopher listed Tesler as the victim and suggested that Gulley ran into the officer's police cruiser.

Tesler's account had him pursuing a fleeing suspect when he pulled out. But Tesler didn't alert radio dispatchers to the chase because of heavy radio traffic, according to court papers. The lawsuit contradicted Tesler's account by alleging that the officer was on routine patrol and didn't have his emergency lights or siren on at impact.

Christopher issued Tesler a ticket for driving on the wrong side of the road, according to Barnhart.

The traffic citation was dropped when Christopher and Gulley failed to appear at Tesler's hearing, court papers said. Christopher was away on military duty at the time and Gulley was recovering from the wreck.

Gulley suffered serious injuries in the crash that sent him to the hospital for more than 90 days and left him with more than $90,000 in medical bills.

Based on Tesler's account, Christopher charged Gulley with driving under the influence, failure to yield to an emergency vehicle, reckless driving, driving too fast for conditions, failure to maintain lane and driving with an expired tag, Barnhart said. Christopher also was named as a defendant in the civil lawsuit.

Bbood alcohol level below legal limit

Subsequent test results showed Gulley's blood alcohol level to be below the legal limit, Barnhart said.

The city's solicitor's office abandoned the failure to yield to an emergency vehicle charge, Barnhart said. All the other charges, except driving with an expired tag, were eventually dismissed, Barnhart said.

"I think it was pretty stupid," Barnhart said, adding that the accident report didn't support the alleged violations. "The charges were clearly false. The only way to avoid liability is to say he was chasing a subject. Otherwise, he was a negligent driver himself."

Tesler received a written reprimand after an office of professional standards investigation found that he had violated department policy regarding the operation of city vehicles, according to court papers.

Atlanta police officials deferred to the FBI, the lead investigative agency in the fatal drug bust case, on questions regarding the case and his punishment. FBI officials declined to comment.

Informant In Shooting Of Elderly Woman Has String Of Drug Arrests (AJC)

By Bill Torpy, Rhonda Cook, The Atlanta Journal-constitution

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, November 30, 2006

The confidential informant who says police told him to lie about his role in a drug bust that led police to kill an elderly Atlanta woman is a petty criminal with a series of drug arrests in the past few years.

The informant, Alexis Antonio White, 24, has said he was told to cover the police and lie about activities at the home of Kathryn Johnston, who was killed in an exchange of gunfire with three officers who burst into her northwest Atlanta home Nov. 21.

White, whose identity was confirmed by law enforcement officials, is now in protective custody as federal, state and Fulton County officials try to sort out what happened in the raid.

White's background and honesty are likely to be taken into consideration as law enforcement agencies, led by the FBI, reach a conclusion about whether to believe the police officers or a suspected drug dealer-turned-informant.

Informants are a necessary evil in developing drug cases but they are frequently untrustworthy, said Steve Sadow, an Atlanta defense attorney who is an expert on Georgia law. He has no connection to the case.

"How do you prove he's right or wrong?" Sadow asked. "How do you prove the informant is now lying?"

He said it is important to find out if the informant was being paid by police or was working for them trying to stay out of prison.

In recent days, White, known as Alex, approached WAGA-TV and told the station that he has worked with police for four years as an informant. Records show he has been arrested at least once during that time on drug charges — last year, when he was charged with carrying 48 bags of marijuana. Police said he refused to stop his car for several blocks and his car reeked of pot.

Outside of arrest records and court documents, not much could be learned about White, who at 17 was detained after jumping the gate at a MARTA station and who was arrested later on theft and drug charges. He has been convicted of at least one cocaine-related charge and served two years' probation, records show.

A list of numerous arrests stretching back over the past seven years has him living at six different apartments.

Atlanta police in a 2001 arrest report noted White's occupation as "drug dealer." He was 19 at the time.

In that arrest, White was standing at a gas station parking lot on Bankhead Highway leaning inside a car in what appeared to be a drug transaction, according to records. The arresting officer said he recognized White from a previous drug arrest. A search found suspected crack cocaine. The man he was selling drugs to was driving a stolen car.

Police Chief Richard Pennington this week confirmed that the informant had told investigators that he was never at the house where Johnston was killed and that police asked him to lie about the events surrounding the case. Pennington said the investigation will determine if White is telling the truth.

The chief declined Wednesday to speak about White.

Seven narcotics officers and a supervisor are on administrative leave pending the investigation's outcome.

In an affidavit for a search warrant filed about an hour before the shooting, narcotics officers told a judge that an informant bought $50 worth of crack cocaine from a man named Sam at the house.

Their sworn statement was sufficient to convince a magistrate to provide them a "no-knock" search warrant, which allowed them to smash through the front door without announcing themselves first.

This week, the informant told WAGA-TV that he was never at the house, that police told him after the shooting that "you need to cover our [rear]. ... It's all on you man. ... You need to tell them about this Sam dude." According to the WAGA report, the informant said Sam didn't exist.

WXIA-TV, November 30, 2006

The New Black Panther Party held another meeting Wednesday night. This one focused on the 14 officer involved shootings in DeKalb County.

The meeting at Atlanta's Tupac Amaru Shakur Center for the Arts went on for hours with lots of angry and frustration placed on DeKalb County police.

"They are not here to protect and serve you. They are here to kill you. Now if they kill a 92-year-old lady, then how can we stand a chance," said Yusuf Shabazz, New Black Panther Party.

Those attending the rally want a federal investigation launched into all police related shootings in DeKalb County.

They also called on DeKalb County CEO Vernon Jones to step down.

On Tuesday, the New Black Panther Party held a rally in Kathryn Johnston's northwest Atlanta neighborhood.

Johnston, who family members say was 92-years-old, was killed last week after she shot and wounded three police officers.

The officers entered Johnson's home looking for drugs based on a tip from an informant. That informant has since claimed he did not buy drugs at Johnston's home. He also claimed the officers asked him to lie.

Atlanta Police Chief Richard Pennington has asked the FBI, GBI, and U.S. Attorney's Office to investigate Johnson's shooting.

Man Admits Trying To Scare Black Families (CLPD)

The Cleveland Plain Dealer, November 30, 2006

A Cleveland man will probably spend two years in prison after admitting he helped spread mercury around a neighbor's house to scare black families out of Slavic Village.

Joseph Kuzlik, who is white, pleaded guilty Monday to conspiracy and two other charges in U.S. District Court.

Sentencing guidelines call for a prison term between 21 and 27 months when Kuzlik is sentenced in February. Kuzlik's friend David Fredericy pleaded guilty to similar charges earlier this year.

Between 2002 and 2005, Kuzlik and Fredericy yelled racial slurs and threatened black neighbors, including children, as part of a plan to drive them away from East 50th Street, prosecutors said.

In February 2005, Kuzlik, now 57, got a syringe filled with mercury, which can be toxic. Fredericy squirted the mercury on and around the house of an interracial family that lived near the two men, prosecutors said.

Second Man Admits To Conspiracy In Mercury Hate Crime (ABJ)

Akron Beacon Journal, November 30, 2006

CLEVELAND - A man accused of serving as a lookout in a scheme to use mercury to scare black families from his neighborhood pleaded guilty Monday to conspiracy and other charges.

Prosecutors said Joseph Kuzlik, 57, of Cleveland was the lookout while an accomplice spread mercury around an interracial couple's house last year.

Kuzlik, who is white, entered his pleas in U.S. District Court to conspiracy, making false statements and criminal interference with housing rights. He could face two years in prison at his sentencing in February.

David Fredericy, 50, of Cleveland, who also is white, pleaded guilty in October to similar counts.

Fredericy said he and Kuzlik wanted to drive black residents out of their Slavic Village neighborhood. The two would yell racial slurs and threaten black neighbors, Fredericy's plea agreement said.

In February 2005, Fredericy used a syringe to squirt mercury around the interracial couple's house, while Kuzlik acted as a lookout, according to the plea agreement.

The neighbors touched the liquid, which can be toxic, and brought it into their home on their shoes. The house had to be evacuated and an environmental cleanup was ordered. No one was injured.

Council Backs Mayor's Veto In Race Bias Case (LAT)

By Steve Hymon And Duke Helfand, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, November 30, 2006

Comments by Villaraigosa suggest the fire chief may be on the way out.

The career of Los Angeles Fire Chief William Bamattre dangled in the balance Wednesday as the City Council backed away from a settlement offered to a black firefighter who accused the department of racial discrimination.

After a lengthy closed session with city attorneys, only six of the 15 council members voted to buck Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa's veto of the deal. Janice Hahn, Tom LaBonge and President Eric Garcetti joined the council's three black members in an attempt to keep the settlement in place. But at least 10 votes would have been needed to override the mayor.

Firefighter Tennie Pierce, a robust personality whom some firefighters called Big Dog, sued the city after dog food was slipped into his firehouse meal two years ago by several firefighters.

Two white captains and a Latino firefighter were punished for the incident. But Pierce, who is on administrative leave, said he was ultimately driven from his job by continuing department harassment.

The council had overwhelmingly agreed to settle the case for $2.7 million, but a public outcry prompted Villaraigosa last week to veto the agreement, leading to Wednesday's vote.

Bamattre was present throughout the closed session and was questioned repeatedly by council members over his handling of the Pierce case and other incidents in a department long plagued by allegations of insensitivity. One aide said that while the tone was respectful, there was obvious tension between the council and the chief.

Although the council action does not preclude City Atty. Rocky Delgadillo from conducting further settlement talks, for now the case is headed to court March 19.

"All I have to say is that I look forward to trying the case," said Genie Harrison, Pierce's attorney.

On Tuesday, Pierce offered a tearful appeal to the council and appeared to move several members. Even before, the members who had most consistently supported a settlement were its three African Americans — Bernard C. Parks, Jan Perry and Herb Wesson — who each had his or her own reasons.

"I think we" — the council — "blew this one," Wesson said after the vote. "The entire Fire Department will go on trial."

A visibly troubled Parks — the former Los Angeles police chief long known for his composure — said he believed that the council's action would send a message to African Americans that they cannot get justice even if they raise valid issues of harassment or racism.

He predicted that the case would end up costing the city "significant dollars" in court.

"I think it will come back to haunt the mayor and the city," he said. "The greater message is you can be dehumanized, and nobody cares. I think it was a very poor [decision] that will send shock waves through a community … that will sit back and say, 'The same old thing.' "

DOJ_NMG_0100108

Applauding the decision was Councilman Dennis Zine, who had cast the lone vote against settling because he viewed Pierce as the victim of a prank rather than discrimination and thought the payout was excessive.

"I believe we have an obligation to do what's right for the taxpayers," Zine said.

Lisa Hansen, deputy chief of staff for Councilman Jack Weiss, said her boss — a steady ally of Villaraigosa — did not vote to override the veto because he wanted more time to ascertain details of the case.

Councilwoman Wendy Greuel said she also had a "lot more questions."

"I do believe there will be some discussion of a [new] settlement but people felt they didn't have all the information available to them," she said.

Villaraigosa said the council "made the right decision," given the amount of the proposed settlement and the fact that photos had come to light showing Pierce himself participating in Fire Department hazing.

Hours before, the mayor had made cryptic comments that seemed to be paving the way for Bamattre's exit.

A Stanford graduate and one-time Dana Point mayor, Bamattre was promoted to chief in 1995 specifically to clean up the department's reputation. He has already announced his intention to retire in February 2008.

Several City Hall sources confirmed that some officials have discussed whether Bamattre should step down sooner.

When asked directly if Bamattre would still have a job Monday, Villaraigosa declined to answer. During a news conference, the mayor was also asked if the time had come for the city to have a black fire chief.

"We have a chief currently, as you all know," Villaraigosa said. "Should there be a vacancy, nothing would make me prouder than to have a department that is headed by an African American, [a] woman, [or a] Latino."

Late Wednesday, Bamattre said the mayor had not told him he could be removed from his job. "I've always planned on doing a smooth transition with the new person, when they decide to select a new person," the chief said. "I would like them to come in with a firm foundation."

He said the Pierce case showed the difficulties he has faced in rooting out harassment.

"Inside the fire station, there's a strong argument that certain pranks are OK," Bamattre said. "That's an attitude I can't subscribe to, but I can't get the organization to accept that."

Problems persist

In 1994, after numerous complaints from female and minority firefighters, the city Personnel Department conducted an audit of the Los Angeles Fire Department. A decade later, continued complaints sparked another audit, this one by the city controller's office, which released its results in 2006. Both inquiries found widespread sexual and racial harassment and a command structure dominated by white men.

· African Americans made up about 11% of the department, with Latinos accounting for approximately 24%, whites 60% and Asians or others 5%.

· Women comprised 3% of the 3,100 uniformed department members.

· African Americans and women reported significant hostility at eight so-called kill stations, where management allegedly sent firefighters to be run out of the department.

· African Americans made up about 12% of the department, with Latinos accounting for 29%, whites 52% and Asians or others 7%.

· Women constituted 2.7% of the 3,600 uniformed personnel.

· Nearly 90% of African American firefighters said they had been the victims of racial harassment or knew of someone who had been harassed. Among women, 80% said they were aware of or had been a victim of sexual harassment.

· The department had established training to combat racial and sexual harassment, but policies and guidelines were not being followed or enforced.

The LAFD On Trial (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, November 30, 2006

If the Tennie Pierce case goes to court, it could be good for the city -- but not because it will be cheap.

TENNIE PIERCE HAS already had his day at City Hall, testifying before the City Council about harassment and discrimination in the Los Angeles Fire Department. Now it appears that he will get his day in court — and it will be the Fire Department that is on trial.

Pierce is the black former firefighter who was fed dog food by his colleagues and sued the city, agreeing to a $2.7-million settlement that was accepted by the city attorney and approved by the City Council. But last week Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa vetoed that settlement, and on Wednesday, after two days of contentious debate, the council failed to override his veto. So it looks as if the case is headed for trial.

That's good — but not necessarily because the mayor's decision was the right one or because the incident is defensible. It's because, win or lose, the city will now get a chance to hear just how dysfunctional its Fire Department is.

A trial will air the damaging evidence that led the city attorney to recommend a settlement. And for the LAFD, a department that for decades has been plagued with racism, sexism and other types of harassment, that evidence could be embarrassing. If firefighters think sneaking dog food into someone's dinner and watching him eat is just a bad joke, what's a good one? How much dehumanizing behavior is someone supposed to endure in the name of camaraderie?

In opting to send the case to trial, the council members who sustained the mayor's veto said they did not see the dog food incident as racial harassment. Or rather, they agreed it was harassment, but they didn't see it as racial. This is a point that testimony about the incident, about the work environment at station houses and the department's subsequent investigation may clarify.

Financially, much is at stake. In similar cases, the city has wound up paying large awards to plaintiffs. In 2004, veteran police officer Richard Nagatoshi won $4.1 million after suing for racial discrimination, harassment and retaliation. In that case, as in this one, the city decided to fight instead of settle, and a jury unanimously sided with Nagatoshi.

There is also a chance that the city could prevail. But what a shame that it now must spend time and money to mount a defense of adolescent boorishness and departmental dysfunction — racial or otherwise.

Whatever happens, the real victory for the city won't come until the Fire Department changes its ways. Scathing audits have outlined the LAFD's erratic disciplinary policies, poor leadership and hostile work environment, yet those reports have failed to dislodge the frat-boy culture. Maybe a public airing of its dirty laundry will.

Some Say Cop Videos Misleading (USAT)

By William M. Welch

USA Today, November 30, 2006

Violent scenes caught on tape may not be brutality, just police doing their jobs, some say; cruiser cams may fill out picture

LOS ANGELES — A series of recent videotaped arrests is providing an unfiltered look at often physical, sometimes brutal police work, due to the broadening technology of cellphone cameras and online video viewing.

Some law enforcement experts say the technology is shedding light on a long-standing if uncomfortable fact of life: Police frequently have to use force. And society and the law expect them to do so.

“The core function of police is, they're the ones who step up and use force when it is necessary,” says Eugene O'Donnell, a former New York City police officer and prosecutor.

“The cops are doing our dirty work. And when someone puts it on camera and shoves it out there, we say, ‘Isn't this terrible.' ”

The tape of the beating of Rodney King by police in Los Angeles in 1991 had to be handed to television stations nationwide before the public saw it.

Nowadays, advances in computer technology and the advent of websites such as YouTube allow a person to post immediately a video online for millions of people to view.

In the latest videos:

·A man is seen being pepper-sprayed by officers in Venice Beach as he is put in a squad car. The incident happened last year but was posted online in November.

Some defense lawyers say the videos are giving the American public a glimpse into brutality they never knew existed.

“I can't see how anyone would think it would be OK to mete out punishment to someone who has been subdued and is not any threat,” says John Raphling, lawyer for the man pepper-sprayed by officers.

The videos have been shocking to some Americans, a more raw real-life police drama than they may have expected after countless hours of television cop shows.

But the videos often provide an incomplete picture of events, police and law-enforcement advocates say — sometimes failing to show the actions that led to the confrontation and a suspect's behavior.

And after all, some experts say, a police officer's job is to control violent and potentially violent people. That generally requires using a level of force just above that used by the suspect.

“Somewhere in America, cops are beating up on somebody right now. It's legal and justifiable, even though it may be offensive to watch,” says O'Donnell, professor of law and police studies at John Jay College of Criminal Justice.

Los Angeles Police Chief William Bratton says his officers were using justifiable force in subduing suspects in the Hollywood and Venice Beach incidents, even if the video strikes viewers as disturbing.

In the Venice Beach pepper-spraying, Bratton said county prosecutors examined the video and cleared officers of wrongdoing because the video showed the man was clearly combative.

Likewise, the officers in the Hollywood incident were cleared after a court hearing.

Some experts say the number of videos is bound to increase, as will their impact on police work and the judicial system.

In January, video captured a San Bernardino county sheriff's deputy shooting an unarmed Air Force airman after a chase in Chino, Calif. The footage appears to show the deputy firing three times as the suspect begins to comply with orders to get up from the ground. The officer was charged with attempted voluntary manslaughter.

A videotape of a Westminster, Colo., police takedown of a man after a seven-hour hostage drama drew attention when it was aired on TV and the Internet in 2005. The video appeared to show officers hitting the man after he was down.

In Inglewood, Calif., a jury last year found in favor of two police officers who filed suit claiming they were unfairly disciplined after a videotaped beating of a teenager in a confrontation at a gas station in 2002.

“Because of the technology, everybody has a camera, and everybody's ready to use it,” says Charles Whitebread, a professor of criminal procedure at the University of Southern California law school.

The impact could be especially significant in Los Angeles. The city has a long and troubled history with police, use of force, and arrest videos.

Rodney King's arrest and beating after a traffic stop, videotaped by a bystander, made nationwide news. Four officers were charged with using excessive force. Their acquittal in a 1992 trial sparked riots.

The Los Angeles Police Department is still feeling the effects of a 1999 scandal involving abuses by gang-control officers in the city's Rampart Division. The city agreed to comply with a federal court order that imposed numerous requirements for managing the force and reviewing instances of potential abuse. It is still in effect.

Connie Rice, a civil rights lawyer who headed a review panel that investigated the scandal, credits the department with improvement in dealing with the public.

“I still think LAPD has an excessive force culture,” she says. “LAPD needs to tell its officers you don't get to spray people just because they mouth off.”

Whether the actions were justified or not, the videos have hurt the reputation of police, Whitebread says.

“It may well be that there are explanations. At first blush, it's pretty rough to look at,” he says. “It can't do LAPD any good to have these videos disseminated.”

Police are well aware of the power of such images. One response has been a move by some police forces around the country to install video cameras in police cars — allowing law enforcement to have its own more complete visual record of confrontations.

O'Donnell sees videos as possibly doing some good: They may help the public decide for itself what is reasonable force and what is not.

“People become used to the idea this is the police and what they do. … That may allow people to kind of clarify misconduct from things that are not misconduct.

“People see the police acting in a way that may not be pretty but may be justifiable,” he said.

O'Donnell says the videos will also demonstrate that police are asked to bear a heavy burden in the criminal justice system, not just enforcing the law but acting as social workers with the mentally ill, the homeless and the addicted.

“It's a brutal system,” says O'Donnell, “and cops bear the brunt of that brutality.”

A Killing Without Cause (WP)

FAIRFAX COUNTY police officer Deval V. Bullock is a good cop who made one disastrous mistake: Bumped by his own car door, he accidentally fired his weapon and killed an unarmed, nonviolent, non-threatening suspect during a routine arrest in January. The shooting of Salvatore J. Culosi, an optometrist under investigation for being a sports bookmaker, was unintentional. But it was also negligent; under the circumstances, Mr. Bullock should not have had his finger on the trigger, nor even aimed his weapon at Mr. Culosi. Now the Fairfax police department is recommending a slap on the wrist for Mr. Bullock -- three weeks without pay and his removal from the police SWAT team. The punishment is lenient, to say the least, but even so it is too much for the police union.

For months before this egregious shooting, an undercover police detective had been placing bets with Mr. Culosi, who had no criminal record; had never owned a firearm; and presented no threat of violence, flight or resisting arrest. It is still unclear, 10 months after the fact, why despite that profile police decided to arrest Mr. Culosi with a SWAT team, which is trained and equipped for use in dangerous situations. After Mr. Culosi's death, the police department said it would conduct a review of policies and procedures involving the use of such teams. But if there was such a review, its results have not been made public. One wonders if the SWAT team in Fairfax, lacking frequent opportunities to respond to situations involving imminent danger and threats, is deployed simply to give its officers something to do. If so, that's bad policy and bad policing.

Mr. Bullock, a 17-year veteran of the police force, was trained in firearms and tactics. He well knew that during a routine arrest, his finger should not have been on the trigger and his gun should not have been pointed at the suspect. So it is no real excuse that, in jumping from his car, the car door bounced back, striking him in the side and causing him to pull the trigger. Like people in other lines of work who make disastrous mistakes, Mr. Bullock should be held accountable for his actions, even though they were unintentional. The chief prosecutor in Fairfax, Robert F. Horan Jr., already declined to prosecute Mr. Bullock or refer the case to a grand jury, yet now police union officials howl that even a three-week suspension is unfair. It's not. It is in fact little more than symbolic discipline. But in such a case symbolism is important and well placed.

FOR MORE THAN two years, Janet Miller-Jenkins has been blocked from seeing her 4-year-old daughter because of a nasty custody dispute with her ex-spouse, who has been defying a court order to allow regular visits. This week, the Virginia Court of Appeals issued an opinion that should be utterly unremarkable: It held that under federal law, Virginia courts must honor the custody orders of their sister courts in Vermont, where Ms. Miller-Jenkins and her ex were joined and where they asked a court to dissolve their union.

Yet the court's decision in Miller-Jenkins v. Miller-Jenkins is a big deal, because what's in question is a civil union, not a marriage. A lower Virginia court had refused to give effect to the Vermont courts' orders allowing Ms. Miller-Jenkins to visit her daughter, citing a state law that prohibits any recognition of civil unions or other same-sex relationships from out of state.

Legally, this case isn't hard. Morally, it's even easier. Janet and Lisa Miller-Jenkins entered a civil union in Vermont, had a child together -- Lisa is the biological mother -- and then split. After petitioning the Vermont courts to dissolve the union and make a custody determination that explicitly recognized Janet as a parent, Lisa took their child, Isabella, to Virginia and began defying the very order she had requested. The Vermont court held her in contempt, but Frederick County Circuit Judge John R. Prosser gave her sanctuary, ruling in 2004 that under Virginia law she was "the sole biological and natural parent" and that she "solely has the legal rights, privileges, duties and obligations as parent."

This was lawless, as the appeals court has now found -- it was a triumph of anti-gay politics over clear statutory command. Federal law prevents any Virginia court from interfering in an ongoing custody case in Vermont or any other state. There is no exception for gays or lesbians. The idea is to prevent parents who don't like the result they get in one state's courts from trying their luck elsewhere. Whatever hateful things Virginia law may say about civil unions are therefore irrelevant; its courts must honor the orders of that Vermont court.

Sadly, further appeals are likely, so in the immediate future her clear victory in court may not bring Janet Miller-Jenkins closer to her daughter. That's wrong. Their unlawful separation has lasted far too long already.

Union: DOJ Delays Mittal Sale Decision (AP)

By Vicki Smith, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 30, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0100112

Department of Justice Gives Mittal Until Jan. 28 to Decide Which U.S. Mill to Sell, Union Says

MORGANTOWN, W.Va. (AP) -- The U.S. Department of Justice on Wednesday gave Mittal Steel Co. until Jan. 28 to decide which U.S. mill it will sell to settle antitrust issues over its merger with rival Arcelor SA, a union official said.

Mittal had planned to sell Canada's Dofasco Inc. as part of its merger with Arcelor, but an independent trust controlling Dofasco said earlier this month it would not allow the sale.

That forces a choice between the other tin assets, the former Weirton Steel Corp. in West Virginia's Northern Panhandle or the Sparrows Point mill in Maryland.

Though Mittal has not made a final decision, it has publicly said its first choice would be Weirton, a historically high-cost producer and the largest tin operation.

Mark Glyptis, president of the 1,200-member Independent Steelworkers Union, said the justice department has ultimate authority over any sale.

Gina Talamona, a Justice Department spokeswoman in Washington, D.C., did not immediately return a telephone message about the case.

Glyptis said the union is eager to explore all opportunities that could lead to new and stable ownership.

"If we are divested, we want to make sure we're put into the best possible situation, so life has been extremely busy" talking with potential buyers, he said. "The tenacity the employees has shown has been unprecedented."

Weirton filed for Chapter 11 bankruptcy protection in May 2003 and was sold twice in 18 months, first to Ohio-based International Steel Group Inc., then to Mittal.

Weirton still has attractive assets in both its hot end and its tin, pickling and tandem mills, and Mittal has said it has at least 10 potential buyers.

The company taking over nearby sheet steel and coated steel products maker Wheeling-Pittsburgh Corp. is among those interested. Executives with Illinois-based Esmark Inc. said they are prepared to make a cash offer for the Weirton division.

But former ISG executive Mitchell Hecht is also in the hunt. He says Mittal has ignored his offers to buy Weirton, restart the blast furnace to make pig iron and rehire several hundred workers.

Neither the union nor Mittal has named the other potential buyers.

The ISU has a successorship clause in its contract that essentially gives it veto power over a change in ownership, and Glyptis said the union will scrutinize all interested parties.

The union is eager to see business plans that secure existing jobs, encourage growth and commit to reinvestment in a mill that once employed some 13,000 people.

Glyptis said workers and Weirton-area residents tend to get excited when they read the names of potential buyers in a newspaper, but the union will support the deal that makes the best sense on many levels.

"We have an excellent steel operation in Weirton and we want the right fit for future years," he said.

Mittal is in the process of completing its $33.4 billion acquisition of Arcelor. The merger, due to be completed by April or May, will create a steel titan with close to 10 percent of global production.

CME Defends Monopoly Over Own Products (FT)

By Doug Cameron In Chicago

Financial Times, November 30, 2006

The Chicago Mercantile Exchange on Wednesday defended the monopoly in trading its own products, and said any regulatory push to change the current industry structure would be “disastrous”.

The CME has been one of the stoutest opponents of “fungibility” which would allow contracts listed by one exchange to be traded on rival platforms, arguing it would be inefficient and stifle innovation.

“I would suggest that having something like that would be kind of disastrous for the industry,” said Kim Taylor, president of clearing at the CME, during an industry conference in Chicago.

Ms Taylor said exchanges would lose the “upside” from the investment in product development which has helped spur annual growth rates of 25 per cent across a futures industry serving a wider client base of banks, institutional investors and hedge funds.

Her remarks come amid intensifying scrutiny of the derivatives business on both sides of the Atlantic, notably over the impact of exchanges such as the CME and Eurex which control their own clearinghouses. Some users claim the vertical integration creates excessive pricing power.

The Department of Justice is currently reviewing the CME’s planned $8bn purchase of the Chicago Board of Trade, and assessing any potential anticompetitive impact from its ownership of their shared clearinghouse, which accounts for 90 per cent of on-exchange US futures trades.

The CME insists it does not expect the proposed deal to run into antitrust problems, and like other exchanges has pointed to intense competition from over-the-counter markets as well as the large investment banks which make up their main customer base.

Seven banks recently announced plans to set up a new equities trading platform in Europe in response to long-running dissatisfaction over clearing and transaction fees. The banks have indicated they could turn their attention to the derivatives' market, despite exchanges' insistence that fees have fallen while efficiencies have improved.

Ms Taylor pointed to the $2bn in savings from the common CME-CBOT clearing link established three years ago, and said some customers were forecasting $1m-$2m in annual savings from contract efficiencies released by the proposed acquisition. Clearing and transaction fees are the major contributor to rising earnings at the CME, Eurex – jointly owned by Deutsche Börse and the SWX Swiss Exchange – as they push higher trading volumes through platforms with effectively fixed costs.

Exchange leaders on both sides of the Atlantic admit they have to "educate" lawmakers amid the increased scrutiny of clearing systems, pointing to the efficiencies created by vertical integration and the competition in the sector, notably from banks.

Daniel Gisler, the outgoing head of clearing at Eurex, told the conference that allowing contacts to be traded on any exchange would be beneficial if it was extended to include banks' over-the-counter products such as swap books. "I think it's a great idea to have such a mandate…and it would be even greater if it included all the products from the banks," he said. Mr Gisler also estimated that the migration of most OTC products o exchanges could release $10bn in efficiencies from more simplified back-office processing.

US Air, Delta Aim To Coax Creditors To Their Camps In Merger Standoff (WSJ)

By Melanie Trottman And Corey Dade

The Wall Street Journal, November 30, 2006

Executives of US Airways Group Inc. and Delta Air Lines Inc. will face off in New York today in front of the major creditors who could ultimately decide whether an $8.5 billion hostile merger of the two airlines takes place.

Delta executives, who have been waging a campaign against the offer, insist they will seriously consider the proposal. But Delta also will try to bolster creditors' confidence in its own plan to take the Atlanta airline out of bankruptcy-court protection as soon as April as a standalone carrier. US Airways, Tempe, Ariz., argues that a merger would create a healthier airline with annual cost savings of $1.65 billion.

Today's meeting at an undisclosed location in Manhattan, the first direct encounter between executives of the two airlines since the hostile offer was announced Nov. 15, is expected to last several hours. US Airways Chief Executive Doug Parker, the architect of the bid, and his management team are expected to attend, along with Delta Operating Chief Jim Whitehurst and Delta Finance Chief Edward Bastian, according to people familiar with the situation. It was unclear whether Delta Chairman and CEO Gerald Grinstein would attend.

US Airways hopes to show that its plan is superior to the standalone strategy Delta expects to present to its creditors by Dec. 15, and to persuade Delta to open its books as part of due diligence on the deal, according to a US Airways spokeswoman. A person familiar with US Airways' strategy said the airline will show how it could extract the cost-saving synergies it has promised as part of the deal, and attempt to defuse worries that the merger can't pass muster with antitrust regulators. US Airways and Delta compete in many of the same markets, mostly on the East Coast. The combination of the two carriers would create the largest U.S. airline in terms of passenger traffic, at least before any assets are sold.

Delta executives believe the US Airways offer undervalues the company, which they believe will be worth about $12 billion when it emerges from bankruptcy protection, according to a person familiar with the company's internal calculations.

Delta management has the exclusive right until Feb. 15 to present a reorganization plan to creditors through the bankruptcy proceedings. It is possible that another bidder for Delta could emerge.

Key to the struggle is Delta's official committee of unsecured creditors, which represents the largest claims against the airline out of an estimated $16 billion to $18 billion total. The group of nine, which includes two U.S. Bancorp units, Delta's pilots union and Boeing Co. unit Boeing Capital Corp., wields significant influence in whether the bid succeeds. US Airways needs to win over at least a third of Delta's creditors to derail the restructuring plan.

The Air Line Pilots Association, the union representing 6,500 Delta pilots, and which holds about $3.1 billion in claims on the airline, has publicly criticized the bid. Other committee members have criticized the offer privately but said little in public.

Some creditors appear to support Delta because of their longstanding business associations with the airline. For example, Delta is a loyal customer of Boeing and currently has on order 55 new planes, worth billions of dollars. Boeing's financing arm, Boeing Capital Corp., says it holds various claims valued at a combined $117.5 million. US Airways has a strong relationship with Airbus.

Meantime, a separate group of Delta bondholders has formed its own committee and this week hired legal counsel to pressure Delta to consider the US Airways bid or to improve Delta's treatment of smaller creditors in a restructuring plan it will file in December. The group, which includes Deutsche Bank AG, holds claims totaling roughly one third of all unsecured Delta claims, limiting its leverage at least for now.

US Airways Set To Pitch Delta Its Buyout Bid (USAT)

By Marilyn Adams

USA Today, November 30, 2006

Two weeks after proposing the biggest airline merger ever, US Airways today will make its case directly to Delta Air Lines and its creditors at a meeting in New York.

The gathering will be Delta's first face-to-face meeting with its suitor since US Airways' $8 billion hostile bid on Nov. 15 to create the world's biggest airline.

Senior executives at Delta, which is in Chapter 11 reorganization, have rebuffed the offer, saying Delta would be better off as a stand-alone carrier because a merger would be too risky. CEO Gerald Grinstein, at the time of the bid, reiterated his target for emerging from Chapter 11 in 2007.

But both Delta and its committee of unsecured creditors are obligated to study the offer, which includes $4 billion in cash and 78 million shares of US Airways stock, worth $4.5 billion at Wednesday's closing share price of $56.76. US Airways has lined up $7.2 billion in financing from Citigroup for the deal.

The merger would require approval from Delta's creditors committee, Delta's bankruptcy judge, US Airways' shareholders, the U.S. Department of Justice and the U.S. Department of Transportation.

Delta's unsecured creditors include bondholders, suppliers and Delta's pilots union, all of whose bankruptcy claims are not secured by tangible assets such as planes.

The offer's cash component is significant because unsecured creditors of a company in Chapter 11 usually receive only stock in the reorganized company as payment.

Creditors' committee lawyer Daniel Golden, of Akin Gump Strauss Hauer & Feld in New York, has said Delta and the committee will decide whether the offer is worthwhile.

Today's meeting is expected to include dozens of players from both Delta and US Airways. Attendees will include the airlines' senior management teams, along with both airlines' lawyers and financial advisers, and lawyers and advisers for Delta's creditors committee.

No decision is expected today. US Airways still seeks access to Delta's books. Opinion on the proposed merger is divided.

Bond investors are bullish. Delta's unsecured bonds Wednesday were trading at 60 cents on the dollar, up from 39 cents on the dollar on Nov. 14, the day before the offer was announced.

But the chairman of Delta's pilots union has blasted the proposal. In a strongly worded letter last week to Delta's 6,000 pilots, union Chairman Lee Moak said it “appears to lack any substantial benefit” for Delta, its employees or customers.

US Airways CEO Doug Parker says the deal makes sense only if it can close while Delta is still in bankruptcy court, where it can reject or amend contracts and aircraft leases to cut costs.

Tempe, Ariz.-based US Airways says it would operate the merged airline under the Delta name. US Airways is the product of a similar 2005 merger in bankruptcy of the old US Airways and America West.

US Airways To Meet With Delta Execs, Creditors (BLOOM)

By Mary Schlangenstein And Eric Torbenson, Bloomberg News

Bloomberg, November 30, 2006

US Airways Group Inc. senior executives will present their case for acquiring bankrupt Delta Air Lines Inc. to Delta officers and creditors this week, a creditor attorney said yesterday.

Advertisement

The meeting will be the first for the three parties since US Airways made its hostile bid Nov. 15, and the first time US Airways CEO Officer Doug Parker will have a chance to brief Delta creditors on his $8.6 billion cash-and-stock offer.

“The committee is going in with an open mind to hear what US Airways has to say,” lawyer Daniel Golden said in an interview yesterday. “I fully expect senior executives from both Delta and US Air to be there, as well as their advisers and the committee’s advisers.”

US Airways declined to comment on the meeting, which is to be held in New York. Delta spokesman Michael Freitag said the airline “will be well represented,” but declined to elaborate.

DOJ_NMG_0100115

Delta CEO Gerald Grinstein, who rejected US Airways' initial offer, has said he wants his Atlanta-based airline to emerge from Chapter 11 in the first half of 2007 as an independent carrier.

Tempe, Arizona-based US Airways offered $4 billion in cash and 78.5 million US Airways shares. Delta creditors would own 45 percent of the merged airline.

Delta is still the nation's third-largest airline, and a US Airways-Delta combination would surpass AMR Corp.'s American Airlines as the world's biggest carrier, based on miles flown by paying passengers.

This week's session with US Airways, Delta and the creditors committee may be followed by a variety of other meetings, Golden said. Those sessions haven't been scheduled.

"I fully expect a wide-open, full-ranging meeting where there will be substantial give and take on both sides between US Airways and Delta," said Golden, of Akin Gump Strauss Hauer & Feld, in New York.

Delta will outline its own plan to reorganize and operate independently by the end of December. It has the exclusive right to file such a plan with the U.S. bankruptcy court in New York, until Feb. 15. The case is: "In re Delta Air Lines Inc.," 05-17923, U.S. Bankruptcy Court, Southern District of New York (White Plains).

The airline's nine-member unsecured creditors' committee represents groups to which Delta owed money when it sought Chapter 11 protection in September 2005. Committee members have access to nonpublic information on Delta's business and bankruptcy case, and negotiate the terms of the airline's plan to exit court protection and repay creditors.

The US Airways proposal is contingent upon a merger occurring while Delta is still in bankruptcy, to achieve about $1.65 billion in annual savings over two years, Parker has said. US Airways used that tactic in combining with America West Holdings Corp. to exit Chapter 11 in 2005. Outside of bankruptcy, a US Airways-Delta merger would achieve only about half those savings.

US Airways, the seventh-biggest U.S. carrier, already has met with the U.S. Justice Department to discuss possible antitrust concerns. The airline has said it would expect to sell one of the two northeastern shuttle operations a merged carrier would own. "We are looking at the proposed transaction," said Gina Talamona, a Justice spokeswoman.

US Airways shares fell 98 cents yesterday, to $58.18, in New York Stock Exchange composite trading. Delta's shares declined 6 cents to $1.19 in over-the-counter trading. Delta's 7.9 percent notes maturing in 2009 fell 2.75 cents to 57.25 cents on the dollar, according to Trace, the bond price reporting system of the NASD. The yield rose to 30.2 percent.

Merger Buzz Has Unions Wary (HC)

By Bill Hensel Jr., Houston Chronicle

Houston Chronicle, November 30, 2006

Employees of airlines saying little on how they'd react to takeover

Airline union leaders are keeping a wary eye out as merger speculation swirls, but they're reluctant to say how they'd react in the event of a takeover.

The talk began in earnest earlier this month when US Airways made an offer to buy Delta Air Lines.

That could trigger additional deals by smaller carriers seeking to remain competitive, according to airline analysts who are talking up pairings — like United Airlines and Continental Airlines.

Big takeovers can be traumatic for workers.

"It makes pilots nervous," Capt. Dave Earnest, who heads the local Continental pilots union, said Wednesday. "Mergers are a tough time for employees, wondering what is going to happen."

One of their biggest concerns is the impact a merger can have on the airline's seniority lists, which can determine who gets their pick of the best jobs, or in the event of layoffs who loses out.

United has been at the center of a lot of the merger talk because after three years in bankruptcy court its outlook is brighter.

The carrier's chief executive, Glenn Tilton, has said there is too much capacity and that consolidation in the industry is needed.

When asked about takeover reports, a United spokeswoman has said the company does not comment on rumors or speculation.

The Chicago chapter of the Association of Flight Attendants has also been hearing rumors about an impending merger, the union's president, Hettie Collins, said Wednesday.

"The company has been really mum," Collins said. "In fact, they've denied it. Whenever they deny something so strongly, we've come to learn there is something cooking in the kitchen."

A formula for successGordon Bethune, former chairman and chief executive at Continental, said that while labor issues generally won't block a merger, they are important to running an airline.

"Success is always predicated on the willingness of employees to want to do their jobs," Bethune said. "If they are not happy, things don't go well and airplanes don't get fixed on time."

The International Brotherhood of Teamsters, which represents mechanics at Continental, said it is aware of the rumors and is looking at them.

"These things can happen quickly," the Teamsters' Don Treichler said Wednesday.

Continental's pilots union has a standing merger committee and an attorney on retainer in the event of such a deal.

"We also have a merger fund where pilots have paid into a fund that we can tap if the committee has to swing into high gear," Earnest said.

A significant factorLabor issues are a fairly significant factor in airline mergers, particularly as different cultures are thrown together. Employee seniority becomes a key consideration.

The machinists union believes that mergers are not in the best interests of consumers or labor, said Robert Roach of the International Association of Mechanics and Aerospace Workers.

"People are losing jobs over this issue," he said. "We think this is so other people can make fees and make money."

Looking at pairingsA Continental/United pairing is one such deal that the union for Continental's flight attendants has looked at, Roach said.

"We think one that creates the most problems is Continental and United because we don't think the Justice Department would approve that," Roach said. "We have been down this road before with United and US Airways."

If a merger is proposed, the union will discuss it with management, Roach said. If a determination is made it is good for the members, the union can work with management to ensure they are protected.

Continental and United both are strong airlines with strong roots, which may create potential problems for the Justice Department, he said.

"If you take a weak airline and link it with a strong airline, it would be easier," Roach said.

A better fit?But Goldman Sachs said in a report issued Wednesday that while United also could make a bid for Delta, which remains in bankruptcy, it generally has been considered a better fit for Continental.

"And from a Justice Department perspective, the deal would seem easier to get done given Continental is smaller than many of its legacy peers," analyst Robert Barry wrote.

Judge Clarifies Gates' Role In Trial (AP)

Judge Limits Gates' Iowa Visits As Trial Begins

DES MOINES, Iowa (AP) -- Microsoft Corp. Chairman Bill Gates must travel to Iowa only once to defend his company in a class-action antitrust case beginning Thursday that accuses him of running a monopoly that overcharged Iowans millions of dollars.

The company has denied the allegations and said it will prove customers received high-quality software for a reasonable price.

In a ruling filed Wednesday, Polk County District Court Judge Scott Rosenberg said that Gates and Microsoft CEO Steve Ballmer must testify only once.

The plaintiffs' attorney, Roxanne Conlin of Des Moines, wanted to present her case in its entirety -- including calling Gates and Ballmer to the witness stand -- without allowing the company's attorneys to question them directly. That would have required the two top executives of the Washington-based software maker to travel to Iowa a second time if their own attorneys wanted to question them directly.

The judge ruled all questioning of the men will occur at one time.

Microsoft attorneys said Gates is expected to testify in January and Ballmer will likely appear in February. Both men are expected to be on the stand for about four days.

Microsoft attorney Rich Wallis said Gates will explain how early decisions and innovation placed Microsoft in a position as the leader in the software industry. He'll discuss how his business model of providing less expensive machines to the masses caught on at a time when IBM and other major players were providing few customers with large, costly computer systems.

That business model, not anticompetitive behavior, allowed Microsoft to dominate the software industry, Wallis said.

"This case is about whether Iowans were overcharged for Microsoft products," he said. "We're confident the evidence will show that Iowans received great value from Microsoft products that enable them to communicate with family and friends across the world, manage personal finances in their businesses and navigate the Internet for information they might need to help them enrich their lives."

The lawsuit seeks about $330 million for Iowans who have purchased the software maker's products since 1994.

"After nearly seven years, we are anxious to move forward and we are confident that we will ultimately prevail," Conlin said in a statement.

The case, which has been in the Iowa court system for years, has been to the state supreme court three times for various issues.

Jurors on Thursday morning will first hear hours of instructions from Rosenberg.

Conlin is expected to open her case by discussing numerous company e-mails -- many of which contain graphic language -- to portray Microsoft as a predatory company aiming to destroy competitors.

During her case, she'll be allowed to play an unflattering 1998 deposition of Gates from another lawsuit that shows a fidgety, nervous looking chief executive.

She said Wednesday that getting the 10-hour videotape before jurors in this case was a major victory for her because it will give jurors "good insight into the motivation and business practices of Microsoft."

The jury of seven men and five women have been told the case will likely last about six months.

More than 80 prospective jurors were questioned to get the pool of 12. Most were allowed to leave because the length of the trial would have been too much of a hardship. Some were sole income earners, others worked for commission only and some were single parents.

Attorneys for each side have taken about 50 depositions and have collected an estimated 25 million pages of documents.

In other pretrial rulings Wednesday, Rosenberg said:

--Jurors will be allowed to question witnesses during the trial by passing a note to the judge. If he determines the question is legitimate, it will be asked of the witness.

--Twelve jurors are on the jury. All those who remain at the end of the trial will be permitted to deliberate. Normally an Iowa civil trial has eight jurors and a few alternates. Attorneys agreed that it would unfair to jurors to sit through months of testimony and not have a say in the verdict at the end.

Both sides also agreed to permit the jury to fall to as few as six jurors.

Brussels To Keep Watchful Eye On Vista (FT)

By Tobias Buck In Brussels

Financial Times, November 30, 2006

The launch of Vista has been followed with keen interest not only by Microsoft's customers and the software industry but also by the European Union's top antitrust regulator.

The European Commission has repeatedly warned Microsoft that the new operating system could raise competition concerns similar to the ones that sparked the body's 2004 landmark ruling against the software giant. At the time, the Commission fined Microsoft a record €497m for abusing its dominant market position.

In particular, the Commission is worried about the "bundling" of new features and programmes into Vista. It has argued that the integration of security software, an internet search engine and a fixed document reader similar to Adobe's Acrobat Reader could undermine competition from companies that sell such programmes on a stand-alone basis.

Neelie Kroes, EU competition commissioner, first made public her concerns in a letter sent to Microsoft in March. Since then, the two sides have engaged in several rounds of negotiations designed to limit any competitive harm created by Vista and avoid the threat of a fresh antitrust case against Microsoft.

Several Microsoft rivals – including an industry body that represents IBM, Nokia and Oracle, among others – have urged the Commission to crack down severely on Vista, arguing that the new operating system is likely to cement and even expand the group's dominant position.

Microsoft at one point warned that the legal uncertainty over the Commission's approach towards Vista risked delaying the launch further. It also warned the regulator against forcing through changes that could undermine the security of the new product.

Last month, however, the Commission and Microsoft appeared to step back from their tussle over Vista, after the group announced a string of last-minute changes to the operating system that were designed to address the regulator's concerns.

Ms Kroes, in an off-the-cuff remark, pronounced herself a "happy woman" but the Commission's official line was more cautious. Indeed, it insisted that it had not given a regulatory "green light", adding that Brussels would "closely monitor the effects of Vista in the market and, in particular, examine any complaints concerning Vista on their own merits".

European Union Fines Companies About $682M For Fixing Prices For Rubber Used In Tires (AP)

By Aoife White, Associated Press

AP, November 30, 2006

BRUSSELS, Belgium – The European Commission fined five oil refiners and chemical producers about $682 million on Wednesday, saying they fixed the price of synthetic rubber used to make tires. A sixth company that had alerted authorities escaped a fine.

"The fines are so high because it's a large market and several of the companies are repeat offenders," said European Union spokesman Jonathan Todd.

It was the second-largest fine ever in an EU cartel case. The largest a fine of 790 million euros levied in 2001 against eight pharmaceutical makers including Roche Holding AG and BASF AG for fixing vitamin prices.

In the latest case, Italy's Eni SPA was ordered to pay the largest fine – 272 million euros ($357.6 million) – while Royal Dutch Shell PLC was fined 160.8 million euros ($211 million). Their fines were hiked by half for it being a repeat offense.

Bayer AG told European Union regulators that the companies were fixing prices and sharing information on customers for certain types of synthetic rubber known as butadiene rubber and emulsion styrene butadiene rubber from 1996 to 2002. It got full immunity, escaping a potential 204 million euros ($268 million) fine.

Dow Chemical Co. was fined 64.5 million euros ($84.8 million), getting a 40 percent reduction for supplying regulators with information confirming Bayer's claims. Shell also admitted it was part of the cartel at a late stage – but too little and too late to win a lesser fine.

Czech refiner Unipetrol AS was ordered to pay 17.5 million euros ($23 million) and Poland's Trade-Stomil was fined 3.8 million euros ($5 million).

Regulators said the cartel agreements were made before or after companies met for talks with a synthetic rubber industry group in Milan, Vienna, Amsterdam, Prague and London among others.

"During these meetings the participants agreed (on) prices and exchanged information on key customers and the amounts of synthetic rubber supplied to them," they said.

EU antitrust chief Neelie Kroes said in a statement that cartels struck "at the heart of healthy economic activity."

Eni said the EU was wrong to hold it responsible for the actions of its unit Polimeri Europe, claiming the fine was "entirely disproportionate and unjustified" and saying it would consider appealing the fine to the EU courts. The behavior at stake – secret deals with rivals – would "in no way" have hurt the final consumer, it said.

Customers for the rubber are tire manufacturers Michelin SA, Pirelli & C. SpA and Goodyear Tire & Rubber Co., as well as other companies that make shoe soles, floor coverings and golf balls. All the cartel players made emulsion styrene butadiene rubber but butadiene rubber was only produced by Eni, Bayer, Shell and Dow, the Commission said.

EU Turns Anti-cartel Crusade To Rubber Market With Huge Fine (AFP)

By Leigh Thomas

AFP, November 30, 2006

BRUSSELS (AFP) - The European Union's top competition regulator Neelie Kroes stepped up her anti-cartel campaign by hitting five companies in the rubber market with the EU's second-highest fine against a cartel.

The European Commission slapped a fine of 519 million euros (683 million dollars) on Eni (Milan: ENI.MI - news) of Italy, Shell (LSE: RDSB.L - news) of The Netherlands, Dow of the United States, Unipetrol of the Czech Republic and Trade-Stomil of Poland.

The commission accused the companies of breaking EU competition law by agreeing on prices and sharing customers for some types of synthetic rubber used for tyres and other consumer goods like shoe soles, floor coverings and golf balls.

Bayer (Xetra: 575200 - news) also participated in the cartel, which operated from at least 1996 to 2002, but was not fined because the German company tipped off regulators.

The overall penalty was second only to a 790.5 million euro fine that the commission imposed on vitamin makers in a landmark 2001 anti-cartel ruling.

"Cartels strike at the heart of healthy economic activity," Competition Commissioner Kroes said. "They undermine competition, raise prices for consumers and reduce the diversity, quality and innovation of European companies," she added.

The Dutch commissioner has made cracking down on cartels a top priority this year and has targeted about 10 of them, nearly double last year's figure.

Bayer, which received immunity from fines after tipping off EU authorities, would itself have faced a heavy fine if the cartel had been otherwise discovered, because it has been found guilty for participating in other cartels in the past.

Eni and Shell are also repeat offenders and as a result were slapped with the most painful penalties, receiving 272,250,000 euros and 160,875,000 euros in fines respectively.

In reaction, Eni rejected the charges and fine and said it reserved its right to appeal before the European Court of First Instance in Luxembourg. The group said that "this application of the antitrust regulations is without precedent in European Commission rulings."

Meanwhile, a Shell spokeswoman in London said: "Shell has constantly and fully cooperated with the European Commission investigation." "We need to study the decision in detail before we can comment and respond further," she added.

Kroes said she would not hesitate to lift the fines if the companies ignored her ruling against them. "The Commission has imposed high fines in this case, but if companies continue to indulge in cartel activities, then they can expect their fines to be even higher in the future," she said.

Wednesday's penalty brings the total amount the commission has fined in cartel cases this year to 1.843 billion euros, an annual record for EU regulators. In addition to the rubber case, the commission has so far fined cartels in the markets for steel beams, copper fittings, bitumen in The Netherlands, acrylic glass and hydrogen peroxide.

Dow Chemical, Eni Fined By European Union For Price-Fixing (BLOOM)

By Matthew Newman

Bloomberg, November 30, 2006

Nov. 29 (Bloomberg) -- Dow Chemical Co., the largest U.S. chemical maker, Eni SpA and three chemical makers were fined 519 million euros ($682 million) by the European Union for fixing the prices of ingredients in rubber used in tires and shoes.

Eni received the biggest penalty at 272.2 million euros, followed by Royal Dutch Shell Plc at 160.9 million euros and Dow at 64.6 million euros, the European Commission, the EU's Brussels-based antitrust authority, said in a statement today.

``The commission has imposed high fines in this case, but if companies continue to indulge in cartel activities, then they can expect their fines to be even higher in the future," Competition Commissioner Neelie Kroes said in the statement.

The penalties make 2006 the biggest ever for antitrust fines, breaking a 2001 record of 1.83 billion euros. Kroes has made busting cartels her top priority and can fine offenders as much as 10 percent of annual sales.

The EU also fined Poland's Trade-Stomil and Unipetrol AS, the Czech Republic's biggest oil company. Unipetrol is controlled by Polish oil company PKN Orlen SA.

Shell said it will study the ruling.

Trade-Stomil Deputy CEO Piotr Mlodawski said the company was ``surprised with the decision."

``We will not comment until we receive the EU statement and detailed information," Mlodawski said in a phone interview from Lodz, Poland.

Dow Chemical spokesman Matthias Graf wasn't immediately available to comment. Bayer spokesman Christian Hartel couldn't immediately be reached for comment. Unipetrol's spokeswoman in Prague Michaela Lagronova had no comment. Rene Keller, a spokesman for Unipetrol's rubber subsidiary, Kaucuk AS, couldn't be immediately reached via his mobile phone. An Enel spokesman needed more time to review the decision before commenting on the matter.

Price-Fixing

The EU has been investigating price-fixing in the chemical industry since 2002. In December of that year, EU inspectors raided the offices of a unit of Eni, the world's fourth-largest oil company, looking for evidence of price fixing in EPDM or ethylene propylene diene monomer.

In July 2006, the EU closed its probe of the EPDM, urethanes, urethane chemicals market without charging any company.

Rubber Production

Synthetic rubber was first developed more than a hundred years ago and perfected during the 1930s in Germany. The U.S. began large-scale production of synthetic rubber during World War II, when natural rubber exports from East Asia were cut off.

The majority of the world's rubber production is now synthetic, according to the Houston-based International Institute of Synthetic Rubber Producers Inc., which has 50 members including Dow and DuPont Co.'s DuPont Performance Elastomers unit.

Today's decision, the sixth this year, focuses on two synthetic rubber products: styrene butadiene and emulsion styrene butadiene. These rubbers are used in a wide variety of applications, including the production of tires, footwear, conveyor belts, hoses, flooring and adhesives.

The EU's synthetic rubber production fell in 2005 to 2.7 million metric tons from 2.8 million metric tons in 2004, according to the International Rubber Study Group, a London- based organization made up of 19 countries and the EU.

In June 2005, the commission sent Dow, Bayer and other companies an official charge sheet, known as a ``statement of objections," in the synthetic rubber investigation, Dow and Leverkusen, Germany-based Bayer said in statements.

Dow bought a European synthetic rubber business from Royal Dutch/Shell Group in 1998 to expand its rubber operations, which began in 1996.

Bayer wasn't fined because it was first to provide the commission with evidence of the cartel.

EU Ups Pressure On Spain To Drop Restrictions On EON's Endesa Bid (AFP)

AFP, November 30, 2006

BRUSSELS (AFP) - EU regulators have raised pressure on Spain to lift restrictions on German energy group EON (Xetra: 761440 - news) 's bid for Spanish electricity company Endesa (Madrid: ELE.MC - news) by ruling that Madrid's new, eased conditions still broke EU law.

The European Commission found that the "new measures concerning the proposed EON takeover of Endesa ... are in violation of the merger regulation provisions," said spokesman for competition issues, Jonathan Todd Wednesday.

Spain eased its conditions on the bid earlier this month after the European Commission had determined at the end of September that Madrid was in breach of EU regulations by trying to protect Endesa.

After Brussels regulators' new complaint, a Spanish government official stood firm, saying Madrid is now fully compliant with European rules on the matter.

The commission has given Spanish authorities until December 13 to respond officially to its latest ruling. If Brussels regulators are unsatisfied with the response, then they could legally require Spain to drop the conditions.

Eager to ward off state meddling in cross-border EU deals, Brussels has fought against Madrid's opposition to the takeover ever since Spanish authorities first raised objections shortly after EON lodged its bid. In February, EON launched a hostile offer to buy Endesa for 29.1 billion euros (38.2 billion dollars) and the commission gave the group the green light in April to press ahead with its takeover plans. But Madrid preferred a merger between Endesa and the biggest Spanish gas supplier Gas Natural (Madrid: GAS.MC - news) .

Spain's own energy regulator, CNE, placed 19 conditions, most of them contested by the commission, on EON's offer. Prior to EON making its offer, Gas Natural had made a bid for Endesa of 22.5 billion euros.

Earlier this month, Spain eased some of the 19 conditions attached to the sale of Endesa to EON, with the industry ministry indicating that the German company would not after all be obliged to sell Endesa's production activities.

Spain also said it would ease an earlier requirement forcing EON to sell Endesa's nuclear and coal power plants. However, the ministry said it was maintaining its requirement for a sale of Endesa shares if more than 50 percent of the capital of EON is acquired by a third party within the next 10 years.

The commission spokesman said that the antitrust regulator was in particular concerned about Madrid's demand that the German company not sell any assets on the country's islands, keep the Endesa brand, use domestically produced coal and not divert gas to other markets than Spain. "All of these provisions are in the commission's view incompatible with the treaty rules on the right of establishment and the free movement of capital," said Todd.

But in the southeastern Spanish city of Murcia, Spanish media quoted deputy economy minister David Vegara as saying: "We believe that the new conditions scrupulously respect European standards." Vegara said Madrid would respond officially to the EU commission in the next few days. He added that the Spanish industry ministry had taken an "adequate" decision in the matter and that he hoped the affair would not end up before a European court.

One Beats Two (WSJ)

One of life's rarer -- to the point of being miraculous -- events is an enforcement agency deciding to voluntarily give up power. So congratulations are due this week both to the New York Stock Exchange and the National Association of Securities Dealers (NASD) for agreeing to merge most of their enforcement operations.

It no doubt helped the decision that these are self-regulating bodies run by the private sector; unlike public bureaucracies, they realize the main goal of enforcement is honest and well-functioning markets, not enhancing their own turf. Special credit in this regard goes to Richard Ketchum, the Big Board's enforcement chief, who ceded the number one job in the combined operation to the NASD's Mary Schapiro, who is no shrinking violet. SEC Chairman Chris Cox also gave the two outfits a push in the right direction.

The merger will reduce regulatory duplication and thus the costs of compliance. In some circles, and by some strange logic, the merger is being described as deregulatory. But a single, independent private regulator is likely to have more clout, not less, and the post-Enron SEC isn't going away any time soon. Alas.

A special dunce cap goes to those claiming this will reduce "regulatory competition." It is precisely this American legal free-for-all -- with the SEC competing with the self-regulators competing with 50 state attorneys general competing with the class-action trial bar -- that has made the U.S. capital markets less appealing for many foreign companies. At a time when world markets are integrating, the merger will allow the U.S. securities industry to speak with one enforcement voice.

All of which should help both small American investors and the U.S. capital markets. If only Congress would ever reconsider its own many redundancies.

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

Justices Closely Split On Greenhouse Gases (LAT)

By David G. Savage

The Los Angeles Times, November 30, 2006

WASHINGTON — The Supreme Court seemed closely split today as the Bush administration went before the justices to defend its refusal to regulate the greenhouse gases that are believed to cause global warming.

At issue is whether a coalition of coastal states, led by Massachusetts and California, can spur federal regulators into action on global warming.

The states and several environmental groups went to court two years ago, arguing that the Republican administration had ignored the Clean Air Act and its requirement for regulating "any air pollutant" that is likely to endanger the public's health or welfare.

Greenhouse gases are warming the planet and threaten to trigger an environmental catastrophe, they said. It is like "lighting a fuse on a bomb," Massachusetts state lawyer James R. Milkey told the justices.

A top administration official urged the court to throw out the lawsuit and thereby uphold the government's policy.

"Now is not the time" to put new limits on tailpipe emissions "in light of the substantial scientific uncertainty surrounding climate change," said deputy U.S. Solicitor Gen. Gregory Garre.

He insisted that carbon dioxide and other greenhouse gases are not "air pollutants" subject to the Clean Air Act. He also argued that since the states could not prove that reducing auto emissions would spare their coastal regions from environmental damage, they had no "standing" to pursue their lawsuit.

American cars and trucks produce about 6% of the world's greenhouse gases, Garre noted. Requiring more fuel efficient cars would not make much difference, he said.

Garre ran into skeptical questioning from the court's four liberal justices.

"Is there uncertainty on the basic proposition that these greenhouse gases contribute to global warming?" asked Justice John Paul Stevens.

It is "likely there is a connection, but it cannot unequivocally be established," Garre replied.

Justices David H. Souter and Stephen G. Breyer attacked Garre's contention the states did not have standing to sue.

"They don't have to show that [new emissions standards] will stop global warming," Souter said. "It will reduce the degree of global warming and reduce the degree of coastal loss." Meanwhile, the court's four conservatives, led by Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. and Justice Antonin Scalia, sounded as though they agreed with the administration's argument.

"I thought that standing requires imminent harm When is the predicted cataclysm?" Scalia asked in mocking tone.

Roberts questioned whether regulating American cars would reduce greenhouse gases worldwide. That "assumes there isn't going to be a greater contribution of greenhouse gases from economic development in China and other places that's going to displace whatever marginal benefit you get here," he said.

Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr., also a Bush appointee, questioned whether new regulations would have much effect. "The reductions that you could achieve under the best of circumstances with these regulations would be a small portion" of the greenhouse gases produced worldwide, he said.

Justice Clarence Thomas, who as usual said nothing during the argument, has regularly voted with Scalia to narrow the environmental laws.

The outcome probably depends on centrist Justice Anthony M. Kennedy. A California native, he joined the court's liberal bloc in June to preserve broad federal regulation of wetlands, although he wrote a separate opinion to explain his reasons.

During today's argument, he did not tip his hand. He avoided the skeptical questioning from the competing wings of the court and instead probed the standing issue with the lawyers from both sides.

The justices have at least three options before them. They could throw out the lawsuit. They could rule that greenhouse gases are "air pollutants" under the Clean Air Act but leave it to the administration to decide on whether new auto regulations are required. Or, they could rule that the Clean Air Act requires new regulations because there is a consensus among scientists that greenhouse gases are endangering the public's welfare.

A ruling in the case, Massachusetts vs. EPA, may also determine whether California can move ahead with its own rules to combat global warming.

The state has adopted rules for new motor vehicles sold in 2009, but those standards stem from the Clean Air Act. If the court upholds the administration's view that greenhouse gases are not air pollutants, California's rules could be struck down as well.

The other states that joined the suit against the EPA are Connecticut, Illinois, Maine, New Jersey, New Mexico, New York, Oregon, Rhode Island, Vermont and Washington.

Court Considers Role Of U.S. In Regulating Emissions (USAT)

By Joan Biskupic

USA Today, November 30, 2006

WASHINGTON — The Supreme Court entered the debate over global warming Wednesday, as Chief Justice John Roberts and fellow conservatives questioned whether states' environmental problems truly would be helped if the U.S. government changed its decision not to regulate emissions from new cars and trucks.

Roberts suggested that economic development in China, for example, could produce pollution that would offset whatever "marginal benefit" states hope to win through federal limits on tailpipe emissions. Justice Antonin Scalia also seemed skeptical about warnings of looming harm from so-called greenhouse gases, asking, "When is the predicted cataclysm?"

At the same time, Justice John Paul Stevens and other liberal justices were sympathetic to arguments from Massachusetts Assistant Attorney General James Milkey that the impact of carbon dioxide emissions and other greenhouse gases is imminent and serious.

Justice Anthony Kennedy, who is at the ideological center of the divided, nine-member court and could be the decisive vote, did not tip his hand.

Kennedy is from California, the state that has taken the lead in setting standards for vehicle emissions. He also cast the key vote last term for significant federal regulation of endangered wetlands.

However, it was difficult Wednesday to discern how he might vote — and therefore how the court could rule — in a case that ultimately could determine whether manufacturers will be forced to build cleaner-running cars and trucks.

Twelve states, three cities and several public health and environmental groups are challenging the Environmental Protection Agency's decision not to regulate greenhouse gases that the National Academy of Sciences and other groups say cause global warming. The harm caused by vehicle emissions to the environment is key to the states' claim that they have legal standing to challenge the EPA.

"Our harm is imminent in the sense that lighting a fuse on a bomb is imminent harm," Milkey said, adding that once gases are emitted they become dangerous, although their effects may play out over years. He acknowledged only 6% of global carbon dioxide emissions come from U.S. vehicles, but said any action that reduces emissions here would help protect the nation's coastline and other threatened land and waters. Rising temperatures have been linked to glacier thaw, reduced water supply in lakes and lost coastal land.

At issue is a provision of the Clean Air Act requiring regulation of "any air pollutant" from vehicles that "may reasonably be anticipated to endanger public health or welfare." The act defines "welfare" to include effects on climate and weather. The EPA says that the provision does not cover greenhouse gases and that even if it did, the agency has the option not to exercise its authority based on domestic and foreign policy considerations.

"We are not asking the court to pass judgment on the science of climate change or to order EPA to set emissions standards," Milkey said. "We simply want EPA to revisit the rulemaking" process.

Kennedy said the justices might have to address the larger question to decide whether states face the "imminent" harm required for legal standing in the case. He focused on the rules for standing and whether the states might be in a special position to bring the case.

Representing the EPA, Deputy U.S. Solicitor General Gregory Garre said the agency was reluctant to claim authority under the Clean Air Act particularly "in light of the substantial scientific uncertainty surrounding global climate change and the ongoing studies designed to address those uncertainties."

Court Hears Global Warming Case (WP)

By Robert Barnes

The Washington Post, November 30, 2006

The Supreme Court yesterday cautiously confronted for the first time the issue of global warming, hearing a challenge to the Bush administration's refusal to regulate emissions of greenhouse gases in new vehicles.

DOJ_NMG_0100123

Twelve states, led by Massachusetts and joined by the District of Columbia, are objecting to the Environmental Protection Agency's decision to decline to issue emissions standards for new cars and trucks. They and the environmental organizations that support them say the standards should be the first step in a broader effort to reduce carbon dioxide and other gases that they say are harming the atmosphere and leading to global warming and rising sea levels.

But they faced a court sometimes skeptical about whether the remedy they seek would make much difference in the long run, and whether they can even show they are facing the kind of imminent harm that is required before they can press their case.

"I mean," asked Justice Antonin Scalia, "when is the predicted cataclysm?"

Scalia was one of several justices to remark on a lack of scientific expertise during an hour of questioning that touched on whether the states have "standing" to challenge the EPA's refusal, the level of evidence proving the existence of global warming and its causes, and even whether unilateral action by the United States to reduce greenhouse gases would hamper negotiations with other countries on the issue.

The debate inside the court is echoed outside the chamber. Former vice president Al Gore's film "An Inconvenient Truth" increased public awareness of the issue. And the Democrats who won control of Congress this month have said they will make the issue a priority: Sen. Barbara Boxer (D-Calif.), who is in line to become chairman of the Environment and Public Works Committee, said a failure to limit greenhouse gases will lead to "economic decline and environmental ruin." She would replace Chairman James M. Inhofe (R-Okla.), who has called global warming a hoax.

Massachusetts Assistant Attorney General James R. Milkey told the court that 200 miles of the state's coastline are threatened by rising seas, a result of global warming.

"The harm does not suddenly spring up in the year 2100; it plays out continuously over time," Milkey said in answer to Scalia's question. "Once these gases are emitted . . . they stay a long time -- the laws of physics take over."

Milkey faced skeptical questioning from Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. and Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr., the court's newest members, but the most sustained -- and entertaining -- interrogation came from Scalia.

At one point, he acknowledged the role of carbon dioxide as a pollutant in the air but wondered about it being a pollutant in the "stratosphere."

"Respectfully, Your Honor, it is not the stratosphere. It's the troposphere," Milkey said.

"Troposphere, whatever. I told you before I'm not a scientist," Scalia said to laughter. "That's why I don't want to have to deal with global warming, to tell you the truth."

Milkey had already said that the court need not pass judgment on the science of climate change to find that the EPA did not do its job when deciding not to regulate new vehicle emissions.

The case started in 1999, when an environmental group, the International Center for Technology Assessment, and others petitioned the EPA to set greenhouse gas emissions standards for new vehicles.

In 2003, the agency denied the petition, saying said that it lacked statutory authority to regulate greenhouse gas emissions, even though the agency in previous administrations had held that it did. Further, the agency said, even if it did have authority, it was not required to use it.

The agency decided, according to Deputy Solicitor General Gregory C. Garre, "now is not the time to exercise such authority, in light of the substantial scientific uncertainty surrounding global climate change and the ongoing studies designed to address those uncertainties."

Even if the court sides with the states, it is only being asked to remand the issue back to the EPA with specifications on what to look at in deciding whether to issue the emissions standards. And both sides agree that vehicle admissions in the United States amount to only 6 percent of total carbon dioxide emissions; tougher standards on new vehicles would only moderately reduce that.

But the court's decision could affect other efforts by environmentalists to force action on emissions from power plants -- stalled in the courts -- and shed light on the appropriateness of individual states' actions. California, for instance, has passed greenhouse gas emissions standards that are to go into effect in 2009 but are being challenged by industry.

Justice Stephen G. Breyer said a change of heart by the EPA could set off a string of similarly small decisions by other agencies, "each of which has an impact, and lo and behold, Cape Cod is saved." He seemed most sympathetic to the states' case, along with Justices John Paul Stevens, David H. Souter and Ruth Bader Ginsburg.

Justice Clarence Thomas, who as usual asked no questions, is presumed to be in line with Scalia, Roberts and Alito. That leaves Justice Anthony M. Kennedy as a pivotal vote in whether the states have proven they have standing for the case to go forward.

He noted Milkey's "perhaps reassuring statement" that the court does not have to make a judgment about global warming. "But," Kennedy asked, "don't we have to do that in order to decide the standing argument, because there's no injury if there's not global warming?"

Global Warming Debate Hits Supreme Court (CNN)

By Bill Mears, CNN Washington Bureau

CNN.com, November 30, 2006

WASHINGTON (CNN) -- The Supreme Court appeared sharply divided Wednesday over what role the federal government should play in regulating carbon dioxide emissions from new cars.

The major environmental case pits states against the Bush administration over damage claims blamed on global warming.

"Isn't it intuitively reasonable to suppose that with some reduction of the greenhouse gases, there will be some reduction of the ensuing damage or the ensuing climate change which causes the damage?" asked Justice David Souter. "Isn't that fair?"

"There's something of a consensus on warming, but not a consensus on how much is attributable to human activity," countered Justice Antonin Scalia.

Carbon dioxide -- the principal greenhouse gas -- drifts into the atmosphere from the burning of fossil fuels such as petroleum and coal.

At issue is whether the Environmental Protection Agency is required by law to regulate carbon dioxide emissions from newly manufactured motor vehicles.

The debate centers on whether carbon dioxide constitutes a "pollutant" under the Clean Air Act. EPA officials argue it is not and that the agency alone has the discretion to decide such matters.

The oil and gas industry supports the EPA's position. In the late 1990s, the Clinton administration concluded the EPA has the regulatory authority to reduce carbon dioxide emissions, but the Bush administration in 2003 reversed that position, prompting the current legal fight.

Twelve states, led by Massachusetts, have sued the Bush administration, demanding the executive branch take the lead in curtailing potentially harmful emissions.An important precedent at stake

It is the first time the high court has addressed global warming and could set an important precedent on federal discretion to recognize and regulate any environmental and health damage.

The majority of scientific studies have concluded the emissions are the principal cause of manmade greenhouse gases -- trapping heat and leading to a recent rise in the planet's temperatures.

Some environmentalists think such drastic climate changes can lead to rising sea levels and dramatic, often catastrophic meteorological changes such as drought and hurricanes.

The high court debated not only whether the EPA was within its discretion by refusing to impose mandatory limits, but also whether there is actual statutory power.

There was no consensus among the justices whether Congress specifically authorized the executive branch to maintain a sweeping greenhouse-gas control program.

A federal appeals court upheld the right of the administration to stay out of the regulatory scheme.

The states argue mandatory controls by manufacturing plants and automobile makers would reduce the carbon dioxide emissions.

Lawyers for the states call the threat of global warming "the most pressing environmental problem of our time."

Other states filing appeals are California, Connecticut, Illinois, Maine, New Jersey, New Mexico, New York, Oregon, Rhode Island, Vermont, and Washington.

Several cities also filed suit, including New York and Washington, as well as Alaskan native groups and the Union of Concerned Scientists.Scalia: Carbon dioxide not an air pollutant

In oral arguments, Justice Samuel Alito quizzed Massachusetts Assistant Attorney General James Milkey to quantify the "imminent" harm caused by greenhouse gases.

The issue is important because the states must prove such specific harm to individuals in the face of EPA inaction before they can establish legal "standing" to continue their lawsuit.

"Let's say we're looking [ahead] at five years or 10 years, what particularized harm does the record show that Massachusetts will, or faces an imminent threat of suffering?" Alito asked.

"Given the nature of the harms, even small reductions can be significant," Milkey replied.

Chief Justice John Roberts questioned the impact of any specific reductions by the United States alone, noting even if carbon dioxide emissions on new cars were regulated in the United States, broader global sources of pollution would remain.

"It assumes there isn't going to be a greater contribution of greenhouse gases from economic development in China and other places that's going to displace whatever marginal benefit you get here," Roberts said.

Milkey was hard pressed to estimate precisely how much reduction in greenhouse gases would occur if the EPA stepped in to reduce output from new cars.

DOJ_NMG_0100125

Currently about 6 percent of the world's output of carbon dioxide comes from U.S. vehicles. Scalia wondered what effect a reduction to 4 percent would represent.

Scalia also disagreed that carbon dioxide causes air pollution, since he said its destructive effects were as a "stratospheric pollutant" above the Earth's atmosphere.

"I think it has to endanger health by reason of polluting the air, and this does not endanger health by reason of polluting the air at all," said Scalia.

Milkey said the EPA's claim that carbon dioxide is not a pollutant "fails the common-sense test," and pointed out the agency is already regulating acid rain and other forms of pollution caused by chemical emissions.What is the federal government's role?

Gregory Garre, a Justice Department attorney, told the justices the federal government should not be forced "to embark on the extraordinarily complex and scientifically uncertain" global issue of greenhouse gas emissions.

"Now is not the time to exercise such authority," he said.

Justice Anthony Kennedy, who could prove a key swing vote in the case, seemed concerned about when individuals could suffer serious enough health risks to go to court.

"Your problem," he told Garre, "you take the position, the proposition that the greater the harm the greater the risk, the smaller the probability has to be before it is reasonable to act, and necessary to act."

Souter took the point further, pressing Garre over why the state's claims of long-term "ongoing harm" should not be considered.

"You are saying unless they can pinpoint the correlation between reduction of gas and effect, let's say in coastline loss, they have not shown either causation or redressibility," Souter said.

"But why do they have to show a precise correlation as opposed to simply establishing what I think is not really contested, that there is a correlation between greenhouse gases and the kind of loss that they're talking about?"

The issue of new car emissions could have broader environmental and legal implications.

A separate case dealing with EPA authority over carbon dioxide emissions from power plants -- which represent an estimated 9 percent of global greenhouse gas emissions -- is already being litigated in other federal courts.

The current case is Massachusetts et al. v. EPA (05-1120). A ruling is expected by June.

Supreme Court Wades Into Global Warming Debate (MRKTWTCH)

By Stephanie I. Cohen

Market Watch, November 30, 2006

States seek to force EPA to regulate greenhouse-gas emissions from cars

WASHINGTON (MarketWatch) - The nation's highest court tackled the hottest environmental issue on Wednesday - whether the U.S. government must address the dangers of global warming and cap the greenhouse gases that are spewed from vehicles.

A dozen states, frustrated by what they see as lax U.S. policy on curbing emissions of harmful greenhouse gases like carbon dioxide, sued the Environmental Protection Agency in 2003 for failing to reduce emissions from cars after years of agency debate that ended in no new rules.

"We are certainly glad to have our day in court. We've waited seven years for this day...seven precious years," said Joe Mendelson, legal director of the International Center for Technology Assessment, in an interview ahead of the court date. The group was responsible for originally seeking EPA action on vehicle pollution.

In oral arguments Wednesday, the justices aggressively questioned both sides. They asked the attorney for the EPA to justify doing nothing about climate change, while peppering the attorney for the states about their standing to sue and about what harm has actually been done by the EPA's failure to regulate carbon dioxide.

The Supreme Court agreed to hear the case - Commonwealth of Massachusetts et al. v. Environmental Protection Agency et al. - and consider two questions, first whether the EPA has the authority to regulate these emissions and whether the agency can decide not to issue emissions regulations for vehicles even if it has authority. Read more about the case at the American Bar Association's Supreme Court site.

The bulk of carbon-dioxide emissions in the U.S. are generated from burning dirty fossil fuels for energy. These gases trap heat in the earth's atmosphere and are expected to contribute to warming temperatures in the coming decades.

Global-warming activists say would every action help and are concerned that a failure to rein in carbon dioxide emissions will lead to warming temperatures, more frequent and more violent storms, rising sea levels, and increased spread of disease.

The U.S. transportation sector, which runs predominantly on petroleum products, accounts for about 6% of global carbon emissions and 33% of total U.S. energy-related carbon-dioxide emissions in 2005, according to the Energy Department's statistical arm.

Question of standing

The case could be a precedent-setting environmental ruling, deciding whether EPA can and must regulate tailpipe emissions. But before the court considers the merits of the case, the plaintiffs must first convince the court they have standing under the Constitution to proceed and can prove that the states have suffered direct injury from EPA's failure to regulate emissions.

Justice Antonin Scalia was particularly concerned with the question of standing at the oral hearing on Wednesday. Scalia honed in on the issue of whether the states can prove damage from climate change, pointing out that emissions stay in the air for some time before leading to climate change later.

Scalia also questioned the significance of requiring regulations for only new U.S. vehicles when climate change is a global problem, saying this point gets to the matter of how eminent is the danger to states.

James Milkey, attorney for Massachusetts, argued that the injury was "ongoing" and won't just spring up all at once in the coming decades. He added that "the injury doesn't get any more specific" than losing the hundreds of miles of shoreline as Massachusetts has predicted. "Even small reductions can be significant," Milkey said.

EPA argued that the states' case rests on general grievances and that the states haven't shown how a failure to regulate vehicle emissions has caused direct actual injuries or how such injuries could be redressed by a court. EPA also argued that 6% is a small portion of global emissions and that it would make an insignificant difference over the years, especially if other countries ramp up their emissions over the same period.

"The fact that you're injured doesn't necessarily mean that the government's failure to regulate emissions caused your injury," said Jeff Holmstead, a former EPA administrator who was involved in the agency's initial review of the case and its determination that it lacked authority to regulate emissions. Holmstead spoke on Tuesday.

Defining a pollutant

The Clean Air Act authorizes the EPA to set standards for air pollutants that may "reasonably be anticipated" to endanger public health or welfare and devise controls for motor vehicle pollution.

Milkey told the court that carbon is clearly an air pollutant, but EPA disagrees.

EPA, which enforces the nation's clean air laws, claims Congress did not give it the authority to regulate carbon emissions specifically to address climate change when it crafted the Clean Air Act. And even if it had authority, EPA has said it has discretion to act and wouldn't address climate change, arguing that the science behind climate change still has too many uncertainties.

Gregory Garre, the Justice Department attorney representing the EPA in the case, hammered home the agency's position that the science of climate change remains uncertain, that EPA has discretion over whether to act based on current studies, and that U.S. car emissions are an insignificant portion of total global emissions.

But several justices seemed to question the government's premise. Justice John Paul Stevens pointed to scientists who've worked on government studies and have said facts were omitted that would indicate the science is far less uncertain than EPA says. Both Justice Stephen Breyer and Justice David Souter asked EPA why a 6% reduction in emissions wasn't enough of a starting point for the agency.

"Why is it unreasonable to go to an agency and say, 'you do your 6%'?" Breyer asked Garre.

Several justices also made a comparison between climate change and acid rain, which is a global air problem that EPA regulates.

A number of states are siding with EPA, saying they don't want to face responsibility for enforcing new regulations, including Texas, Michigan, Idaho, Alaska, North Dakota, Kansas, Nebraska, Utah, Ohio, South Dakota, and Indiana.

In July 2005 a three-judge panel of the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit issued three separate opinions in the case. Two of the judges agreed to let EPA's administrative decision stand, but for different reasons. A third judge agreed with the states that EPA must regulate greenhouse gases.

Most parties following the case agree that even if the court rules in favor of the states, the decision is unlikely to lead to caps on carbon emissions any time soon.

"Whichever way the court decision comes out, there is going to be a big debate on climate change," said Holmstead, who is now a partner at the lobbying firm Bracewell Giuliani in Washington. If the states win, "it goes back to the agency where it will be probably for several years."

DOJ_NMG_0100127

Groups backing the states agree that even a court victory would not be an ideal solution. "We all would prefer a comprehensive global warming bill to come out of Congress," said David Bookbinder, senior attorney for the Sierra Club, in an interview on Tuesday.

The court is expected to render a decision in the case by next summer. Stephanie I. Cohen is a freelance journalist based in Washington.

Global Warming Dispute Divides U.S. Supreme Court (Update1) (BLOOM)

By Greg Stohr

Bloomberg, November 30, 2006

Nov. 29 (Bloomberg) -- A divided U.S. Supreme Court wrestled with its first global warming case, a bid by states and environmentalists to force the Bush administration to regulate tailpipe emissions.

Several justices, led by Antonin Scalia and John Roberts, questioned whether 12 states have the legal right to challenge an Environmental Protection Agency decision not to regulate those emissions. Roberts, the chief justice, said the states were ``spinning out conjecture on conjecture'' to support the argument that they would benefit from EPA rules.

Other justices suggested during the hour-long argument in Washington that the agency relied on impermissible factors in making its decision. Justice John Paul Stevens criticized the EPA's reliance on three National Academy of Sciences reports for the notion that scientists are unsure whether so-called greenhouse gases are increasing the earth's temperature.

``In their selective quotations, they left out the parts that indicated there was far less uncertainty than the agency purported to find,'' Stevens said.

The case raises the prospect of new regulations on automakers including General Motors Corp. and Ford Motor Co., companies already facing reductions in sales. Depending on how broadly the court rules, the case might also affect utilities, which have fought efforts to cut emissions of carbon dioxide and other so-called greenhouse gases from power plants.

The court today also heard arguments in a second high- profile business case, a bid by Michigan to regulate the mortgage-lending business of Wachovia Corp. and potentially other so-called national banks.

Banking Case

In the global warming case, the divide may leave Justice Anthony Kennedy as the deciding vote, as he was in a land-use case in the court's last term. Kennedy didn't tip his hand today, directing a handful of questions to both sides.

The EPA said in 2003 that it wouldn't regulate greenhouse- gas emissions from new cars and trucks, pointing to ``substantial scientific uncertainty'' about the effects of climate change on human health and the environment and about the best means to address the issue.

The agency also questioned the wisdom of a ``piecemeal'' approach to greenhouse gases and said that unilateral EPA regulation would undermine the president's ability to persuade developing countries to cut their emissions.

In addition, the agency said Congress hasn't given it authority to regulate greenhouse gases, regardless of what the scientific evidence showed.

Clean Air Act

The states and environmentalists say agency action is required by the wording of the U.S. Clean Air Act, which instructs the EPA to regulate ``air pollutants'' that ``may reasonably be anticipated to endanger public health or welfare.'' They contend the agency was wrong to consider other factors in its decision not to regulate.

The Bush administration says the Clean Air Act confers broad discretion on the EPA to decide whether to regulate. The government also contends the states lack the legal standing to sue because they can't show they would reap any environmental benefit from EPA regulation.

The high court today spent much of its time focused on a preliminary question that may have broad implications: whether the states have legal standing to sue the EPA.

On that point, Scalia, Roberts and Justice Samuel Alito all pressed the lawyer for the states, Massachusetts Assistant Attorney General James R. Milkey. Scalia said previous Supreme court cases required a showing of ``imminent'' harm, and he questioned whether that was occurring.

Small Portion

Alito said U.S. motor vehicles account for only 6 percent of the total carbon dioxide emissions worldwide.

``So the reduction that you could achieve under the best of circumstances with these regulations would be a small portion of that, would it not?'' Alito asked.

Milkey told Alito that ``even small reductions can be significant.'' The lawyer said that Massachusetts already was losing land along 200 miles of coastland because of rising sea levels caused by global warming.

Milkey drew support from Justices Stephen Breyer and David Souter, both of whom directed the bulk of their questions at Justice Department lawyer Greg Garre.

``It will reduce the degree of global warming and reduce the degree of coastal loss," Souter said. ``That's their argument -- not all or nothing, but a part."

Scalia Resistance

Garre told the justices that the EPA had made a ``quintessential administrative judgment" that shouldn't be second-guessed by the courts.

He drew resistance on that issue from a number of justices, including Scalia, who said Milkey had made a ``persuasive" point in comparing global warming to acid rain. The EPA regulates sulfur dioxide, which causes acid rain.

``Why isn't it air pollution within the meaning of the statute, when whatever it is that causes acid rain is?" Scalia asked Garre.

The U.S. Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit upheld the agency's decision last year on a 2-1 vote, though the two judges in the majority differed in their reasoning.

The case is one of two efforts by northeastern and western states to make the EPA adopt emissions standards to address global warming. New York is leading a second effort to force regulation of power-plant pollution.

The Supreme Court has two air-pollution cases on its 2006-07 calendar. The justices heard arguments Nov. 1 on federal government efforts to force Duke Energy Corp. and other utilities to install billions of dollars in new pollution-control equipment.

The justices are scheduled to rule by July in the global warming case, Massachusetts v. EPA, 05-1120.

Global Warming Goes To High Court (WT)

By Amy Fagan

The Washington Times, November 30, 2006

Massachusetts Assistant Attorney General James R. Milkey, representing 12 states and 13 environmental groups, yesterday called on the Supreme Court to force the federal government to regulate greenhouse-gas emissions from new automobiles.

As the court waded into the politically charged issue of global warming for the first time, Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. and Justice Antonin Scalia pressed Mr. Milkey to explain when and how greenhouse gases will injure his state.

Mr. Milkey said Massachusetts has 200 miles of coastal land that is being lost to rising seas caused by global warming and that the damage will increase.

"It's not so much a cataclysm as [it is] ongoing harm," he said under questioning by Justice Scalia in a courtroom packed for the case's hour of oral arguments.

Any reduction to the 6 percent of global greenhouse-gas emissions caused by vehicles in the United States would help, Mr. Milkey said, because "once they are emitted, the laws of physics take over" and damage is inevitable.

Although there is "something of a consensus" that global warming is occurring, Justice Scalia said, there is no consensus on how much of the problem is caused by human pollutants.

The states say the Environmental Protection Agency (EPA) has failed to fulfill its role of regulating car emissions under the Clean Air Act of 1970.

The Bush administration has resisted such regulations, contending that the EPA has no such authority under the Clean Air Act. Backers of the administration's stance say the regulations would put U.S. industry at a competitive risk.

Justice Department Deputy Solicitor General Gregory G. Garre -- representing the EPA, the car-manufacturing state of Michigan and eight other states -- said there is "substantial scientific uncertainty" about global climate change.

He said he knows of no studies suggesting that regulating this "minuscule" percent of greenhouse gases would have any effect.

Justice Steven G. Breyer appeared unimpressed.

"Why is it unreasonable to go to an agency and say, 'Now you do your part'?" he asked.

Outside the court, Massachusetts Attorney General Tom Reilly said the law is clear and that the EPA is refusing to do its job.

"That's all we're asking: Do your job," he said. "Global warming is the most serious environmental problem of our time."

The Clean Air Act states that the EPA administrator "shall by regulation prescribe ... standards applicable to the emission of any air pollutant from any class or classes of new motor vehicles or new motor vehicle engines, which in his judgment cause, or contribute to, air pollution which may reasonably be anticipated to endanger public health or welfare."

At issue isn't whether carbon dioxide and other emissions are linked to global warming, but whether the government has the authority to limit these emissions.

Carbon dioxide is produced when fossil fuels such as oil and natural gas are burned. Scientists think it is the main greenhouse gas, flowing into the atmosphere at a high rate and causing a warming of the Earth and environmental changes.

The court is expected to rule before July, and the decision could have a ripple effect. Another case involving the EPA's refusal to regulate greenhouse-gas emissions from power plants is being debated in federal court.

Regardless of the outcome of the Massachusetts case, Congress may soon tackle the topic. Democrats, who take control of Congress in January, say it's long past time the administration step up the fight against global warming.

"With the new Congress elected to change Washington, I am hopeful that we can finally go to work on addressing global climate change rather than denying the obvious," said Sen. John Kerry, Massachusetts Democrat.

Eyes On Kennedy As Supreme Court Debates Global Warming Case (LAW)

By Tony Mauro, Legal Times

Legal Times, November 30, 2006

Supreme Court Justice Anthony Kennedy appears to hold the key to the outcome of the Court's first case assessing the environmental impact of global warming.

During oral arguments Wednesday in the closely watched case Massachusetts v. Environmental Protection Agency, justices seemed deeply divided on two questions: whether the EPA can be compelled to regulate greenhouse gas emissions from cars when the agency has chosen not to, and whether Massachusetts and 11 other states even have standing to challenge the EPA's actions.

Kennedy was relatively quiet during the hour, but several other justices seemed to tip their hands on the claim by the states that they have standing to compel the agency to regulate such emissions. The EPA decided in 2003 that it did not have the authority under the Clean Air Act to regulate carbon dioxide emissions -- and that because of scientific uncertainty about the effect of global warming, it would not regulate even if it had the power to do so.

The dispute comes to the Court as a growing number of states are becoming impatient with the federal government on the issue.

"The United States is the largest polluter on the planet, and leadership from our federal government is essential to curb global warming," said California Attorney General Bill Lockyer after the arguments. "But California will not stand by if the Bush administration continues to stall." California is one of the states suing the EPA.

Massachusetts Assistant Attorney General James Milkey began his arguments to the Court by reassuring the justices he was not asking them to "pass judgment on the science of climate change." All he wants, he said, is for the EPA to reconsider the issue, as required by the Clean Air Act.

Almost immediately, though, justices were debating global warming nonetheless as part of their inquiry into whether the states had standing to sue. The Court has been stingy on standing in environmental cases, so the justices spent considerable time asking whether the states could show they were injured by the EPA's decision not to regulate carbon dioxide -- and whether a Court decision against the EPA would alleviate the harm.

Justice Antonin Scalia, recalling his own 1992 ruling on standing, Lujan v. Defenders of Wildlife, said the harm had to be imminent in order for the suing party to achieve standing. "When is the predicted cataclysm?" Scalia said in a flat voice.

"It's not so much a cataclysm as ongoing harm," Milkey replied. "There's nothing conjectural about that. Once these gases are emitted into the area, and they stay a long time, the laws of physics take over."

The harm to his state's sovereignty -- in the form of reducing its coastal land mass -- had already begun and was ongoing, Milkey said, likening it to "lighting the fuse on a bomb." Milkey also said, "The injury doesn't get any more particular than states losing 200 miles of coastline ... to rising seas."

But Scalia asserted that even if the EPA did regulate emissions, the impact on the state's coastline would be minimal. Milkey replied, "Relatively small percentage reductions can lead to real-world results."

Chief Justice John Roberts Jr. seemed doubtful, as well, that the states had achieved standing to pursue the case. He said testimony about the future impact of EPA regulations on global warming amounted to "spinning conjecture on conjecture" and was insufficient to achieve standing.

Roberts has his own expertise in the area. As deputy solicitor general in 1990, he argued and won the Lujan case.

The chief justice seemed skeptical about the merits of the Massachusetts case, too, suggesting there was more scientific uncertainty about the harm from global warming, than, for example, the effects of lead in gasoline.

But Milkey countered that when lead was regulated in 1973, "there were huge amounts of uncertainty at that time." The high court upheld those regulations in 1976.

From the few questions he asked, Justice Samuel Alito Jr. seemed likely to join Roberts and Scalia in opposing standing. As usual, Justice Clarence Thomas asked no questions, but his track record on standing suggests he would oppose it.

On the other side, Justice David Souter appeared to be the strongest champion for the states, especially on the issue of standing. Even if the impact of EPA regulations on the global warming program is relatively small, he said it was enough to justify action by the EPA. "They don't have to show that it will stop global warming," said Souter. "Their point is that it will reduce the degree of global warming, if it only by 2 1/2 percent. What's wrong with that?"

Deputy Solicitor General Gregory Garre, representing the government, said that was not enough. "They have to show the regulation of that tiny fraction would have an effect on their alleged injuries," Garre said, adding, "They haven't even tried to make that showing."

Comments by Justices John Paul Stevens, Ruth Bader Ginsburg, and Stephen Breyer seemed to place them on Souter's side, leaving Kennedy as the unknown and decisive vote.

EPA Backtracks On Easing Toxin Rule (WP)

By Juliet Eilperin

The Washington Post, November 30, 2006

Under pressure from Democratic senators, the Bush administration has modified its proposal to ease public reporting requirements for companies that handle or release toxic chemicals.

The Environmental Protection Agency has proposed new rules for the Toxics Release Inventory, an annual accounting of more than 650 chemicals that industry releases into the air, land and water. The changes would raise the threshold for reporting releases of toxic chemicals in detail from 500 to 5,000 pounds and would allow companies to report every other year instead of annually.

In response, New Jersey Democratic senators Frank Lautenberg and Robert Menendez in July blocked confirmation of Bush's nominee to head the EPA's Office of Environmental Information, Molly O'Neill.

EPA Administrator Stephen L. Johnson, in a letter obtained by The Washington Post, has written to the two senators telling them that he is revising the proposal to restore the requirement for annual reports. "Your perspective on the program is invaluable to us," Johnson wrote.

The EPA had been tinkering with its proposal since shortly before this month's midterm elections, but Johnson's letter highlights how the political climate has shifted since the Democrats won control of the House and Senate. The administration is not likely to bend on its top environmental priorities, such as climate change, but it may make concessions on other fronts.

James L. Connaughton, who chairs the White House Council on Environmental Quality, said in an interview after the elections that the administration may be able to make common cause with Democrats on some issues.

"The history of environmental legislation is a history of reasonable balance," Connaughton said. "At the end of the day, if you want to see progress on the environment, you got to strike that reasonable balance."

Lautenberg, who said he will release his hold on O'Neill's nomination but will continue to fight any effort to weaken the toxin-reporting requirements, said the administration's new flexibility underscores how lawmakers' stance is likely to change over the next two years.

"Unlike the last six years, the Bush administration will no longer get a free pass from Congress," he said in a statement. "Democrats will now control the EPA's budget and will run the committees that oversee the agency's activities. EPA will be held accountable for every abuse and misreading of the law it engages in."

Congress created the Toxics Release Inventory program 20 years ago in the wake of the 1984 Union Carbide disaster in Bhopal, India, where an accidental release of toxins killed and injured thousands of people living near the plant. U.S. toxic releases have dropped sharply since companies were compelled to file the reports, but some complain that the regulation is too costly.

The EPA had calculated that industry could save $2 million a year by reporting its releases every other year. It would save an additional $7.4 million by no longer having to report in detail on toxic releases between 500 and 5,000 pounds or on releases of persistent toxins such as lead and mercury below 50 pounds.

Sean Moulton, who directs federal information policy for the public policy watchdog group OMB Watch, said the proposal emphasized saving money for the agency and industry over protecting the public's health.

"The EPA just hasn't done its homework on these proposals," Moulton said. "They haven't done the research on whether there are serious health risks [associated with] the different thresholds they're proposing."

Alex Fidis, a staff attorney at the U.S. Public Interest Research Group, an advocacy organization, said the EPA could reduce the regulatory burden on industry by developing software to help companies calculate their harmful releases and file their reports electronically.

The EPA plans to issue a final rule on the reporting program "by the end of the year," said spokeswoman Jennifer Wood. She said officials are weighing the more than 100,000 comments they received, many objecting to the changes.

"EPA's working to making a good program better," Wood said.

Lautenberg said he would continue to press the administration to abandon the new rule.

Report: Conservation Efforts Offset Land Lost To Sprawl (USAT)

By Patrick O'driscoll

USA Today, November 30, 2006

DENVER — Growing efforts to save privately owned farms, ranches and forests from industrial and residential development now preserve about as much open space each year as is lost to sprawl, according to a report out today.

The National Land Trust Census, conducted every five years by an umbrella organization for land conservation groups, says private land under protective trusts and easements now total 37 million acres, a 54% increase from the last count in 2000.

Conservation of private land from 2000 to 2005 averaged 2.6 million acres a year — about half the size of New Jersey, according to the Land Trust Alliance, which represents 1,200 of the USA's 1,667 local, state and national land trusts.

This means additional land protected each year exceeds the 2.2 million acres that the Agriculture Department has estimated is converted annually to “developed land.”

Most of the growth was in action by local and state trusts. Unlike larger national trusts, many of these groups are run primarily by volunteers. Yet such trusts tripled the average acreage they were able to set aside annually compared with the previous five-year census.

The results “took my breath away,” says Land Trust Alliance president Rand Wentworth. “They showed that a movement of local volunteer groups is making a huge difference in conserving places they love.”

The biggest acreage is in conservation easements, legal pacts between landowners and trusts or government agencies that permanently limit the land's use. The land census says easements have risen 148% since the last count.

An easement preserves open space permanently as scenic landscape, watershed or wildlife habitat from other development. The landowner, often a rancher or farmer, receives a tax credit in exchange and can continue to graze livestock or grow crops on the property.

“When you're driving through California and see all this land, you assume the government owns it and it's protected. But half of it is privately owned. The public gets the benefit of (landowners') management,” says Nita Vail of the California Rangeland Trust, which promotes easements.

Land conservation increased in all regions, especially in the West, which has 43% of the private land conserved since 2000 by local and state trusts. The Northeast tallied 30% of the state and local total, largely through easements. That included the single largest conservation transaction: more than 762,000 acres in Maine's Pingree forest in 2001.

Plutonium Lifespan In U.S. Weapons Much Longer Than Thought (WP)

By Walter Pincus

The Washington Post, November 30, 2006

The National Nuclear Security Administration said yesterday that studies have concluded that the plutonium used to trigger U.S. nuclear warheads and bombs will remain reliable for about 100 years, far longer than had been believed.

"These studies show that the degradation of plutonium in our nuclear weapons will not affect warhead reliability for decades," NNSA Administrator Linton F. Brooks said in a statement. An independent panel of renowned scientists and academics known as the Jason group reviewed the studies by the Los Alamos and Lawrence Livermore national laboratories and concluded that "most plutonium pit types have credible lifetimes of at least 100 years," according to the NNSA statement.

Results of the studies could affect the Bush administration's plans for building a new generation of nuclear weapons under the Reliable Replacement Warhead (RRW) program. A major reason for going to a new nuclear warhead was the belief that highly radioactive plutonium would degrade so much within 45 years that it could affect the reliability of currently deployed and stockpiled nuclear weapons, which were built beginning in the 1960s.

The present refurbishment program, which does not include the nuclear package, is directed at upgrading for 20 more years the aging conventional explosives and hundreds of the thousands of nonnuclear components in each weapon.

The father of the RRW program, Rep. David L. Hobson (R-Ohio), chairman of the House Appropriations subcommittee that handles funding for the nuclear weapons complex, said in a recent interview that he had heard that the plutonium study found that aging "is not as much of a problem as they thought it would be." As a result, he said, "that may throw some sand in the eye of RRW."

Robert W. Nelson, a senior scientist associated with the Union of Concerned Scientists, said yesterday that the studies "dramatically undercut the prime justification for having to rebuild the existing stockpile." The core plutonium component "will not need to be replaced for 50 years or more."

NNSA officials said yesterday that they do not agree that the plutonium findings mean that the RRW program does not need to go forward. "Plutonium aging is but one variable that can affect overall system reliability," the NNSA statement said. Brooks added: "It is now clear that although plutonium aging contributes, other factors control the overall life expectancy of nuclear weapons systems."

When Hobson first proposed the RRW program three years ago, it was designed to replace the Bush administration's proposal to study a possible nuclear "bunker buster" to go after underground fortified shelters or to look at new effects from nuclear devices that would destroy chemical or biological agents. Instead, Hobson wanted to rebuild the nonnuclear parts of the current stockpile to make the components safer, more secure and more reliable.

The administration then adopted RRW and by this year turned it into a program that would lead within 20 years to a new generation of nuclear weapons based on old tested designs, which would not require restarting an underground testing program. Los Alamos and Livermore are working on competing RRW designs with a winner expected to be selected soon.

Feds: Ruling Hurts Oversight Of Indian Casinos (USAT)

By Kevin Johnson

USA Today, November 30, 2006

Audits blocked; some see threat to integrity

WASHINGTON — Federal auditors say a court ruling last month has crippled their ability to examine operations at Indian casinos, raising concerns that the $22 billion Indian gaming industry could be increasingly vulnerable to corruption.

The National Indian Gaming Commission (NIGC), a regulatory panel within the Department of Interior, says its auditors have been prohibited from conducting reviews of personnel and finances at Indian casinos across the nation since the D.C. Circuit Court of Appeals ruled Oct. 20 that the commission's regulatory authority does not extend much beyond its oversight of bingo games.

The court accepted an Arizona tribe's argument that audits of Indian casinos — which account for about 88% of all gaming revenue in Indian Country — should be the responsibility of states and tribes. Since the ruling, 15 federal audits of Indian casinos have been suspended and a dozen casinos have barred NIGC investigators from tribal gaming facilities in Oregon, California, Arizona, Minnesota and Oklahoma, according to the commission.

“We've had doors slammed in our faces,” NIGC Chairman Philip Hogen said in an interview. He said federal involvement in the casino audits is necessary because some states and tribes are not able to provide enough oversight of the businesses. He would not say which ones.

In a Nov. 8 letter to the Senate Indian Affairs Committee, Hogen said that if the court's ruling stands, federal law enforcement would be “crippled in its effort to protect the integrity of tribal gaming operations” without the NIGC. The NIGC is weighing whether to appeal the court decision or ask Congress for more authority to regulate Indian casinos.

Randy Jackson, director of the FBI's Indian Country unit, says the bureau is “deeply concerned” by the ruling. “If Indian gaming operations are not regulated, the integrity of the … industry is at risk.”

Indian officials, however, call the court's ruling a victory for tribal sovereignty and an acknowledgement that tribes and states provide adequate oversight. Ernest Stevens Jr. of the National Indian Gaming Association says tribes have 259 agreements with authorities in 22 states to regulate Indian casinos.

The NIGC “does not need duplicative federal rule-making authority over matters already addressed by tribal law and the tribal-state compact process,” says Stevens, whose group represents 184 Indian nations involved in tribal gaming.

The Arizona tribe that challenged the NIGC's authority, the Colorado River Indian Tribes, says the NIGC never had the power to regulate casinos.

“The federal court's decision was an important and necessary victory for tribal sovereignty,” says Jason Rose, spokesman for the tribe.

State regulators defended their oversight of Indian casinos. Arizona's Department of Gaming, which helps 21 tribes oversee gaming operations that produced $1.7 billion in revenue in fiscal 2006, said the court decision would not affect casino regulation in Arizona.

Simon says the agency has agreed to contribute $300,000 in each of the next five years to pay for a full-time federal prosecutor in the local U.S. attorney's office dedicated to Indian gaming matters and to train tribal gaming authorities. “This is an agency with teeth,” Simon says.

However, Thomas Heffelfinger, a former federal prosecutor in Minnesota whose office has dealt with regional tribal issues, says the court's decision likely will “make it that much more difficult for the federal government to respond when there is evidence of misconduct.”

During the past three years, the NIGC has referred more than 30 cases of suspected criminal activity related to Indian gaming operations to federal law enforcement agencies, the commission says.

Twenty-five of the cases involved casino operations, says Joseph Valandra, the commission's chief of staff.

Last year, the NIGC was praised by U.S. prosecutors in New York for its work in a probe of alleged organized crime ties to international gambling activities with links to operations on the Tonkawa Indian Reservation in Oklahoma. The inquiry produced an 88-count indictment charging 17 defendants in a $200 million illegal gambling enterprise that involved wagering on horse races and other sports events.

Heffelfinger says the ruling could undermine partnerships between the NIGC and federal law enforcement aimed at fighting corruption in the growing Indian casino industry.

“The real losers are the tribes,” he says.

Parks And Tribe Locked In Land Dispute (FINDLAW/AP)

By Rachel La Corte, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 30, 2006

(AP) - LA PUSH, Wash.-The small Quileute Indian reservation sits on a shoreline of storm-tossed driftwood and pebble beaches, with dramatic views of rock formations rising out of the Pacific Ocean.

But the same ocean that crashes daily on these beaches is at the center of a long-simmering boundary battle between the tribe and the National Park Service.

The tribe has closed public access to one beach, and threatens to close another if members don't get additional land on higher ground, fearing the sea will sweep away the tribe's lower village.

The tribe has offered a land swap - it will hand over eight acres of disputed land at Rialto Beach and reopen access to Second Beach if the park cedes - or buys for the tribe - enough land to more than double the size of the reservation.

"We don't have anything against the public," said James Jaime, the tribe's executive director. "It was the only way to get the federal government's attention."

The reservation is bounded on one side by the ocean and three sides by Olympic National Park. The tribe wants to move its school, senior center, tribal offices and some housing to higher ground as well as expand its reservation to build more housing developments.

"Our primary concern is the health, safety and welfare of not only the tribal members, but the entire community," said Jaime.

Tribal leaders originally sought 1,200 acres, but are now asking for about 800 acres to add to their one square mile reservation - 309 acres of park lands, and another 480 acres of private land that it wants the National Park Service to purchase for them.

The Quileute reservation was established in 1889 at the mouth of the Quillayute River; Olympic National Park has bordered the reservation since 1953.

The tribe and the park have been debating the boundary at Rialto Beach for decades. The tribe argues that it owns most of Rialto Beach, but the park has built a parking lot and a restroom at the edge of the beach and both sides are disputing eight acres of land there.

The dispute came to a head last year after a tribal member was cited for collecting firewood near the disputed boundary. While charges were ultimately dropped, Jaime said that the tribe needed to take action.

To get the government's attention, the tribe closed off access to one of the most beautiful sections of Washington state's Pacific shore, Second Beach, in October 2005. The beach is public, but the parking lot and access to the trail to the beach is on tribal ground.

Olympic National Park Superintendent Bill Laitner said that the park wants to make sure the tribe can move people out of the danger zone. Of the more than 700 members of the tribe, 350 live on the reservation - 250 in the flood zone.

"We feel that is of utmost importance," he said. "We believe we can do that. We don't believe we can solve all of the tribes' problems for all time."

After several meetings, the two sides remain at an impasse, and the tribe said that it's ready to raise the ante. The park service has offered 274 acres of park land.

"If there are no improvements to this offer and we do not resolve this issue, Rialto Beach will be closed next year," Jaime said.

Laitner said that while closing the beach would be inconvenient for park visitors, it would also be "devastating to the local economy" of the tribe.

"I don't think the tribe wants that," he said.

In October, the Quileute Tribe had a reservation-wide tsunami drill with a complete evacuation of the lower village, getting everyone to high ground in nine minutes - the amount of time tribal leaders have determined is necessary to prevent loss of life. The last time a tsunami hit the area was 1964.

"What I fear the most is at 3 o'clock in the morning, when we are all sleeping and not prepared," Jaime said. "Our exercises, our drills, they're structured, they're choreographed. It's the real event that's going to be unpredictable."

Any change in the boundary would have to be approved by Congress, but Rep. Norm Dicks said he worries that if the tribe doesn't accept the current offer, they may end up with nothing.

"We're all concerned about the safety of the tribe and the possibility of a tsunami," he said. The tribe has "to realize that they are running a risk by not accepting this offer."

Bush Administration Takes Aim At Meth (GANNETT)

By Pamela Brogan, Gannett News Service

Arizona Republic/Gannett, November 30, 2006

WASHINGTON - A coalition of federal, state and local officials will lead a nationwide anti-methamphetamine campaign that kicks off Thursday to educate the public about the dangers of the highly addictive drug.

President Bush has proclaimed the day National Methamphetamine Awareness Day, and more than 100 events are planned to highlight the risks of meth use and the treatment available.

Participants include the Drug Enforcement Administration, Partnership for a Drug-Free America, National Association of Attorneys General and the Community Anti-Drug Coalitions of America.

"Methamphetamine abuse shatters families and threatens our communities," Bush said.

This year, state and local communities said meth was the top drug problem, ahead of cocaine, heroin and marijuana, according to the Justice Department's National Drug Threat Survey.

Attorney General Alberto Gonzales says the health, community and environmental risks posed by meth "is nothing short of horrifying."

Here are some key facts about meth:

- An estimated 10.4 million Americans 12 or older have used meth.

- Meth is highly addictive can damage the brain. It can cause violent and psychotic behavior and mood disturbances.

- The number of meth lab seizures has decreased 42 percent from 10,015 in 2004 to 5,846 in 2005, but Mexican drug trafficking organizations have replaced local dealers and "greatly expanded their presence in drug markets across the country," according to the Justice Department.

Meth is a growing health and legal problem:

- Meth accounted for nearly 7 percent of all drug treatment admissions in 1994, up from 2 percent in 1994. Regional treatment data shows a much higher trend. In 2003, meth accounted for 20 percent of treatment admissions in eight states and more than 40 percent in Hawaii and Idaho.

- In 2003, meth accounted for 5,766 arrests made by the DEA, or 21.5 percent of all arrests.

Between 1992 and 2004, the number of meth lab cleanups increased from 394 to more than 10,000. State and local governments spent about $17.8 million in 2004 to clean up toxic wastes related to the labs, according to the DEA.

In 2002, more than 3,000 children were contaminated, neglected, injured or killed because of illegal meth production, according to the DEA.

Last year, Bush signed a federal anti-meth law that restricts the sale of over-the-counter cold medicines used to make the drug. It also imposed tougher penalties for those who smuggle or sell it.

AG Declares 'Meth Day' Thursday (AP)

By Bill Poovey, Associated Press

AP, November 30, 2006

CHATTANOOGA — Methamphetamine, an illegal drug, gets its own day and Tennessee law officers say the addictive stimulant deserves it.

U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales declared Thursday as National Meth Awareness Day. In Tennessee, officials are observing "Stop Meth in Tennessee, Start Right Now," starting with a Grundy County news conference and enforcement promotional stops in Cleveland and Madisonville.

After ranking as a leader among states in meth-making operations seized, the work of the 7-year-old Tennessee Methamphetamine Task Force — now expanded statewide — along with new laws restricting products used to make the drug have helped the state reduce the number of labs.

Meth is produced in clandestine labs using relatively inexpensive over-the-counter medicines, such as cold tablets with pseudoephedrine, and household chemicals. Tennessee passed a law to keep pseudoephedrine behind pharmacy counters.

Since passage of the Meth-Free Tennessee Act of 2005 and the federal Combat Meth Act of 2005, lab seizures in Tennessee have dropped significantly.

Records show 55 labs seized in October, down by 25 from October 2005.

Hamilton County Sheriff's Department Lt. Tommy Farmer, the task force director, said the accomplishments are many but the new challenge of intercepting imported methamphetamine from Mexico is growing.

"We have to be flexible," Farmer said. "We are seeing some changes. We are seeing increases in availability of Mexican methamphetamine. It's a major problem."

Farmer said the reduction in labs "did not reduce the number of addicts."

Farmer said the task force has operated and grown largely on the back of federal budget appropriations, a total of about $10 million, secured largely with the help of Republican U.S. Rep. Zach Wamp of Chattanooga.

He said the effort started from a meeting in Grundy County, at the request of former Sheriff Robert Meeks.

The task force co-sponsored a National Alliance for Drug Endangered Children conference in Nashville that ended Wednesday. Task force records show that since 1999, the task force and assisting agencies rescued 871 children from meth labs and drug addicted parents while also processing and dismantling 5,630 meth labs and dumpsites and arresting 2,867 meth offenders.

U.S. Attorney James R. "Russ" Dedrick of Knoxville said in a statement that "public awareness and education concerning the harmful effects of methamphetamine are the keys to protecting our children and stopping the spread of methamphetamine addiction."

Farmer said the battle against meth has helped change drug enforcement to a team effort with social agencies and the courts. He said there are also "protocols for how schools, hospitals, physicians, how everybody responds to children" exposed to meth.

"We are much better equipped," Farmer said. "We have to keep the focus. The war is not won by any stretch of the imagination."

He said "children are also coming from homes with parents addicted to marijuana, cocaine or pills. These children too are endangered."

"That includes the child riding around in a car while daddy is going to do a dope deal," Farmer said. "This whole meth scourge has brought a lot of things to light for us."

Study: Meth Use Climbs On East Coast (AP)

By Lara Jakes Jordan

AP, November 30, 2006

WASHINGTON - Methamphetamine use is increasing along the East Coast after years of largely being confined to rural areas west of the Mississippi River, a government report shows.

But officials nationwide are finding fewer meth labs where the highly addictive drug is cooked - a bright spot in the nation's war against a drug the White House describes as dangerous as cocaine and heroin.

Meth "is as bad, or worse, than most of those drugs for most of those people who have encountered it," John P. Walters, director of the White House Office of National Drug Control Policy, said Wednesday in an interview with The Associated Press.

"The good news is, at this point it looks like we have reacted before this became a bigger problem," Walters said. "But the onus is on us to follow through."

The number of workplace employees who tested positive for meth dipped dramatically in several Midwest and western states where the drug so far has provided the largest punch, including Missouri, Iowa and New Mexico.

But it surged along the East Coast, including in Connecticut and Maine, and by a whopping 115 percent increase in the District of Columbia.

The data by New Jersey-based Quest Diagnostics Inc. compared state-by-state drug tests from the first five months of 2006 to the same period last year, the most recent data available. Nationally, positive drug tests decreased by 12 percent between the two years.

The drug test results were included in a White House report titled: "Pushing Back Against Meth," to be issued Thursday as part of a government-wide awareness day to "underscore the dangers of methamphetamine and reaffirm our collective responsibility to combat all forms of drug abuse," President Bush said in a proclamation.

As part of the campaign, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales will lead a government discussion in Washington about stanching meth use with state and local health and law enforcement officials.

Justice Department officials cite mostly anecdotal evidence showing that meth use and cooking labs are spreading to inner cities. Walters said that's in part because drug traffickers, largely from Mexico, are now selling meth to cocaine and heroin customers in urban areas. Additionally, many East Coast states do not have state laws that require cold medicines containing pseudoephedrine - the ingredient used to cook meth with other household chemicals - to be placed behind pharmacy counters.

By contrast, some western states where meth has been a long-standing scourge have such laws on the books, making it harder for addicts to buy large amounts of pseudoephedrine. Walters attributed part of the drop in workers testing positive for meth in those states to the laws. Earlier this year, Congress approved a federal law to keep medicines containing pseudoephedrine behind pharmacy counters in all states. The federal law, however, was passed after the data for the new report was collected.

But nationwide, the number of meth labs that were busted or otherwise discovered by authorities dropped by 51 percent - from 6,472 in the first four months of 2005 to 3,160 in the same period of 2006, the report showed.

Experts believe people between ages 18 to 25 are the most likely to use meth, and women account for 45 percent of addicts seeking treatment - higher than for any other drugs. That's largely because women have reported to using meth to help lose weight while maintaining high energy levels.

Instead, it has made users' teeth and hair fall out, Walters said, and "turns you into the walking dead."

"Nobody has glamorized this drug," he said.

Meth Awareness Day Aims To Educate (GII)

By Sarah Schulz

Grand Island (NE) Independent, November 30, 2006

Observance focuses on dangers of drug addiction

Angela Fatino, an Iowa preteen, had her first hit of methamphetamine at age 12. By 15, she had taken her own life.

Fatino's story, along with shocking photos of how she transformed from a pretty child to a meth addict, are featured in an advertising campaign, "Meth: It's Getting Ugly," by the Partners for Methamphetamine Prevention.

The national organization is participating in education and public outreach kicked off on Wednesday, which was declared National Methamphetamine Awareness Day by President George W. Bush.

According to the Partnership for a Drug-Free America, meth is a powerfully addictive stimulant that has a high potential for abuse. It dramatically affects the central nervous system and leaves the user awake for hours or even days. At first, meth gives the user a rush, a sense of euphoria, feelings of confidence and a decrease in appetite.

However, the crash can leave a person severely depressed and suicidal. The addictive nature can also cause a user to turn to illegal means to pay for the drug, according to the Partnership for a Drug-Free America.

Meth is cheap and easy to obtain and can be manufactured with inexpensive ingredients, such as pseudoephedrine, a common ingredient in cold medication.

The program focuses on highlighting national efforts to increase awareness of meth use and aims to decrease demand for the highly addictive and dangerous drug, according to Partners for Methamphetamine Prevention.

Education and awareness are the only ways law enforcement will get the meth problem, and the general drug problem, under control, said Grand Island police Sgt. Clyde Church, a member of the Tri-City Drug Task Force.

"We can arrest people and send them to prison, but they get out and some go back to what they were doing before," he said.

Education can help stop that cycle, he said.

In Grand Island, the meth problem has remained steady over the last several years. The dozen or so law enforcement agents working with the task force address the issue at both the street level -- with users and small-time dealers -- and at the large, conspiracy level. Many of their cases result in federal charges, he said.

A variety of education events will be hosted nationwide by U.S. Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales. In Nebraska, members of the U.S. attorney's office will conduct a series of education presentations to various colleges, high schools and community and civic groups.

"In Nebraska, we have been battling methamphetamine for the past 10 to 12 years on all fronts through prevention and awareness, legislation, enforcement, prosecution and treatment," U.S. Attorney Joe Stecher said.

"Nebraska has been at the forefront, addressing our communities' awareness regarding the destructive powers of methamphetamine."

National Methamphetamine Awareness Day, and the programs that will follow, are a coordinated effort to reach potential meth users with a message of prevention, according to Stecher's office. However, the effort also aims to educate current users about the avenues available to them to deal with their addictions.

Two-thirds of the country's meth supply is produced in "super labs" in Mexico and Southern California. The remaining third is made in the United States in makeshift meth labs often found in homes, garages, storage units and the trunks of cars, according to the Partnership for a Drug-Free America.

Meth recipes are readily available, and the drug can be produced in six to eight hours. Small meth labs can be quickly dismantled, and a mere $200 can buy the ingredients to produce an ounce of meth. The drug is usually sold in one-eighth amounts, known as "eight balls." Cooking meth produces highly toxic waste, and there is a pending danger of explosion or fire at a meth lab, according to the Partnership for a Drug-Free America.

Meth use can lead to a person's death, and anyone suspected of meth use should be reported to authorities, according to the U.S. Department of Justice.

County Marks National Meth Awareness Day (NCT)

North County Times, November 30, 2006

SAN DIEGO COUNTY -- To commemorate National Methamphetamine Awareness Day today, authorities are urging residents to call the county's meth hotline or visit its Web site for information on abuse of the drug.

The hotline that the county introduced in 1996 can be reached at (877) NO2-METH. The Web site is www.No2Meth.org.

"(Residents) can call to seek help with meth-related problems or report criminal activity," said Jose A. Alvarez, a spokesman for the county Department of Health and Human Services.

"In 2005, (the hotline) received 457 calls, primarily from people seeking treatment or to report possible criminal activity, like meth labs," Alvarez said.

National Methamphetamine Awareness Day was established by President Bush this year to combat an addiction that "shatters families and threatens our communities," he said Tuesday in a proclamation.

According to a San Diego Association of Governments report released in late October, meth use is a growing problem in San Diego County. The report said that among people in custody at county jails between 2000 and 2005, usage of the drug increased from 28 percent to 44 percent among men, and 29 percent to 51 percent among women.

Placer County Joins National Methamphetamine Awareness Day (RRT)

Rocklin & Roseville Today, November 29, 2006

AUBURN, CALIF. -- Placer County is joining many other local, state and federal agencies to designate Nov. 30 as National Methamphetamine Awareness Day. The purpose of the day is to call attention to the damaging effects this illegal drug has on individuals, families, friends and the community.

"Methamphetamine not only impacts those who use it, the family, friends and the community that surrounds the individual," said Dr. Richard Burton, Placer County Health Officer. "Methamphetamine is one of the most addictive drugs that exists and is the No. 1 drug of abuse by those entering treatment."

Placer County is developing a program to help raise awareness of addiction to methamphetamine. Part of raising that awareness is to show the harm the addiction causes and the costs it exacts from the community. Some of the increased costs include the need for additional law enforcement to deal with drug production and distribution and the crimes committed by addicts needing money to fuel their habits, as well as increased medical, social and legal costs. Treatment, also an additional cost, can reduce the overall cost if persons are able to achieve recovery from their addiction.

"It's the fastest growing drug of abuse in all of our neighborhoods," said Ed Bonner, Placer County Sheriff. "It's easy to make, it's cheap, it's available, it's odorless and tasteless. It can be smoked and there's no odor. It can also be snorted, ingested or injected."

The toll methamphetamine takes on families in Placer County is staggering. Of all the child abuse in Placer County, 85 percent to 90 percent is from drug abuse by parents. And methamphetamine is responsible for 60 percent of that abuse.

According to Dr. Burton about 4 percent of the teens in Placer County have used methamphetamine. That translates to about 600 kids. That figure becomes even more troubling when that statistic is paired with the fact that 73 percent of those in drug treatment for methamphetamine began using the drug prior to age 22.

The Placer County Board of Supervisors, Department of Health and Human Services and Sheriffs Department are all working together to address the disease and the impact it has on those affected by use of the drug. Community awareness, education and resource information are some strategies to address this issue.

Data To Be Used To Raise Awareness Of Meth Problem (RGJ)

Reno (NV) Gazette Journal, November 30, 2006

Marking the nation's first Methamphetamine Awareness Day, local law enforcement, education and treatment professionals will provide the public with a snapshot of how meth affects the community.

The point of gathering meth-related data today is to draw attention to a drug epidemic that knows no boundaries, said special agent Mark Snyder of the federal Drug Enforcement Administration in Reno.

"We want to show people the problem," Snyder said. "People think Reno is our little piece of paradise, but I am confident this snapshot will show what is occurring around the country is also happening here and that meth is a growing problem."

Snyder said although meth is not new to the area, it has emerged as the primary drug threat in Northern Nevada.

Tom Clark, spokesman for the Washoe County Meth Community Response Alliance, said the group has been struggling to demonstrate with statistics the scope of the meth problem and the financial impact. He said data gathered today would give a more accurate portrayal.

Law enforcement officers say meth is indirectly behind most crime in the area, and it contributes to hospital visits, child neglect and the burdening of the social services system.

Members of the regional undercover vice unit, the Street Enforcement Team, say that sales of powder methamphetamine have been replaced with sales of crystal meth, a highly potent and much more addictive form of meth.

How it works

Professionals dealing with meth will complete a survey that includes:

Police will record how many people they believed were under the influence of meth and were arrested for a meth-related crime.

Hospital staff who treated meth users.

Dentists who treated meth users.

Drug court staff who had meth clients.

School officials who spoke with parents or teens concerned about meth use and treatment staff who treated or counseled a person about meth.

Jail staff also will be able to show how many inmates were there because of a meth charge.

Snyder said when the community learns what a "day in the life of meth" is like, officials and citizens can try to come up with solutions.

Efforts in place include a 30-minute film by the anti-crime organization Secret Witness that will air on multiple local news channels in January. The show will feature local meth addicts and those affected by meth giving testimonials and information.

School involvement

The Washoe County School District plans to use its automated telephone system to contact parents and ask them to watch the Secret Witness video with their children.

The district also will film its own educational anti-meth video for middle and high school students that will be shown during the school day. The district's family magazine for December will feature an article on the meth problem.

Local school surveys done in 2005 say that 5 percent of middle school students and 10 percent of high school students in Washoe County said they had tried meth.

When students returned to class this fall, they were greeted with graphic anti-meth posters provided by Secret Witness that were inspired by in-your-face posters and TV ads produced by the Montana Meth Project.

Other details

In September, Washoe County was designated as a "High Intensity Drug Trafficking Area" by the government and will receive $500,000 to fight drug trafficking, namely meth.

A key for the designation was the threat of Mexican traffickers using the interstates and the echo from law enforcement that meth is a serious problem here.

The alliance earlier this year played host to a series of town hall meetings at various schools and held a summit. Community leaders and others came together to make decisions on why, how and when to begin to address meth in Washoe County.

The group also sponsored law enforcement training by a nationally recognized meth expert.

TUSD Middle-schoolers Hearing Dangers Of Meth (TC)

Tucson (AZ) Citizen, November 30, 2006

Middle-school students in Tucson were to learn about the dangers of methamphetamine today from Drug Enforcement Administration officials as part of a nationwide awareness day.

Federal, state and local officials are reaching out to potential meth users to discuss prevention and to users about programs to help them. To look at a Web site designed by teens about the dangers of drugs, see this story at www.tucsoncitizen.com.

Department Of Justice Sponsors 'National Methamphetamine Day' Today (PDN)

Pacific Daily News, November 30, 2006

Governor Felix P. Camacho, U.S. Attorney Leonardo Rapadas and Tony Marquez, resident agent in-charge of the Drug Enforcement Administration, will host a public awareness outreach today at the Guam Premium Outlets from noon to 2 p.m.

The Department of Justice sponsored today as National Methamphetamine Day for Guam and the Commonwealth of the Northern Mariana Islands, to highlight nationwide efforts to increase awareness and decrease demand of the highly addictive drug.

Future plans of the U.S. Attorney's Office and DEA, with their partners, include Town Hall meetings at various villages and high schools in the upcoming year.

Everyone is invited to visit their display at the GPO Food Court.

Community Educated On Dangers Of Crystal Meth (KUAM)

KUAM-TV, November 30, 2006

Education and awareness of the dangers of crystal methamphetamine were the focus of a display in Tamuning this afternoon at the Guam Premier Outlets. Today is National Methamphetamine Awareness Day and members of the U.S. Attorney's Office, the Drug Enforcement Administration and the Guam Police Department were on hand during a static and visual display at the GPO food court.

Pamphlets were given to those visiting the outlet providing information about rehabilitation, prevention and education about the drug "ice".

METHAMPHETAMINE AWARENESS DAY (OREG)

The Oregonian

The Oregonian, November 30, 2006

A day to reflect on the fight against meth

T oday is National Methamphetamine Awareness Day -- the first time a president has designated a day to focus national attention on methamphetamine, an extremely destructive and harmful drug.

For parents, today is a reminder of the importance of talking to our children about dangerous drugs. For our youth, it is an opportunity to reaffirm a commitment to a drug-free future. For those struggling with addiction, it is an occasion to seek treatment. And for all Americans, it is an opportunity to thank law enforcement officers, treatment counselors and prevention advocates whose efforts have contributed to a nearly 20 percent decline in drug use among American youth over the past four years.

Today is also an occasion to reflect on the progress our nation has made in attacking methamphetamine. In 2005, the number of methamphetamine laboratory incidents in America declined by 29 percent from the previous year and is continuing to decline this year. And there is more good news: Methamphetamine use among youths is down 36 percent (from 2001 to 2005), and positive tests for meth in the workplace have declined 45 percent since 2004. In short, fewer people are making meth in America, and fewer people are using it.

This good news is proof that a balanced drug control strategy can yield meaningful results. But our fight against methamphetamine is not over. Earlier this year, the administration released the nation's first Synthetic Drug Control Strategy, a coordinated effort among government institutions at the federal, state and local levels that sets ambitious goals for America. The strategy calls for an additional 25 percent reduction in domestic methamphetamine laboratories (beyond the 29 percent reduction already seen last year), and a 15 percent reduction in methamphetamine use, both by the end of 2008. Again, the good news is that we are on track to meet these goals, with past year methamphetamine use declining 29 percent over the prior three years, and steady declines in the number of meth labs across our nation.

Meanwhile, we know that simply reducing the supply of methamphetamine is not enough. We also must reduce the demand for the drug. This means offering treatment opportunities to help heal those who are addicted. It means stopping use of methamphetamine before it starts by supporting the most effective drug-prevention initiatives -- especially those aimed at youth. That is why the president has requested that Congress provide historic levels of support for drug programs.

As our nation reflects on the progress we have made and the challenges that remain in reducing methamphetamine use, all Americans, especially our youth, should reaffirm their commitment to a drug-free future. The devastating effects of using any illicit drug -- on the individual, family and community -- cannot be overstated.

John Walters is director of the White House Office of National Drug Control Policy. For more information on methamphetamine, and how to help stop its spread, visit www.methresources.gov or www.usdoj.gov/methawareness/.

National Methamphetamine Awareness Day (ABOUT)

About.com, November 30, 2006

Today, November 30, has been declared National Methamphetamine Awareness Day as a part of a nationwide effort to further educate the American public about the effects of methamphetamine abuse on families and communities. The effort hopes to increase awareness and decrease demand of the highly-addictive drug.

More than 100 events are scheduled across the United States today by federal, state and local officials to highlight education and public outreach efforts about methamphetamine abuse. President Bush issued a proclamation declaring the first ever National Methamphetamine Awareness Day.

The awareness day is an effort to send a prevention message to potential meth users and to educate current users about programs that are available to them, according to a Department of Justice news release.

Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales will host a panel discussion with leading experts to discuss the impact that meth production and use has on individuals, the environment and communities across the country.

Also participating in the National Methamphetamine Awareness Day efforts are the U.S. Department of Labor; U.S. Department of Health and Human Services; U.S. Department of Interior; Office of National Drug Control Policy; the Drug Enforcement Administration (DEA); the Partnership for a Drug-Free America; Boys & Girls Clubs of America; Community Anti-Drug Coalitions of America; Fraternal Order of Police; National District Attorneys Association; National Association of Attorneys General; National Sheriffs' Association; International Association of Chiefs of Police; National Organization for Victims Assistance; Inter-Association Task Force on Alcohol and Other Substance Abuse Issues; American Council on Education; National Association of Student Personnel Administrators; American College Health Association; Association of Fraternity Advisors; and the National Panhellenic Conference.

National Meth Awareness Event On Campus Thursday (UKN)

University of Kentucky News, November 30, 2006

LEXINGTON, Ky. (Nov. 29, 2006) - The dangers and harmful effects of methamphetamine abuse, particularly on families, women, and children will be the focus of a special program Thursday, Nov. 30 at 7 p.m. in the small ballroom (third floor) of the University of Kentucky Student Center.

A proclamation issued by President George W. Bush has declared the date as National Methamphetamine Awareness Day. As part of this designation, the U.S. Attorney General's office is partnering with state and local organizations, as well as federal agencies and private groups to bring a concentrated, nationwide focus to educating the public about meth.

"The devastating effects of methamphetamine abuse, particularly on women and children in Kentucky, is well-documented," said Holly Hopper, Coordinator and Principal Investigator for the Drug Endangered Child Training Network, based within the UK College of Public Health's Center for Prevention Research. "Many labs used to manufacture methamphetamine are inside homes, exposing children living there to great risk."

A PowerPoint presentation followed by a question and answer session is planned for the Student Center event. The program is open to the entire campus community, and students, particularly women, are encouraged to attend.

Earlier in the day (Nov. 30), a news conference focusing on state initiatives in the battle against methamphetamine abuse is scheduled for the Capitol Rotunda in Frankfort.

Meth Awareness Day Set For Thursday (KCAL)

KCAL-TV, November 29, 2006

(CBS) LOS ANGELES President Bush has proclaimed Thursday as National Methamphetamine Awareness Day in an effort to bring attention to the challenges the nation confronts because of the drug.

Methamphetamine is a highly addictive central nervous system stimulant that can lead to brain damage and psychotic behavior, including auditory hallucinations, mood disturbances, delusions and paranoia, possibly resulting in homicidal or suicidal thoughts, according to the Office of National Drug Control Policy.

Users trying to abstain from use may suffer withdrawal symptoms including depression, anxiety, fatigue, paranoia, aggression and intense cravings for the drug.

An estimated 10.4 million Americans ages 12 and older have used methamphetamine at least once in their lifetimes for non-medical reasons, according to the 2005 National Survey on Drug Use and Health.

"While the number of teens who have tried this deadly drug and the number of people testing positive for methamphetamine in the workplace have decreased in recent years, methamphetamine use is still a dangerous public health problem," Bush said in his proclamation.

The Bush administration's Synthetic Drug Control Strategy released earlier this year set goals of a 15 percent decrease in methamphetamine use and 25 percent reduction in domestic methamphetamine labs over the next three years.

Information on efforts against methamphetamine abuse is available online at theantidrug.com and methresources.gov.

National Methamphetamine Awareness Day Set For Tomorrow (KNX)

KNX Radio, November 29, 2006

LOS ANGELES, CA (CNS) -- Tomorrow has been proclaimed as National Methamphetamine Awareness Day by President Bush in an effort to bring attention to the challenge the nation confronts because of the drug.

Methamphetamine is a highly addictive central nervous system stimulant that can lead to brain damage and psychotic behavior, including auditory hallucinations, mood disturbances, delusions and paranoia, possibly resulting in homicidal or suicidal thoughts, according to the Office of National Drug Control Policy.

Users trying to abstain from use may suffer withdrawal symptoms including depression, anxiety, fatigue, paranoia, aggression and intense cravings for the drug.

The Drug Enforcement Administration and the U.S. Attorney's Office plan to hold a Meth Awareness Exhibit for the media at a federal building in Los Angeles tomorrow to highlight the dangers of meth. It will include a mock meth lab, presentations by the DEA lab and may feature a former meth user, the DEA said in a statement.

An estimated 10.4 million Americans ages 12 and older have used methamphetamine at least once in their lifetimes for nonmedical reasons, according to the 2005 National Survey on Drug Use and Health.

" While the number of teens who have tried this deadly drug and the number of people testing positive for methamphetamine in the workplace have decreased in recent years, methamphetamine use is still a dangerous public health problem," Mr. Bush said in his proclamation.

The Bush administration's Synthetic Drug Control Strategy released earlier this year set goals of a 15 percent decrease in methamphetamine use and 25 percent reduction in domestic methamphetamine labs over the next three years.

Former Hockey Star On Ice For Three Years (KNOXNS)

By Jamie Satterfield

Knoxville News Sentinel (TN), November 30, 2006

Alepin sentenced for helping peddle marijuana

One of Knoxville's most popular hockey players will spend the next three years in a penalty box.

Those fan-favorite hard-hitting moves on the ice are not what put Alex Alepin, 30, there. It was marijuana - pounds and pounds of it.

Senior U.S. District Judge James H. Jarvis on Wednesday ordered Alepin to spend 38 months in a federal prison for conspiring with fellow Canadians to peddle hydroponic marijuana, a pricey and potent strain of the illegal drug.

Alepin played for the now defunct Knoxville Speed and, later, the Knoxville Ice Bears. He abruptly retired from the hockey scene in 2004.

As it turned out, he had been ensnared in a probe led by U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement Agent John Witsell III and U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration Agent Dave Lewis of a Canadian drug smuggling ring.

Defense attorney Jeff Whitt argued at a sentencing hearing in U.S. District Court Wednesday that Alepin actually quit the marijuana-pushing business in 2002.

"He voluntarily had left this criminal conspiracy four years ago," Whitt said. "He didn't get caught. Did he do it timely? No. Did he make a mistake? Yes. He knew it was wrong, and he quit."

"He didn't turn himself in, did he?" Jarvis responded.

"No, and he should have," Whitt conceded.

Instead, Alepin's name surfaced in 2004 as Witsell, Lewis and fellow agents were investigating a smuggling network in which hydroponic marijuana grown in Quebec was being sneaked across the border, largely through tractor-trailers, and distributed to customers along the Eastern Seaboard, Assistant U.S. Attorney Hugh Ward said.

"We approached him in our investigation," Ward told Jarvis. "He did cooperate."

Alepin helped authorities nab Sebastien Flocari, who is serving a 70-month prison term as one of the chief suppliers in the smuggling ring. However, Ward contended Alepin was no bit player in the illegal venture.

"You can look at Mr. Alepin's role as the Knoxville distributor of this drug trafficking organization," Ward said.

Court records show that Alepin bought hydroponic marijuana in lots of 20 to 50 pounds and then sold it to at least three Knoxville dealers.

Blind Inmate's Medication Claim Revived (LAT/AP)

By Larry Neumeister, Associated Press Writer

The Los Angeles Times, November 30, 2006

NEW YORK — A California man who said he went blind in prison because he was denied medication can sue the prison officials he thinks are responsible, a federal appeals court ruled as it reinstated a lawsuit that had been tossed out.

The decision by the 2nd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals means Rodney Thomas can pursue his claim that authorities failed to ensure he received medication for glaucoma after he was arrested by Drug Enforcement Administration agents in Los Angeles on Sept. 7, 2001. Thomas' lawsuit was seeking $750,000 in damages.

The decision, handed down Tuesday but made public Wednesday, upheld a lower court's ruling that the DEA agents could not be held responsible in federal court in New York, but it reinstated the lawsuit against three prison officials.

The three-judge panel noted that a federal magistrate judge at Thomas' first court appearance in New York issued an order directing that he receive glaucoma medication. Present at the hearing were two of three prison officials named as defendants in the lawsuit -- the warden and the clinical director at the Metropolitan Correctional Center in Manhattan.

Thomas' lawyers told the appeals court that his vision was within normal limits when he was arrested but had deteriorated to legal blindness three months later because his prescription eye medications were not delivered consistently.

In court papers, lawyers for the government argued that the prison officials could not be held responsible because they did not directly administer health care to inmates.

Jon Romberg, a lawyer for Thomas, said he was pleased with the ruling.

"The court reinstated his case and most importantly recognized that prison supervisors can be liable if they know about a serious medical problem and fail to correct it," Romberg said.

He said Wednesday he had not been able to notify his client, who is incarcerated at a California prison where his telephone use is limited.

A spokeswoman for federal government lawyers handling the case said there would be no comment Wednesday.

Thomas was convicted of drug charges; Romberg said he didn't know how long his prison sentence is.

A Drug Bust Near Costa Rica Captivates Underworld Of Garage Tinkerers (WSJ)

By Jennifer Saranow

The Wall Street Journal, November 30, 2006

This month, the Coast Guard detained four men who were allegedly trying to smuggle 3.5 tons of cocaine meant for the U.S. News accounts of the Nov. 16 bust, about 90 miles southwest of Costa Rica, described their unusual vessel as a 50-foot homemade fiberglass submarine.

That caught the attention of a busy netherworld of hobbyists who build submarines in their garages.

"The captured drug-sub appears to be amateurish in construction and not nearly as seaworthy as the subs we have seen, designed and built," said Jon Wallace, a software engineer for Hewlett-Packard in Weare, N.H. In 1996 he cofounded the Personal Submersibles Organization, which now counts about 13,000 visitors per month to its Web site, psubs.org.

"Semi-submersible at best," sniffed another critic in a posting on the group's site.

After reading reports and seeing photographs of the captured vessel, hobbyists concluded that the gray drug craft was crudely constructed and not a serious attempt at building a submarine. Some said it was more a boat meant to blend into the water, skim just below the surface, travel long distances and avoid radar detection. A giveaway was that it was made of fiberglass -- which is generally not a good material for building a submersible vessel, they say. It also had a squarish design rather than the cylindrical shape required to withstand pressure and stress.

Law-enforcement agencies from Colombia to California are increasingly worried about drug-stuffed submarines slinking along beneath the seas. "We are out there actively searching for these," says Capt. Thomas Cullen, chief of response for the U.S. Coast Guard 11th District based in Alameda, Calif., which oversaw the boarding and seizing of the vessel off Costa Rica. It was the first manned sub-like vehicle seized by the U.S., according to Capt. Cullen. Authorities in Colombia have seized a couple of homemade subs in the past two years.

Costa Rican authorities say that the vessel seized this month was gasoline-powered, and that it traveled just below the surface with the crew using snorkel-type tubes to breathe. "Certainly these guys are not PSUBS regulars. Gasoline engines in a submersible are no-nos," wrote Ray Keefer, 45 years old, a computer test engineer in Gaston, Ore., and co-founder of the group. Gasoline engines would be dangerous in a submarine. The Coast Guard says its reports indicate the seized craft had a diesel engine.

Mr. Keefer and others believe the captured vessel should more accurately be called a "David boat," a type of torpedo boat used during the Civil War that operated mostly underwater with only its smokestack and a few inches of hull visible above the surface. "Mostly underwater but not a submersible," he wrote.

James Huffman, 28, a warehouse laborer in Tacoma, Wash., and submarine history buff who first got interested in submarines while playing the "Up Periscope!" computer game in eighth grade, says the craft reminded him of the gasoline- and battery-powered USS Holland from around 1900, the U.S. Navy's first commissioned submarine.

Man's fascination with exploring the underwater world dates back at least to Alexander the Great, who according to legend descended beneath the waves in some kind of glass globe. Experimentation with underwater craft continued in the 1500s through the 1700s.

U.S. Coast Guard officers board a vessel they say was carrying drugs meant for the U.S., off the coast of Costa Rica, earlier this month.

In more recent history, sub-like craft were first used militarily in the U.S. during the Revolutionary War. Modern diesel and battery-powered designs appeared during the two World Wars, and in 1954, the era of true submarines that can stay submerged for long periods emerged with the nuclear-powered USS Nautilus.

Hobbyists have been building homemade subs for years with the help of plans in magazines like Popular Mechanics and designs from men like former naval submarine captain George Kittredge, whom some hobbyists consider the founder of the homemade-sub craft. The advent of the Internet brought sub fans together and let them share designs and tips.

Enthusiasts liken their submarine-building work, which can cost $15,000 or more and take many years, to building an airplane or a boat from scratch. While it is possible to buy design plans, no catalogs exist for parts. Builders have to cook them up at home. For prices ranging from about $70,000 to $1 million or more, companies like U.S. Submarines Inc. and Netherlands-based U-Boat Worx offer ready-made submarines that are popular with yacht owners looking for another toy.

Some sub enthusiasts question why smugglers would use a submarine in the first place since subs are slow and must surface. "I could see somebody towing a submersible below a cargo ship," wrote one on the psubs.org Web site and electronic mailing list. George Slaterpryce, 28, a software engineer in Ocala, Fla., suggested that "a true smuggling submarine" would "have to be something that cruises at 60 feet or so (just deep enough not to be easily noticed)," be constructed of lightweight materials and powered by a relatively silent motor and have enough air for days of submersion.

Members of the Personal Submersibles Organization recognize that the submersibles they build are not technically submarines, according to some definitions. Most homemade-sub hobbyists build one- and two-passenger steel subs that resemble 10-foot- to 15-foot-long propane tanks in shape with view ports. These subs are called 1ATMs, or 1 atmosphere subs, because they, like military subs, maintain basically the same air pressure inside as at sea level. Depending on the design, 1ATMs can descend 350 feet or more, travel at speeds up to about five miles an hour and stay underwater for at least an hour.

Alec Smyth, 42, of Alexandria, Va., a director of client services at software company Compuware Corp., has two subs of his own, one that descends to 250 feet and the other, still in construction, to 700 feet. He says sub hobbyists have one thing in common: "We all watched way too many Cousteau movies as kids."

Absurd Reality: Drug Wars Rewriting The Rules In Mexico (DMN)

The Dallas Morning News, November 30, 2006

The news that popular banda musician Valentín Elizalde was gunned down Saturday in Mexico near the Reynosa fairgrounds stunned many residents on both sides of the border. The 27-year-old's black Suburban was sprayed with more than 70 bullets; also killed were his driver and manager – all just minutes after he performed at the annual fair.

Such is the surreal world of the Mexican drug trade, a world in which newspapers are silenced by gunfire and a drug cartel takes out advertising blaming its rivals for the mayhem.

The traffickers don't seem the least bit put off by increased federal efforts and more soldiers on the ground. After all, they've succeeded in pressuring newspapers to stop investigative coverage of cartels and to give little attention to drug-related violence. And when stories aren't reported in the Mexican press, it's even more difficult for the media in the U.S. to know what's really going on just across the border.

Attacks against Mexican reporters are routine. In February, at least three masked gunmen barged into Nuevo Laredo's El Mañana newsroom and unloaded 30 rounds and a hand grenade, injuring the police reporter.

Reporting on the cartels may be scarce, but not so with advertising. Just days before Mr. Elizalde's death, The Family, a group believed to be associated with the Tamaulipas-based Gulf drug cartel, took out a half-page ad in Michoacán newspapers, blaming rival cartels for all the bloodshed.

Mr. Elizalde was himself no stranger to the drug world, with songs detailing the bloodshed of innocent lives and immortalizing one of Mexico's most notorious drug lords, Joaquín "El Chapo" Guzmán of the Sinaloa cartel, still on the run after his 2001 prison escape. Probably no coincidence that the singer was killed on rival Gulf cartel turf.

It's increasingly difficult to make sense of what's going on in Mexico, but the drug cartel exploits are certainly terrorizing top law enforcement officials. As one of them recently told a reporter from the San Antonio Express-News when questioned about the Elizalde death: "I don't want to say. I like my life too much. You should, too."

Colombian Intelligence Agency Leaked Information To Drug Traffickers (MHCA/MCT)

By Gerardo Reyes, McClatchy Newspapers

Monterey (CA) Herald, November 30, 2006

BOGOTA, Colombia - The former director of Colombia's FBI, known as DAS, ordered that information compromising agents of the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration be leaked to drug traffickers, former DAS official Rafael Garcia has told government investigators.

Garcia, once chief of DAS' computer systems, confirmed to El Nuevo Herald in a telephone interview from prison that he has told Supreme Court investigators that Jorge Noguera ordered him to deliver the information to the traffickers.

"I carried the information in hard disks or in USB memory, per instructions from Noguera," said Garcia, who this month was sentenced to 18 years in prison for corruption.

Garcia has made several allegations against Noguera, who resigned from the DAS last year. Prosecutors are investigating Noguera, but he has been out of the country.

According to Garcia, he delivered the top-secret information to intermediaries for Rodrigo Tovar Pupo, an alleged trafficker and one of the top leaders of Colombia's illegal paramilitary groups.

Garcia said he specifically remembered delivering details of a vast operation being prepared by the DEA, together with Colombian antidrug agencies, to tap the telephones of drug traffickers.

He delivered the information from late 2002 until late 2004, Garcia said, when he was fired from the DAS on charges that he had deleted the records of drug traffickers from DAS computers.

While testifying before the Supreme Court, Garcia said that Noguera "almost made me feel that Colombian President Alvaro Uribe knew of and approved what we were doing," according to records.

Uribe has denied knowing of the alleged DAS corruption.

Noguera, who is now in the United States, last week declared through his lawyer that he does not have the financial means to return to Colombia to face the charges filed by prosecutors on the basis of Garcia's accusations.

Another Galante Defendant Pleads Guilty (DANNT)

Danbury (CT) News Times, November 30, 2006

NEW HAVEN — A New York state woman who prosecutors said had a "no-show" job at Danbury's Automated Waste Disposal pled guilty Wednesday to one count of conspiring to defraud the Internal Revenue Service.

Her plea is the seventh taken by a federal judge in connection with an extensive racketeering case centering on Danbury trash magnate James Galante.

Anna Priskie, 45, of Cortland Manor, N.Y., accepted the plea deal in front of Senior U.S. District Judge Ellen Bree Burns.

"The core of it is she admitted that for the period of 2000 through 2004 she received a modest salary from AWD, a company partially owned by her father, Thomas Milo, where she did not in fact perform the day-to-day job," said her lawyer J. Bruce Maffeo, of New York City.

Her father has also been indicted in connection with this case and his charges are pending.

Milo, Galante's silent partner, is alleged to be an associate of the Genovese organized crime family of La Cosa Nostra.

According to court records, from January 2000 through July 2005, Priskie received employee compensation and health insurance benefits from AWD, even though she provided no work to AWD or any related company.

Her family also received the free use of a Lexus during part of this time. While a no-show employee of AWD, Priskie falsely reported to the IRS that the $90,458.80 she received from AWD for the tax years 2000 through 2004 was earned income, according to government prosecutors.

Priskie also failed to report to the IRS the value of the health care benefits and the free use of the car.

She and 29 others were indicted in June in connection with the racketeering case centering on the garbage industry in Connecticut and New York state.

Her sentencing is set for Feb. 16. She faces up to five years in prison and a fine of up to $250,000.

Galante is charged with conspiring with other trash companies to carve out territories in the region where they would not compete for business. The indictment against Galante includes allegations of threats of violence, extortion, bribery and tax evasion.

Galante's case is still pending. He is at home under house arrest in New Fairfield.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Rep. Silvestre Reyes A Contender To Head House Intelligence Committee (MCT)

By Maria Recio

McClatchy Newspapers, November 30, 2006

WASHINGTON - Rep. Silvestre Reyes has an unusual pedigree for a member of Congress: He was a Border Patrol agent for 26 years before being elected in 1996.

Reyes, 62, can point to that law enforcement background, along with his work on defense, veterans and immigration issues, as the Texas Democrat emerges as the leading contender to become the chairman of the House Intelligence Committee.

"Silver," as the silver-haired El Pasoan is known, isn't campaigning for the post, a tactic that backfired on Florida Rep. Alcee Hastings, whom Speaker-elect Nancy Pelosi rejected as chairman Tuesday. The speaker handpicks the chairman of the committee.

But Reyes, who's served almost six years on the Intelligence Committee, definitely is interested. Reyes isn't talking now, but when McClatchy Newspapers asked him earlier this month whether he wanted the chairmanship, he said, "Of course. That would be a tremendous challenge that I would look forward to."

Rep. Jane Harman of California, the current ranking Democrat on the committee, also was passed over as chairman, making Reyes next in line.

Pelosi and Harman have a frosty relationship, and Harman bucked Pelosi by not aggressively opposing the Bush administration on Iraq.

Reyes has the backing of congressional Hispanics, which may quell the unhappiness of the Congressional Black Caucus over Hastings being denied the job. Congress removed Hastings as a federal judge in the late 1980s after he was accused of taking a bribe. He was acquitted of the bribery charges, and was elected to Congress in 1992.

"I am 100 percent behind Silvestre Reyes," said Democratic Rep. Charlie Gonzalez of Texas. "He's highly respected and everyone gets along very well with him, Democrats and Republicans, and I think that's what we're trying to achieve."

Reyes would be the only Hispanic chairman of a major committee. New York Rep. Nydia Velazquez is in line to become the chairman of the House Small Business Committee.

The Intelligence Committee job is highly visible and secretive at the same time. The committee oversees and approves the approximately $40 billion budget for all U.S. government intelligence programs. The chairman of the panel in a Democratic-majority House automatically becomes a counterpoint to the Bush administration over the unpopular Iraq war - and the intelligence used to justify it.

Reyes' background is a big factor in his favor.

"Reyes would be a good compromise candidate," said Loren Thompson, a national security expert at the Lexington Institute, a Virginia research center.

"Intelligence is a black art and a black science that is technical and has a human side," Thompson said. "This is very complicated specialized knowledge that very few people in Congress possess."

El Paso's regional military facilities include the Army's Fort Bliss, the White Sands Missile Range and Holloman Air Force Base.

Reyes, who retired as the sector chief of the Border Patrol in El Paso, was a supporter and helped secure funding for the Drug Enforcement Administration's El Paso Intelligence Center in his district. The center provides a multi-agency approach to fighting drug and border violations. It has more than 300 analysts and agents from 15 federal agencies.

Texas Republican Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison has worked closely with Reyes on border and international issues.

"I think he would be an excellent choice," she said. "He knows the importance of intelligence, the use of intelligence and the need for confidentiality. I think he'd be a good fit."

The ability of the even-tempered Reyes to work with Republicans will help, as will his solid Democratic credentials.

"You need somebody who's a pretty capable operator at the nexus of partisanship and bipartisanship," said John Plebani, a lobbyist and former top House Democratic staffer.

Reyes has been looking forward to being in the majority for the first time since being elected. "All I've known is minority status," he said earlier this month.

Reyes is in line to be the chairman of the House Armed Services Committee's subcommittee on strategic forces. It's unclear whether he'd have to give up the subcommittee chairmanship under Democratic House rules.

Reyes' low-key style belies his reputation as a jokester and prankster. In one favorite tale told by staffers, lawmakers including Reyes and Rep. Solomon Ortiz, D-Texas, were at a party in the late 1990s at then-Vice President Al Gore's home. Gore spoke to the crowd and pointed out members he'd served with in Congress and greeted Ortiz "and his new wife." The divorced Ortiz was on a first date and turned several shades of red, staffers say, as he saw Reyes laughing in the corner.

Harman Still The Right Choice (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, November 30, 2006

NANCY PELOSI HAS wisely decided not to appoint Rep. Alcee L. Hastings (D-Fla.), who as a federal judge was impeached and convicted by Congress in the 1980s, as chairman of the House Intelligence Committee. At a time when intelligence issues — including warrantless wiretapping by the National Security Agency — loom large on Congress' agenda, Hastings simply carried too much baggage.

Unfortunately, Pelosi has yet to bestow the chairmanship on the obvious alternative: her fellow Californian, Rep. Jane Harman of Venice, the current ranking Democrat on the Intelligence Committee. Instead, Pelosi is scrambling to find an alternative to Harman, even if it is someone with no recent experience on the panel.

Pelosi's problem with Harman is reminiscent of her ill-fated endorsement of Rep. John P. Murtha (D-Pa.) to be House majority leader. In both cases, her attitude seemed to be shaped by personal considerations — friendship with Murtha, rivalry with Harman — and tunnel vision induced by the war in Iraq. Pelosi voted against authorizing the use of force against Saddam Hussein, but Harman voted for it. (So did Murtha, before his reincarnation as a war critic.)

Whatever the explanation, Pelosi's reluctance to appoint Harman raises the question of whether the incoming speaker of the House is ready to be a national leader as well as a party boss. A boss' priority is to settle scores and reward supporters; a leader has higher obligations — especially now.

In the case of the Intelligence Committee chairmanship, those obligations make the selection of Harman a no-brainer. Far from being a disqualification for the chairmanship, her eight years on the panel constitute the sort of institutional memory the 9/11 commission said was desirable.

Equally important, on one of the most pressing issues before the committee — NSA surveillance — Pelosi and Harman are on the same page. To her credit, Pelosi raised questions about the NSA wiretapping program after being briefed on it. Harman voted against a House bill that would have legalized the program without subjecting it to the warrant requirements of the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act. Moreover, the fact that Harman is a centrist who is respected by Republicans is an advantage, not a liability, in any effort by Democrats to rein in the NSA in a way that balances the real need for vigilance and the privacy of Americans.

Until this week, the biggest political obstacle to Harman's ascendancy was the bid by Hastings, the next most senior Democrat on the committee and an African American whose candidacy was popular in the Congressional Black Caucus. With Hastings no longer a factor, Pelosi faces a simple choice. Which will it be, Madame Speaker: leader or boss?

Senate G.O.P. Leader Adapts To An Unexpected Role (NYT)

By Carl Hulse

The New York Times, November 30, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 29 — Senator Mitch McConnell, the Republican whip, had always planned to spend the days after the November elections preparing for a new leadership role. Now he is preparing for a role he had not planned on.

Mr. McConnell, a tough Kentucky legislative operator best known for intense opposition to the campaign finance changes enacted in 2002, saw his hope of becoming majority leader fall victim to an Election Day outcome that handed Senate control to the Democrats. So he is instead the incoming leader of the new Senate minority, albeit one who, with 49 votes in his pocket, will have the ability to block Democratic initiatives more or less at will.

"There will be nothing here they can do without some degree of cooperation from a very robust 49-vote minority," he said in an interview this week.

Despite his reputation for partisanship, Mr. McConnell said he accepted the judgment of a frustrated electorate, and expressed optimism for cooperating with Democrats, most quickly on an ethics overhaul. He also said the new sharing of government power could give the two parties an opening to take on some of the most difficult issues, including changes to Social Security.

"The question is, Are you going to work together and try to do good things for the country or not?" he said. "I would like to see us quit playing games with Social Security. They know and we know it is a huge problem. This is the kind of thing divided government might be able to conquer."

Given the divisiveness that has defined Washington in recent years, Mr. McConnell acknowledged that his overtures were likely to be met with some skepticism: is he being sincere or instead trying to lure Democrats into a political trap by getting them to agree to changes in an entitlement program enormously popular with their constituents?

Democrats, though cautious, say he deserves the benefit of the doubt.

"We want to work with them, and we hope they work with us," said Senator Charles E. Schumer of New York, who will be the No. 3 Senate Democrat in the new Congress. "You have to take an offer to sit down and discuss things on its face."

Mr. McConnell, first elected to the Senate in 1984, has been positioning himself for the role of Republican leader the last four years. When Senator Bill Frist of Tennessee took on the post in 2002 after the ouster of Senator Trent Lott of Mississippi, Mr. Frist had already indicated that he would leave Congress at the end of 2006. Almost immediately Mr. McConnell, as the No. 2 Republican, began working behind the scenes to sew up the top job. There was no opposition when his efforts resulted this month in his selection as leader.

Earlier, even as it became clear that Republicans would take significant losses in the elections, Mr. McConnell and his Republican colleagues fully expected to retain Senate control, and their demotion to minority status came as a jolt.

Still, Mr. McConnell is in a pivotal spot. Not only will he be the nexus between his party and Senate Democrats, and between Senate and House Republicans, he will also be a main conduit between Congressional Republicans and President Bush, making him responsible for managing a relationship that has been altered and complicated by the election.

After working in near lockstep with the White House for six years, some Senate Republicans are unhappy with the administration, attributing much of the blame for their party's defeat to the president and his political strategists. In addition, Mr. Bush will not face the voters again, while Republicans will be trying to regain their majority in two years, making those on Capitol Hill more inclined to protect their own interests.

Lawmakers and others note that Mr. McConnell will most likely be more independent than his predecessor. Mr. Frist, who became Republican leader amid the turmoil of racially insensitive remarks by Mr. Lott and his subsequent resignation from the post, often struggled against the perception that the White House had in effect installed him in that role.

"Senator Frist came in during a very difficult situation," said Senator Robert F. Bennett of Utah, who will serve as a special adviser to Mr. McConnell. "Senator McConnell comes in with a long background of understanding how this place works and what he is going to have to do."

Mr. McConnell — whose wife, Labor Secretary Elaine L. Chao, will be the last remaining member of Mr. Bush's original cabinet upon the departure of Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld — said he did not foresee a major transformation in the relationship between Congressional Republicans and the White House.

"The president is personally popular with Republicans in the House and Senate," he said, "and we are generally philosophically in tune with the president."

But the senator also made clear where his first obligation resides: "I am a friend of the president, but I am a product of the Senate."

Mr. McConnell said that he would like to reach some early legislative agreements with Democrats and that he saw an increase in the minimum wage as one possibility, as long as it is tied to tax breaks for small businesses that would bear new costs. And he indicated a strong willingness to work with Democrats on changes in rules governing lobbying contacts, as well as new disclosure of earmarks — spending provisions inserted by individual lawmakers.

"We should have done it this year," he said. "I think it was a failure of the current Congress not to do that."

He also said he hoped both parties saw the new Congress as a chance to move beyond early legislative goals and find consensus on broad immigration policy and Social Security.

"If it is a little controversial," he said, "I would tell my Democratic friends, 'You can always blame it on President Bush if it makes you feel better.' "

Touch Screens? Vote Yes Or No (WSJ)

By June Kronholz

The Wall Street Journal, November 30, 2006

The election's over, but the debate about touch-screen voting isn't -- and is likely to get even louder when a new Congress takes office in January and the run-up to the 2008 contest begins.

The electoral system didn't fail under new voting equipment, concludes a report by electionline.org, a nonpartisan research group. But it also wasn't put to the test of a presidential election year, when turnout and tensions are higher, the group adds.

With 2008 on the horizon, the House seems likely to quickly pass a long-stalled bill that would tighten the security of touch-screen voting. California Sen. Dianne Feinstein, who will head the rules committee in the new Democratic-controlled Senate, has announced hearings on an identical measure.

That legislation would require that touch screens provide a paper record of each ballot and a random audit of a fraction of those records to verify that votes are being counted correctly. Seventeen states already use paper trails, and a dozen require random audits. But some of this month's closest elections -- including for House seats in Florida, Pennsylvania and Indiana -- were in states that don't use either.

Both Sen. Feinstein and Rep. Rush Holt, the New Jersey Democrat who was author of the House bill, also would require voting-machine makers to disclose to a government commission the software code that records the ballots. Voting-machine vendors say the software is proprietary, and they already submit it to private labs for testing.

That has fanned suspicion among election activists and some technology experts, who want broader access to the software to test for security holes that they claim could leave it susceptible to hackers.

State legislatures are likely to wade into the voting-equipment debate when they convene in January. Some states, including Maryland and Colorado, are having second thoughts about their touch screens. Commissioners in Cuyahoga County, Ohio, yesterday said they are considering getting rid of their touch screens. Sarasota County, Fla., voters passed a referendum this month requiring the county to dump its touch screens and revert to paper ballots. That vote came in the same election where touch-screen problems may have affected the outcome of a congressional race.

And Georgia and Utah have funded research labs at their state universities to monitor voting-equipment standards and security -- areas where the federal government has been slow to act.

There are practical limits to most legislation, though. A paper-trail law probably wouldn't have prevented the Sarasota mishap, where about 18,000 voters apparently didn't notice that they hadn't voted in the House race, even though a summary page at the end of the ballot flagged their oversight. A paper record would have carried the same information and could also have been ignored.

Moreover, all but two states -- New York and Connecticut -- have spent their share of the $3.1 billion that the 2002 Help America Vote Act offered them to replace their old punch-card and lever voting machines, and make other electoral changes.

Election Data Services, a political consulting firm that tracks election administration, says more than half of U.S. counties used the money for optical scan voting machines, which read a voter's marks on a paper ballot and have been largely trouble free.

About 36% of jurisdictions chose touch screens, which prompt a voter through an on-screen ballot, like an ATM. David Magelby, a Brigham Young University professor who ran exit polls on voter attitudes toward touch screens, says voters trust the equipment, but "it's a fragile trust." Because the machines weren't an issue in most of this year's close elections, many reports of touch-screen glitches attracted little attention.

States or counties that want to switch equipment will probably have to pay for it themselves. "If I were a county election official, I would not be budgeting any more federal money for voting equipment," says Douglas Chapin, director of electionline.org.

Congress might have to pay for any modifications it mandates, like printer attachments to collect backup paper records. Diebold Inc. of North Canton, Ohio, says its touch screens could be fitted with printers and the software that runs them for about $400 to $500 each. But any supplemental money is likely to be modest because of competing priorities, Democratic staffers predict.

With only a few buyers left in the market, the dozen-or-so voting-machine vendors are likely to consolidate, eventually leaving only three or four, says Doug Lewis of the Election Center, an association of election officials. They're also unlikely to devote time or resources on new touch-screen models if they expect few new sales.

Instead, Diebold will concentrate on new products, including an electronic poll book that replaces paper lists of voters' names, says Mark Radke, marketing manager for Diebold's election unit. Diebold also plans to begin marketing a "vote remote product" that it says verifies a voter's signature on an absentee ballot and a voting machine accessible to the disabled that casts a ballot when a voter puffs or draws air or toggles a switch with a foot.

Meanwhile, Congress is likely to go way beyond voting machines in debating changes in election procedures. Both the House and Senate are likely to consider rules that would allow each party to have poll watchers in voting places and that would prohibit state election chiefs from serving on political campaign committees. The latter rule, if in force in 2000, would have precluded Katherine Harris from simultaneously overseeing the Florida election recount and serving on President Bush's campaign committee.

Still smarting from close losses in the 2000 and 2004 presidential elections, the Democratic-controlled Congress also may push for changes in voter-registration and voter-ID laws. As it is, states set their own identification requirements, and this year, four passed laws requiring voters to present a photo ID. Different state or federal courts blocked those laws in Georgia and Missouri but let them stand in Arizona and Indiana.

Democrats generally feel they lose votes if voters have to produce a driver's license or other photo ID or must show identification with their current address. They could push for legislation that limits the kind of identification required in federal elections, Democratic staffers say.

Republicans generally favor tough ID laws because their voters typically move less often and have drivers' licenses that they can easily produce. Republicans would oppose any legislation that sets minimal identification requirements, which they say would encourage ineligible voters to cast ballots.

Any changes to voting laws or touch-screen regulations would need Republican support to pass, and that could stall or derail action. With the 2008 election expected to be as contentious as this year's, neither party will want to pass anything that could hurt its electoral chances, or help the other party.

Republicans Want Vote On Abortion Bill (AP)

By Laurie Kellman

AP, November 30, 2006

While they still can, House Republicans are looking at scheduling a vote next week on a fetal pain abortion bill in a parting shot at incoming majority Democrats and a last bid for loyalty from the GOP's base of social conservatives.

The measure is tentatively on House GOP leaders' list of bills to be considered in a lame-duck session before Democrats assume control of Congress. It has no chance of passing the Senate during the waning days of Republican control. But, with Democrats ascending to agenda-setting roles, passage isn't the point, said one conservative leader.

"Next year, the leadership of the House will be hardcore pro-abortion loyalists," said Douglas Johnson, legislative director of the National Right to Life Committee. "They will block votes on even modest pro-life measures like this one."

The vote would be the first on the measure, which was introduced in September and referred to a health subcommittee, where no action on it was taken. Johnson said his group wants a House vote to test support for the measure.

The bill, by Rep. Chris Smith, R-N.J., defines a 20-week-old fetus as a "pain-capable unborn child" — a highly controversial threshold among scientists. It also directs the Health and Human Service Department to develop a brochure stating "that there is substantial evidence that the process of being killed in an abortion will cause the unborn child pain."

Abortion providers would be required to inform the mothers that evidence exists that the procedure would cause pain to the child and offer the mothers anesthesia for the baby. The mothers would accept or reject the anesthesia by signing a form. The bill allows for an exception for certified medical emergencies.

When fetuses can feel pain — versus a reflexive drawing back from stimuli — has been the subject of heated debate. Researchers at the University of California, San Francisco last year reviewed dozens of studies and medical reports and said that fetuses likely are incapable of feeling pain until around the seventh month of pregnancy, when they are about 28 weeks old.

That report hardly settled the issue for Johnson's group. The legislation would enshrine other evidence that fetuses "would experience great pain during abortions by 20 weeks," the Right to Life Committee said in a letter this week to House members.

Hedging On Hedge Funds (NYT)

The New York Times, November 30, 2006

In October, a month after the Amaranth hedge fund lost $6.6 billion — the most ever by a hedge fund — Henry Paulson Jr., the Treasury secretary, spoke with Bloomberg News about the importance of “transparency” at hedge funds and “liquidity” in the system. His remarks were interpreted at the time as a warning, perhaps even a harbinger of more oversight.

What a difference a month makes.

In what was billed as a major economic address last week, Mr. Paulson devoted less than one-tenth of his speech to hedge funds, leaving the impression that he is basically satisfied with the regulatory status quo.

No one wants the Treasury secretary to be an alarmist. But other officials, notably at the Federal Reserve Bank of New York and the Securities and Exchange Commission, have gone further than merely acknowledging “potential risks” and pledging more “deliberations,” as Mr. Paulson did in his speech. Without pushing any panic buttons, they have broached the need for more collateral and better risk controls at banks that deal with hedge funds and greater oversight of hedge funds that solicit investments from pension plans.

Currently, some 9,000 hedge funds manage $1.3 trillion of investors’ money and control trillions of dollars more through their use of loans and derivative financial tools. They invest in all major sectors and operate through banks and securities firms, affecting the economy as a whole. And yet, they remain largely beyond the reach of federal overseers, a holdover from the days when they were much less ubiquitous. In 1990, only a handful of hedge funds existed, and altogether they managed just $39 billion.

Opponents of regulation routinely note that hedge funds are indirectly supervised because the banks they do business with are regulated. According to that logic, banks guard against excesses by their hedge fund clients to protect themselves from losses and regulatory problems. That reasoning also assumes that bankers are free of conflicts that might impair their judgment. But as hedge funds have grown, banks have earned increasingly larger commissions, fees and trading profits from them, a development that could induce some bankers to err on the side of recklessness.

There’s also an issue of practicality. As hedge funds become more numerous and complex, it is simply not feasible for banks to stay on top of their activities. And then there’s the matter of responsibility. It’s not a banker’s job to protect the public interest. It’s the job of regulators.

Mr. Paulson was right when he noted in his speech that the need for regulation must be balanced against the benefits of flexibility. But the challenge of striking a balance is beginning to sound like an excuse for delay. It’s time to move the discussion beyond whether hedge funds require more regulation to how they should be regulated.

Not So Grand Bargain (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, November 30, 2006

The Bush Administration has been around long enough that by now we can smell a retreat in the making. To wit, the White House is getting ready to throw personal retirement accounts over the side in an attempt to cut a Social Security deal with the new Democratic Congress. Will a tax increase be the next concession?

President Bush has made no secret of his desire to claim some kind of Social Security deal as a legacy before he leaves office. Asked last week about possible negotiations, Treasury Secretary Hank Paulson declared there would be "no preconditions." Without quite admitting that personal accounts have to go, White House aides say dropping them is the price Democrats will demand even to discuss Social Security. While an attempt at bipartisanship is fine, the contents of the potential deal are worrisome. * * *

The evident White House hope is that, in return for this retreat on personal accounts, Democrats would agree to reduce the growth of future Social Security benefits. Specifically, that means some form of "progressive indexing" that Mr. Bush endorsed in a failed attempt to coax Democrats from their just-say-no Social Security strategy in 2005.

Promoted by financier Robert Pozen, "progressive indexing" would adjust future Social Security benefits according to a cost-of-living index. Currently, benefits rise each year based on the increase in average wages, which over time has meant about 1% a year faster than general price inflation. This wasn't part of Social Security's original plan but became law in 1977 as politicians sought to buy off the senior lobby by increasing benefits. This means retiree benefits will double in inflation-adjusted dollars by 2077 -- so changing to an inflation standard certainly makes fiscal sense.

The Pozen plan is also "means-tested," meaning that the wages standard would change to the inflation standard on a gradual basis as retiree incomes rise. Lower-income workers would see no change in their benefit formula. Estimates are that the Pozen plan would nonetheless save enough money to eliminate about 70% of Social Security's current unfunded future liabilities. The White House hope is that if Democrats agreed to "progressive indexing," they and the President could then declare a bipartisan political triumph of having "saved" Social Security. * * *

We endorsed the Pozen proposal last year, but that was when it was floated as a tradeoff for personal Social Security accounts. If those accounts are now off the table, then this kind of "grand bargain" is no bargain at all.

It is true that the Pozen plan would reduce future taxpayer liabilities on paper, but the key words are "on paper." No one can guarantee that future Congresses won't turn around and promise greater benefits once again as Congress did in 1977 and many other times over the years, even if the 110th Congress agrees to the Pozen formula. Al Gore used the temporary budget surplus as an excuse to promise more benefits as recently as the 2000 Presidential campaign.

More broadly, genuine Social Security reform is about more than federal accounting and "solvency." It ought to be about individual ownership and retirement independence. Personal accounts are a way to let younger workers -- especially lower-income workers -- put some of their payroll taxes into accounts that they would own and could grow over time. They would build wealth, and their future benefits wouldn't depend on the whims of future politicians. The Pozen plan by itself merely reduces their benefits and maintains Social Security as a cross-generational income transfer program.

As for "bipartisan" politics, Democrats cynically refused even to discuss Social Security reform last year, though they well know that benefits will soon start exceeding payroll tax revenues. Now that Democrats run Congress, they can reduce future benefits if they want to. But if they now want Republicans to give them political cover for doing so, at least the start of personal accounts should be part of the price.

There is also the issue of that 30% of future liabilities that would remain unfunded even under Pozen. Odds are that Democrats will pocket Mr. Bush's concession on private accounts and then move the goal posts. In return for even the modest Pozen reductions in benefit growth, they'll demand that Mr. Bush agree in the name of "fairness" to raise taxes too. And if Mr. Bush does that, his own political coalition will splinter like a tree hit by lightning. * * *

We wish we were confident that Mr. Bush will resist this temptation, but Presidents on a legacy hunt are hard to predict. The Beltway press corps and many of his own advisers will also be cheering him on. His former White House economic adviser, Lawrence Lindsey, warned on these pages recently that the White House is contemplating precisely this kind of deal.

On Social Security, Mr. Bush fought the good fight, only to be foiled by Democratic intransigence and troubles in Iraq that slashed his approval rating and thus his power to persuade. His achievement has been to offer a framework for reform that will be vindicated by some future President. He shouldn't tarnish that by signing onto one more temporary Washington fix that trades an immediate tax increase for the promise of future benefit cuts.

US Economic Growth Beats Forecasts (FT)

By Eoin Callan And Krishna Guha

Financial Times, November 30, 2006

The US economy grew at a rate of 2.2 per cent in the third quarter, faster than previously thought, while wage growth earlier this year was revised down on Wednesday, adding to evidence that the economy is on track for a soft landing.

This picture was reinforced by the latest Fed Beige Book survey of economic conditions, which offered little sign of a deterioration in the US economy during October and early November.

Most regional Fed districts “reported continued moderate growth.” In spite of “continuing softness in automobile and housing-related sales”, most districts said customer spending increased over the period.

Demand for services was seen as "healthy, according to most reports" while even manufacturing activity – which data suggests has seen some weakness – was "generally positive in most districts."

The Beige Book highlighted continued pressure in the jobs market, with a number of districts continuing to report "that labour markets were tight, especially for high-skilled occupations." Wage growth, though, was characterised as still "generally moderate."

The improved estimate for third-quarter growth is significantly higher than the government's initial estimate of 1.6 per cent annualised and well above Wall Street's expectations of 1.8 per cent, though still lower than the 2.6 per cent growth in the second quarter.

The growth rate underlines the Federal Reserve's optimistic view that the US economy is expanding at a moderate rate, in spite of the drag from a severe correction in housing.

The stronger growth estimate makes it more likely that the Fed will continue to keep interest rates on hold as it continues to monitor inflation, which remains "uncomfortably high" in the view of Ben Bernanke, chairman.

Price pressures were fractionally more muted than previously thought in the third quarter, with the Fed's favoured measure – the core personal consumption expenditure deflator – easing to an annualised rate of 2.2 per cent from an earlier estimate of 2.3 per cent.

Wage and salary growth in the second quarter was much slower than previously thought, information that will partly ease Fed concerns about inflation pressures arising from the tight labour market.

The government statistics showed considerable strength in the business sector as commercial investment rose at a 10 per cent annual rate – higher than the previous estimate of 8.6 per cent – while corporate profits grew much faster than earlier estimates suggested with a rise in pre-tax earnings of 4.6 per cent to $46.3bn.

The housing sector remained one of the weakest, with investment in homes falling by 18 per cent during the quarter, the biggest decline in 15 years - in line with earlier estimates.

Separate data released on Wednesday showed that sales of new homes fell 3.2 per cent in October, while supplies of unsold houses remained stubbornly high, though new house prices ticked up. The biggest drop was in the North-East, where purchases fell 39 per cent from the previous month, according to the National Association of Realtors.

Haseeb Ahmed, an economist at JP Morgan Chase, was sanguine about the housing data, saying: "We would regard the trend over the past few months as essentially flat, consistent with what we have been seeing in mortgage applications for home purchase."

Economy's Growth Outpaces Predictions (WP)

By Nell Henderson

The Washington Post, November 30, 2006

The U.S. economy grew considerably faster than initially thought in the three months that ended in September, the government said yesterday in a report that underscores Federal Reserve fears about the risk of inflation.

The nation's gross domestic product, which is the value of all goods and services produced, rose at a 2.2 percent annual rate during the July-through-September quarter, the Commerce Department said. That was a modest growth rate, but it was significantly better than the department's initial estimate of 1.6 percent, which would have been the weakest pace in more than three years.

The new figures still show the economy has slowed this year, after expanding at a torrid 5.6 percent annual rate in the first three months and at a moderate 2.6 percent pace in the second quarter.

But the revised figures show an economy that continues to expand, not sputter toward a recession as many analysts had feared after seeing estimates of third-quarter growth. Consumers increased their spending at a faster rate in the third quarter than in the previous quarter, while business investment and exports also rose more briskly.

Those gains were enough to more than offset a steep plunge in home building. Spending on residential construction fell at an 18 percent annual rate, the fastest drop in 15 years and a slightly steeper decline than the Commerce Department's 17.4 percent estimate.

"The only reason the economy has slowed down is because of the housing markets," said Eugenio J. Alem?n, a senior economist with Wells Fargo Economics. "But that's it. There is no other sign the economy is weak."

Rather, Alem?n said, the Commerce Department report shows "the economy is doing better than the markets and some analysts are saying. The slowdown is there, but the sky is not falling."

That fits with Federal Reserve Chairman Ben S. Bernanke's remarks Tuesday indicating the central bank is more confident the economy is headed for a gentle slowdown that should cause inflation to fall without triggering too severe of a downturn.

Bernanke said Tuesday that he expected inflation to decline over the next year as the economy grows at a moderate pace. Analysts peg that at an annual rate of about 2.5 percent, or slightly less than the fastest speed at which experts believe the economy can expand over time without spurring inflation. Bernanke made it clear, however, that he continues to see inflation, not recession, as the biggest risk facing the economy.

A separate Fed survey of regional conditions released yesterday concluded that the economy has kept to that pace in recent weeks. The report said most of the 12 Federal Reserve regional banks reported "moderate growth" in their districts since the preceding survey, in mid-October, despite continued weakness in housing-related industries.

Economic growth even picked up speed in the districts overseen by the Federal Reserve Bank of New York and the Fed Bank of Richmond, which serves the Washington area. The Richmond bank was also among several regional Fed banks that reported tight labor markets, particularly for workers with skills in finance, health care, engineering, legal services, oil field work and trucking.

The housing figures since September have been mixed. New-home sales fell 3.2 percent in October, the Commerce Department reported yesterday. But sales of previously owned homes, which account for most of the market, rose 0.5 percent last month, the National Association of Realtors said yesterday. Inventories of unsold homes keep climbing, while prices have fallen in many markets.

Meanwhile, consumers kept spending this month and last, benefiting from lower fuel prices, falling mortgage rates, low unemployment and rising incomes, according to the Fed regional survey and other recent retailers' reports.

The Commerce Department also gave the Fed some good news by slightly lowering its estimate of inflation in the third quarter. Consumer prices rose at a 2.4 percent annual rate, just below the 2.5 percent previously reported. After excluding volatile food and energy prices, core consumer prices rose 2.2 percent in the third quarter, compared with the estimated 2.3 percent.

Pace Of Economy's Growth Is Revised Upward (NYT)

By Jeremy W. Peters

The New York Times, November 30, 2006

The rough patch that the American economy hit in the third quarter was not quite as rough as the government first estimated.

New figures released yesterday by the Commerce Department showed that gross domestic product expanded at a 2.2 percent annual rate from July through September, notably more than the 1.6 percent reported last month.

But new signs surfaced yesterday suggesting the economy may be headed for a steeper decline during the rest of the year, with corporate inventories bulging and home sales deteriorating further.

Economists said that the slide in growth had still not bottomed out on its way down from the lofty 5.6 percent expansion in the first quarter.

"Things kind of tailed off in the third quarter, so you entered the fourth quarter without much momentum," said Joshua Shapiro, chief United States economist with MFR, an economic research firm. "We're not off to a great start."

A separate report from the Commerce Department yesterday said that sales of new homes dropped in October for the fifth time in 10 months, falling 3.2 percent from September. Compared with a year earlier, new home sales plunged 25.4 percent. It was the ninth consecutive month of year-over-year declines of more than 10 percent — the longest such string since 1991.

The housing sector, by far the biggest drag on growth in the third quarter, wilted at a slightly faster rate in the third quarter than the government initially reported. In all, the contraction in the housing market subtracted 1.16 percentage points from the annualized growth rate, compared with the 1.12 percentage points reported last month.

Two main factors led to the upward revision in the third-quarter figure: Americans purchased fewer goods from overseas than initially thought, and businesses added to their inventories more quickly.

On Wall Street yesterday, investors bid stocks upward on news of the stronger growth figures. The dollar, which has declined in recent days because of fears about the United States economy starting to slide, retraced some of its losses.

While increasing purchases by businesses bode well for the economy in the short term, they could drag down growth in the future if inventories pile up, economists said.

"A classic sign of an economy that's going to have trouble is an inventory accumulation," said David Kelly, an economist with Putnam Investments. "If companies don't sell as much stuff as they bought in one quarter, then they don't produce as much in the next quarter."

One benefit of the slowing economy has been lower inflation. The revised G.D.P. report showed that the pressure from inflation also eased more than the government first estimated. A broad index of consumer prices rose at a 2.4 percent annual rate, compared with an initial estimate of 2.5 percent. And a gauge of inflation, closely watched by the Federal Reserve, that strips out volatile food and energy prices posted an annualized "core" rate of 2.2 percent, compared with 2.3 percent reported last month.

The figures were consistent with other recent economic reports that have showed price increases starting to slow recently. Yesterday the Federal Reserve released its beige book report, which said that most regions of the country saw prices moderate from the beginning of October through Nov. 20.

While the Fed has held rates steady since August, its members have repeatedly cautioned that any resurgence of inflationary pressure could prompt it to start raising them again. On Tuesday, the Fed chairman, Ben S. Bernanke, warned in a speech in New York that inflation remained "uncomfortably high," signaling that future rate increases have not been ruled out. He identified pressure from rising wages and income as a potential threat because employers could pass their rising labor costs onto customers.

Indeed, the beige book showed that wages were rising quickly in some parts of the country. It cited "more rapid" wage gains in the San Francisco district, especially for skilled workers in health care, finance and construction. And it noted that employers were "increasingly reliant" on hiring bonuses to recruit skilled workers. Similar patterns were reported in the New York district.

The beige book largely depicted an economy that was moderating as the slowdown in housing weakened overall economic growth. "Most districts cited declining sales and rising home inventories," the report said.

The situation seemed particularly bleak in the San Francisco district, where banks were beginning to report that some builders had been delinquent in repaying loans.

The unsold inventory of new homes continued to mount, according to the Commerce Department's report. There is now a seven-month supply on the market, compared with 6.7 months' worth in September.

Even so, median prices for new homes ticked up in October to $248,500, 1.9 percent higher than a year earlier. Economists attributed the price jump to regional variations, and said it was not an indication that prices had bottomed out.

"Mix and location of home sales is clearly impacting the overall median price," Stuart Hoffman, chief economist with PNC Financial, said in a research report.

Sales in the West, where houses are more expensive on average than elsewhere in the country, actually rose last month. It was the only region of the country where sales increased.

Fed Report Shows Economy Grew Modestly (USAT)

By Barbara Hagenbaugh And Sue Kirchhoff

USA Today, November 30, 2006

WASHINGTON — The economy grew moderately across much of the USA in October and November despite softness in housing and car sales, the Federal Reserve said Wednesday.

In its regular "beige book" report, an anecdotal look at the economy named for the color of its cover, the Fed said consumer spending had increased and labor markets remained tight, leading to some wage gains.

The beige book will be used by Federal Reserve policymakers when they next meet on Dec. 12 to discuss interest rates.

Investors in a market in which participants bet on future Fed moves predict the Fed will not change interest rates for the fourth-consecutive meeting next month. After raising interest rates 17 times over two years, the Fed's target for short-term interest rates is at 5.25%, the highest level in nearly six years.

Stocks Sustain Rally On Bright GDP Report (WSJ)

By Peter A. Mckay

The Wall Street Journal, November 30, 2006

A government report showing surprisingly strong economic growth helped stocks finish higher for a second straight day, as investors played down the possibility of higher interest rates.

On the heels of Tuesday's 14.74-point gain, the Dow Jones Industrial Average jumped 90.28 points, or 0.7%, to 12226.73, up 14.1% on the year. The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index rose 0.9%, or 12.76 points, to 1399.48, up 12.1% on the year. The Nasdaq Composite Index gained 0.8%, or 19.62 points, to 2432.23, up 10.3% on the year.

The Commerce Department revised its earlier estimate of third-quarter gross domestic product -- essentially, the U.S. economy's bottom line. The agency said GDP grew 2.2% in the period, compared with its initial estimate of 1.6%.

Wall Street analysts had expected the new estimate to come in at 1.8%, a far more modest rise than what was announced. Some said the higher estimate lent credence to Federal Reserve Chairman Benjamin Bernanke's comments Tuesday that the threat of inflation remains so intense that the central bank's primary worry is whether to raise interest rates again to slow runaway price increases throughout the economy.

Although the prospect of another Fed rate increase generally makes investing pros jittery, in recent days many have embraced the idea that a steadily growing economy bolsters corporate profits and stock prices.

"There are certainly some risks ahead, but I think there's a lot of reason to feel good about the market right now," said Michael Cuggino, president and portfolio manager for the Permanent Portfolio Family of Funds. He said he believes the central bank could hold its key interest rate steady for as long as another 12 months. "There's nothing that says you have to go up or down," he said. "You can be neutral for a while."

On a downbeat note for stocks, crude-oil prices rose for a third straight day after weekly data from the Department of Energy showed a surprisingly large drawdown in U.S. energy inventories. Futures contracts for January delivery jumped $1.47, or 2.4%, to a two-month high of $62.46 a barrel, up 2.3% on the year at the New York Mercantile Exchange.

In major U.S. market action:

Stocks rose. Total trading volume for stocks listed on the New York Stock Exchange was 2.77 billion shares, as 2,665 stocks advanced, and 675 fell.

Bond prices fell: The 10-year note fell 5/32 point, or $1.56 for each $1,000 invested, pushing the yield up to 4.525%. The 30-year bond fell 10/32 to yield 4.614%.

The dollar strengthened. Against the Japanese currency, the dollar rose to 116.41 yen, compared with 116.09. The euro fell to $1.3146, compared with $1.3198.

Housing Slump Likely To Take Toll On 4th-Quarter Growth (WSJ)

By Rafael Gerena-morales

The Wall Street Journal, November 30, 2006

New-home sales fell in October, suggesting that the housing sector will continue to hamper economic growth in the fourth quarter at a time when business investment is also weakening.

Sales of single-family homes declined last month to a seasonally adjusted annual rate of 1.004 million, down 3.2% from September and 25.4% from a year earlier, the Commerce Department said yesterday. At the same time, the number of new homes on the market climbed to a seven-month supply, based on the current sales rate, up from a 6.7-month supply in September.

Analysts say the high inventories suggest that builders are likely to curtail new construction in the current quarter, which will further damp economic growth.

A separate report underscored the housing slump's toll on the economy. The Commerce Department said yesterday that the nation's economy grew at a seasonally adjusted annualized rate of 2.2% in the third quarter, up from its initial estimate of 1.6%.

The upward revision, which reflected a stronger-than-expected buildup in business inventories and slower-than-expected import growth, cheered investors, helping send the Dow Jones Industrial Average up 90.28 points to 12226.73 (See related article2).

However, residential fixed investment -- a component of gross domestic product that reflects the nation's spending on housing -- plunged 18% during the quarter, the sharpest drop in 15 years, shaving 1.16 percentage points off overall growth.

"The drag from housing is going to get bigger," said Brian Bethune, U.S. economist at consulting firm Global Insight, who expects economic growth to slow to between 1.5% and 2% in the fourth quarter. "We're losing steam."

While most economists agree that the economy is cooling in the current quarter, as housing sales and construction activity decline, there is considerable debate about the extent of the slowdown. Earlier this week, Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke said that growth outside housing and autos remains "solid," and that the Fed is more inclined to raise short-term interest rates than to cut them.

That put Mr. Bernanke at odds with bond-market investors, who point to the cooling housing market, moderate consumer-spending gains and a recent report showing that business orders fell sharply in October as signs that the threat of inflation is easing.

David Seiders, chief economist at the National Association of Home Builders, said demand for homes appears to be stabilizing, a point that Mr. Bernanke made in explaining his upbeat view of the economy. Although new-home sales have slipped, Mr. Seiders notes that October's annualized sales rate of 1.004 million units was roughly equal to the 1.005 million average for the three months through September.

That suggests the housing market is "stabilizing when you consider the kind of downswings" occurring earlier this year, Mr. Seiders said. He expects new-home sales to level off at an annualized rate of roughly one million units in the fourth quarter and to "gradually improve" in 2007.

Although housing inventories rose last month, based on the current sales rate, the Commerce Department said that the median sales price of new homes climbed to $248,500, up nearly 14% from September. Mr. Seiders said home builders are showering buyers with sales incentives, such as paying $5,000 toward closing costs or upgrading amenities, which has helped some builders sell homes at high prices.

The Federal Reserve's latest survey of economic conditions, which was released yesterday, suggests that consumer spending is weathering the housing slump. "Despite continued softness in automobile and housing-related sales, most districts reported that consumer spending increased during October and early November," according to the Fed's "beige book," which added that the economy continues to experience "moderate growth." Labor markets remained tight, especially for the high-skilled, and wage growth was "generally moderate," the Fed said.

For now, other readings suggest inflation isn't flaring, despite signs of climbing wages. Excluding food and energy, inflation rose 2.2% in the third quarter, down from 2.7% in the second quarter, according to the personal-consumption expenditures index, the Commerce Department's inflation measure, which it updated yesterday.

Still, some economists said core inflation remains a problem, because its current level is above the Fed's perceived comfort zone of 1% to 2%. "It's good to see the inflation numbers down, but it's too early to declare victory," said Joel Naroff, chief economist at Naroff Economic Advisors. "While we may have passed the peak in inflation, it doesn't mean we're on a clear, downward slope as far as inflation goes."

As Housing Goes, So Goes The US Economy? (CSM)

By Mark Trumbull

The Christian Science Monitor, November 30, 2006

Evidence keeps piling up that the housing sector, after fueling the American economy with its historic boom, is now in a recession.

Usually, housing downturns precede broader recessions in the whole economy. But this time, forecasters say that, for a range of reasons, the economy may continue on a path of growth.

The decline in home prices and sales volume has ripple effects, to be sure. Wednesday, the Commerce Department reported that the economy grew at a 2.2 percent annual pace in the quarter from July through September, a slower pace than earlier this year. A main reason was the slump in residential construction.

But housing and the rest of the economy may be traveling on divergent tracks. In 2001, the last time the nation was in recession, housing did well as home prices continued to climb. Now, the reverse appears to be occurring.

"Typically in the past when housing fell into a recession so did the economy," says Ed Yardeni, chief economist at Oak Associates, an investment firm in Akron, Ohio. This time, "the rest of the economy is growing quite well.... There seems to be a certain amount of resilience."

Weathering the housing slump won't necessarily be easy.

This week, the median sales price of previously owned homes took its biggest tumble ever, falling 3.5 percent in October from the level one year ago to $221,000, according to the National Association of Realtors.

The housing slump hurts the economy in several ways.

There's lower construction spending, falling purchases of appliances, paint, and other home-related goods, and a negative "wealth effect" that affects consumer spending. As home prices dip, homeowners have less equity in their homes, or less money to spend.

Of the 13 occasions when residential construction turned negative on a year-over-year basis, recessions followed 10 times, according to research by the investment firm Merrill Lynch in New York.

Several factors, though, suggest that the current housing downturn may not drag the wider economy into recession:

· It usually takes more than just a housing contraction to cause an economy-wide recession. Although construction and home sales have often preceded past recessions, some other factors - a drop in government spending on defense, a jump in oil prices - have also contributed to a wider slump.

· The Federal Reserve is learning more about what it takes to guide the economy to a "soft landing." The Fed's goal is to remove inflationary pressures from the economy while not causing a recession by squeezing the credit environment too much.

As in the past, interest-rate hikes by the Fed over the past two years have cooled the housing market. The policymakers have stopped raising rates for now, watching to see whether they can thread the needle just right. Often past efforts have failed, but most economists think the Fed will avoid causing a recession this time.

· The market for home mortgages is very different than in 1990, when the last big housing crunch occurred. Now, when people get a mortgage, the loan generally doesn't stay with the bank that originated it. Instead, loans are packaged in bundles and sold to investors who reap the stream of monthly income from homeowners.

The upshot: The housing market's risk is diffused more widely, so banks face less pressure to cut back on lending during housing downturns.

"One of the important developments on the capital markets since the mid-1980s is securitization" of loans, Mr. Yardeni says. In this housing slump, banks are still lending, and their stocks are doing well on Wall Street.

· While the housing downturn is steep, its effects on consumers may be smaller than many fear. Surging home prices have added trillions of dollars in wealth to homeowners. That won't all be wiped away by a 3.5 percent decline in home values, or even by a 10 percent decline, which some forecasters say is possible.

Moreover, any negative "wealth effect" from home values promises to be offset by rising incomes. In the current job market, with unemployment near record lows, wages are on the rise. It's hard to know how long that pattern will continue, but it will help offset the impact of home prices.

"Income is 10 times more important than wealth" as driver of the economy, says Richard Berner, US economist at the investment house Morgan Stanley in New York.

That's a key reason he expects the economy to escape a recession next year.

"This isn't bulletproof," he says.

The risks are that the housing recession could fall deeper than analysts expect, or that energy prices could spike higher again.

Oil has edged back above $60 a barrel this week, trading close to $62 Wednesday morning. That's still well below its peak of around $75 a barrel this summer.

The stock market shows little worry of recession among investors. Stock prices rebounded Wednesday despite the rise in oil prices, with the Dow Jones Industrial Average well above 12,200 in morning trading.

In a speech this week, Federal Reserve chairman Ben Bernanke described a generally strong economy, where inflation was a greater concern for policymakers than the risk that the housing sector will put too much of a drag on economic growth.

"Although residential construction continues to sag," he said, "some indications suggest that the rate of home purchase may be stabilizing, perhaps in response to modest declines in mortgage interest rates over the past few months and lower prices in some markets."

For both new and existing homes, the pattern this year has been of sales volume declining and prices weakening - but not necessarily every month. Wednesday for example, the government reported that new-home prices rose in October even as sales fell sharply.

Why Globalization Fans Must Win The Middle (WSJ)

By David Wessel

The Wall Street Journal, November 30, 2006

But will any of that boost wages of laid-off factory workers in the Midwest? Or make them more optimistic about their children's chances for jobs that buy middle-class lifestyles? And what are the political ramifications if Democrats, so quick to criticize Republicans for tolerating stagnant wages, fail to offer workers cause for hope?

Part of the Democratic answer is to share the fruits of U.S. prosperity more evenly. Reader response to last week's column, which detailed options in the Democratic playbook, proves that's not universally popular: Many think government ought not to concern itself with the gap between winners and losers in the economy. Some think restraining inequality is impractical; they argue tax increases on the rich retard economic growth. Others think it's just wrong.

Yet some prominent fans of globalization -- Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson and Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke among them -- warn that widening inequality threatens the political consensus for globalization, deregulation and flexible labor markets, all of which they deem essential to economic growth. To them, responding to inequality isn't ideological; it's pragmatic.

What would they do? Improve education, mostly. But, as former Treasury Secretary Lawrence Summers, himself a cheerleader for globalization, put it in an op-ed piece last month: "Education is central to any economic strategy, but there is a limit to what it can do for workers in their 40s and beyond. Nor can education be a complete answer at a time when skilled computer programmers in India are paid less than $2,000 a month.

"What the anxious global middle is told often feels like pretty thin gruel," he argues. "The twin arguments that globalization is inevitable and protectionism is counterproductive have the great virtue of being correct, but do not provide much consolation for the losers."

Which brings us to what's preoccupying Gene Sperling, a Democratic cabinet-secretary-in-waiting firmly in the pro-globalization wing of the party. Democrats, he says, must figure out what government can do to encourage business to create more middle-class jobs in the U.S.

Robert Reich, the former Clinton labor secretary, gives Democrats similar advice: "Instead of framing basic economic questions as whether to roll back Bush's tax cuts, make it about how to re-create good jobs at good wages and rebuild the middle class," he says.

But how? Mr. Reich recites a familiar list: trade policy, industrial policy -- government attempts to influence the flow of capital toward promising industries and companies -- antitrust, publicly financed research and development, and stronger trade unions.

Mr. Sperling is reaching for something that sounds, well, less like tired Democratic rhetoric. "One of the great challenges for 'pro-growth progressives' is coming up with a vision of where middle-class jobs are coming from that doesn't rely on 'industrial policy' or public works," he says.

Pro-growth conservatives have a clear vision: Cut taxes, discourage lawsuits, push government aside and let American entrepreneurial dynamism flourish. Mr. Sperling derides that "field of dreams" approach as sitting back and hoping good jobs will come. He argues that recent history shows that approach is insufficient.

His goal is easily expressed: Make the U.S. "a magnet for high-value job creation." But the available options are limited. On the substance, he says, "It's tough to say with confidence what will work because, given the global labor market, jobs will go to where the lowest wages" are. And the politics are hard, too. "It's very abstract for people who are suffering to say: 'We're going to double the National Institutes of Health budget.' "

This is, however, the big question hanging over the U.S. economy: What will assure Americans there will be good jobs for their kids? Answering that is key to Democrats for partisan reasons. But it's increasingly clear to champions of globalization from both parties -- those in government and those in business -- that unless they can answer it, they're handing a cudgel to those who think they can stop the further integration of the world economy.

'Fair Trade' Foolishness (WP)

By Robert J. Samuelson

The Washington Post, November 30, 2006

We may be about to shoot ourselves in the foot -- or maybe the chest -- on trade. In the name of "fair trade," we may punish our own exporters. In 2005 worldwide exports exceeded $10 trillion. Since 1980 they've more than tripled while the overall global economy doubled. Like it or not, massive international flows of goods and services (aka "globalization") underpin all modern economies. Supply chains have dispersed. We can accept this reality and try to benefit from it. Or we can rail against it. We seem to be edging toward railing.

Just last week Democratic congressional leaders signaled that they may oppose new trade agreements with Colombia and Peru. Who, if anyone, would benefit is unclear. As The Post reported, the agreements' darkened prospects have already led to layoffs in Colombia. In the United States, manufacturers believe the agreements would expand their exports. Peru's tariffs average about 10 percent, Colombia's about 11 percent, says Frank Vargo of the National Association of Manufacturers. Most of these would go to zero under the agreements.

We are dealing with something new here. It transcends traditional protectionism, which tries to shield specific industries and workers from imports. It's trade obstructionism: a reflexive reaction against almost any trade agreement. The idea is that much trade is inherently "unfair." Multinational companies use it to ship U.S. jobs abroad; other countries compete unfairly with low wages and substandard labor practices. (Indeed, lax labor standards are cited to oppose the Peruvian and Colombian agreements.) Vast U.S. trade deficits measure the destructiveness. If trade is so unfair, why encourage more of it?

Much of this indictment is wrong or wildly exaggerated. For example, American trade deficits haven't destroyed U.S. job creation by sending work abroad. Consider: From 1980 to 2006, the trade deficit jumped from $19 billion to an estimated $786 billion, or from less than 1 percent of gross domestic product to about 6 percent. Still, employment in the same period rose from 99 million to 145 million. Job creation defies the trade deficits, whose causes lie largely beyond our control and have little to do with "unfair" trade practices.

Faster economic growth in the United States than in many of our major trading partners has stunted our exports and increased our imports. Likewise, the dollar's role as the main global currency -- used for trade and international investment -- has kept its exchange rate high. Companies, individuals and governments hold on to dollars rather than selling. This makes U.S. exports more expensive and imports cheaper. To be sure, that puts U.S. factory workers and farmers at a disadvantage on world markets. The disadvantage is compounded when some countries (China) keep their currencies artificially undervalued. Inevitably, some jobs move abroad and some factories close because of import competition.

But there are also larger truths. One is that China's surging exports have (so far) come mostly at the expense of other Asian countries. Goods once shipped from Taiwan or Thailand now arrive from China. Another truth is that U.S. jobs are destroyed for many reasons -- new domestic competition, new technologies, changing consumer tastes, the business cycle. A remarkable statistic: Every three months, 7 million to 8 million U.S. jobs disappear and roughly an equal or greater number are created. Trade is a relatively minor factor in job loss.

It is, however, an easy scapegoat. It enables critics to blame foreigners and suggest a solution: restrict trade. "Economic change is disruptive," says economist Douglas Irwin of Dartmouth College. "If the cause is technology, you can't do much about it." Globalization becomes a convenient explanation for many economic discontents, from job insecurity to squeezed living standards.

Hence, trade obstructionism.

The timing could not be worse. The U.S. economy is moving away from growth led by housing and consumer spending. American consumers have borrowed heavily, if not overborrowed. The Federal Reserve reports that household debt is a record 134 percent of household disposable income. As Americans curb their borrowing, consumer and home purchases are slowing. Something will have to replace that spending if the economy is to continue to expand. The obvious candidates are exports and investment (in factories, machinery) related to exports.

Some of this shift may occur naturally from a cheaper dollar and faster economic growth abroad. But it would be insane to hamper our export prospects -- exactly what trade obstructionism threatens. The world is quietly retreating from a multilateral trading system, in which all countries simultaneously reduce trade barriers. The latest multilateral trade talks (the Doha round) are suspended, perhaps permanently; meanwhile, there are now more than 200 country-to-country and regional trade agreements. The United States has 13. But to negotiate more of them, the president needs "trade promotion authority," and President Bush's expires in June.

If it's not renewed -- a good possibility -- the United States will in effect prevent itself from negotiating new trade agreements while other countries are busily doing so. The European Union is negotiating with India. The 10 members of the Association of Southeast Asian Nations are negotiating with Japan, South Korea and Australia. The hallmark of these agreements is that they discriminate against outsiders. So American exporters would face higher tariffs than many of their international competitors. "If we take ourselves out of the trade negotiation game, U.S. exporters will be the losers," says Gary Horlick, a leading trade lawyer.

The next Congress must decide whether it embraces the symbolism or the reality of trade. If it chooses symbolism, it will perversely harm many of the workers it's trying to help.

Half In New Health Plans Want To Switch, Poll Shows (WP)

By Christopher Lee

The Washington Post, November 30, 2006

People in a new kind of health plan that makes consumers pay for a bigger share of their care appear to be more cost-conscious than those in traditional plans, but half say they would switch if they had the chance, according to a survey released yesterday.

The survey of 1,389 people by the nonprofit Kaiser Family Foundation found that 71 percent of those in the new "consumer-directed health plans" said the policies prompted them to consider cost when seeking health care, compared with 49 percent of those with more traditional employer-sponsored coverage.

For instance, people in the new plans were more likely to ask about the cost of a doctor's visit and inquire about the availability of lower-cost alternatives in treatments and tests. More than half, 55 percent, who sought care said the new plans have changed their approach to using health care.

Such findings are in line with assertions by the Bush administration and other advocates who say that the new plans will check spiraling health-care spending by giving consumers a financial incentive to shop around for the best care at a reasonable price -- and to get only the care they need.

"It's a cultural shift," said Devon Herrick, a health economist at the National Center for Policy Analysis in Dallas. "When you go to Wal-Mart you don't have to ask about price -- it's right there next to the good or service you are buying. Health care is not there yet, but it's getting that way. This is the early stages. We have the incentives to get people more responsible and asking about price."

In contrast with other plans that typically require $15 or $20 co-payments for visits to the doctor, the new plans can require consumers to shell out hundreds or thousands of dollars of their own money for medications, physicians' services and hospital care before most coverage kicks in. The plans have high annual deductibles, but their premiums tend to be lower.

Some consumers complain that the new plans are confusing, and the Kaiser survey found that the plans are not without problems.

More than 60 percent of people in the plans said it is hard to find good information about the cost of doctors' services and hospital care; and about 50 percent said information on quality of care is hard to come by. Half of those enrolled in the plans said they would switch out if given the choice, compared with a third of those in traditional plans. And they were twice as likely as those in traditional plans to say that they went without care because of cost.

Gail Shearer, director of health policy analysis at Consumers Union, noted that the survey found that people in the new plans tend to be wealthier, healthier and more educated than their counterparts in traditional plans, and were more likely to be white.

"Instead of our health system moving towards one where we're all in this together, this type of option is leading to more splitting the population into different segments and, to me, that's an unhealthy thing," Shearer said. She added that poorer, sicker consumers could get left behind.

The new plans are often coupled with special accounts that allow consumers -- or employers on behalf of their workers -- to set aside tax-free dollars to pay for medical expenses, with any unused money rolling over into the following year. About 3 million people are enrolled in such plans this year, and experts expect that number to grow.

"The folks in the programs now are early adopters, pioneers," said Greg Scandlen, president of Consumers for Health Care Choices, a Hagerstown, Md.-based nonprofit group that favors the plans. "And they are really testing the waters, and I think they are already forcing a lot of change. . . . With any kind of new insurance plan it takes a while to figure out what it's all about."

Dem. Challenger Concedes In N.C. Race (AP)

By Tim Whitmire

AP, November 30, 2006

Democrat challenger Larry Kissell conceded defeat Wednesday to Rep. Robin Hayes, after the initial phase of a hand recount showed the result was not likely to change.

Kissell conceded even though only five of the 10 counties in the district had completed the hand recount of sample precincts that he requested. He picked up 2 votes, but would have needed a total of about 10 votes to trigger a full recount.

"After today's recounts, I offer Congressman Hayes a belated congratulation for his victory now that the votes have been counted," Kissell said in a statement. He also said he was starting his 2008 congressional bid immediately.

The race, which Hayes led by just 329 votes out of 121,523 cast following a machine recount last week, is one of the nation's last unresolved elections for a U.S. House seat.

In the other races, Democratic Rep. William Jefferson, the subject of an FBI bribery investigation, will face fellow Democrat Karen Carter in a Dec. 9 runoff in Louisiana. In Texas, GOP Rep. Henry Bonilla will face Democratic former Rep. Ciro Rodriguez in a Dec. 12 runoff.

In Florida, Democrat Christine Jennings has contested her election loss to Republican Vern Buchanan, whom state officials certified as the winner of a race to replace Rep. Katherine Harris.

In Ohio, a recount is under way in the race between Rep. Deborah Pryce and Democratic challenger Mary Jo Kilroy. Pryce won the race by 1,055 votes, but the margin was small enough to trigger an automatic recount.

Frist Abandons 2008 Presidential Bid (AP)

By David Espo

AP, November 30, 2006

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist renounced a bid for the White House in 2008 on Wednesday, an early dropout from the most wide-open presidential race in decades.

"In the Bible, God tells us for everything there is a season, and for me, for now, this season of being an elected official has come to a close," said the Tennessee Republican, a surgeon before he entered politics in 1994.

While the first national convention delegates won't be chosen for more than a year, jockeying among potential presidential contenders is well under way.

Frist made his announcement as several potential GOP hopefuls were descending on Miami for the annual meeting of the Republican Governors' Association. Among them were Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney, outgoing head of the group, and Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee. Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., planned private meetings with governors Thursday followed by a reception.

The roster of potential candidates in both parties is long in the first White House campaign since 1928 in which neither an incumbent president nor vice president is in the early mix of candidates.

Frist's brief statement did not specify a reason for dropping out of a race he had eyed for more than a year, and had included trips to the key early states of Iowa and New Hampshire.

In a statement, he said he "will take a sabbatical from public life" and "return to my professional roots as a healer and to refocus my creative energies on innovative solutions to seemingly insurmountable challenges Americans face."

His decision capped a 12-year career in politics marked by a speedy rise but an uncertain tenure at the peak of Senate power.

He won his Senate seat in 1994 and pledged to serve no longer than two six-year terms.

His launching pad to national power was the chairmanship of the Senate GOP campaign committee, which gained seats under his direction in 2002. That, in turn, positioned him to become majority leader when Mississippi Sen. Trent Lott made racially insensitive comments after the election and was forced to step aside.

As majority leader, Frist worked to implement President Bush's agenda, from passage of tax cuts to confirmation of conservative judges. He played a significant role in legislation that overhauled Medicare and created a prescription drug benefit.

His politics and his medical training collided in 2005 in the case of Terri Schiavo, and he was widely criticized for pandering to religious conservatives by injecting himself into the debate over the brain-damaged woman. Doctors in the case said she was in a persistent vegetative state. Frist, in his office in the Capitol, viewed a videotape of her, then publicly questioned the diagnosis.

An autopsy later confirmed their judgment, not his.

Frist also remains under investigation by the Securities and Exchange Commission on insider trading charges in connection with the sale of shares in HCA (nyse: HCA - news - people) Inc. Frist's father and brother founded the firm and it formed the foundation of the senator's considerable personal wealth. He has vehemently denied any wrongdoing, although his hopes for a speedy end to the investigation have not materialized.

Also embarrassing was a disclosure by The Associated Press in August that Frist had not met the continuing medical education requirement needed to remain licensed, although he submitted paperwork to Tennessee officials indicating that he had. He quickly complied with the requirements and retained his license.

Apart from McCain, Huckabee and Romney, other potential GOP contenders for the White House include Sens. Sam Brownback of Kansas and Chuck Hagel of Nebraska, Gov. George Pataki of New York; Rep. Duncan Hunter of California; former Wisconsin Gov. Tommy Thompson and former New York Mayor Rudy Giuliani.

Democratic Sens. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York and Barack Obama of Illinois are the best known nationally; outgoing Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack will be first to formally declare his candidacy, on Thursday, in his home state.

Indiana Sen. Evan Bayh and former Sen. John Edwards are expected to run, and Gov. Bill Richardson of New Mexico may, as well.

Former Democratic Gov. Mark Warner of Virginia has announced he will not run for the presidency in 2008. Warner, like Frist, had begun putting in place a campaign organization to raise money and line up supporters in early caucus and primary states, as well as nationally.

Frist Announces He Won't Run For President In 2008 (LAT)

By Joel Havemann

The Los Angeles Times, November 30, 2006

WASHINGTON — Sen. Bill Frist of Tennessee announced Wednesday that he would not run for president in 2008, a decision that may boost support for other Republicans who have courted the party's social conservatives.

Frist had advanced the key bloc's agenda during the four years he was Senate majority leader. With his withdrawal, several potential GOP candidates will have less competition wooing those voters.

They include Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney, Sen. Sam Brownback of Kansas, Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee and former House Speaker Newt Gingrich of Georgia.

At this early stage in the campaign, polls show Sen. John McCain of Arizona and former New York Mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani leading the pack for the Republican nomination. But Giuliani has a liberal record on issues such as abortion and gay rights. And many social conservatives are skeptical of McCain's commitment to their causes.

As a result, some are pushing the movement to coalesce behind another candidate.

Frist, who did not seek a third Senate term this year, had only mixed success in attracting social conservatives to his side.

Tom McClusky, vice president for government affairs of the Family Research Council, praised him for helping confirm two of President Bush's Supreme Court nominees, John G. Roberts Jr. and Samuel A. Alito Jr.

DOJ_NMG_0100162

Frist also was instrumental in securing tougher penalties for violating broadcast decency laws and in prolonging the life of Terri Schiavo, a brain-damaged Florida woman who died last year after a court ordered that she be removed from life support systems.

"But it is doubtful that we would have supported him," McClusky said. The reason: Frist's support for embryonic stem cell research.

Frist, 54, long had been viewed as a likely 2008 presidential contender. But his fortunes faded as criticism mounted that he was ineffective in his Senate leadership post.

His role in the Schiavo controversy also appeared to hurt his standing, with polls showing that many voters questioned the government's intervention in the case. He was assailed for publicly questioning the diagnosis that Schiavo was in a vegetative state after he viewed a videotape of the woman.

Despite such setbacks, it was assumed in most political circles that he would focus on building a presidential campaign upon leaving the Senate.

Instead, in a statement released Wednesday, he said, "God tells us for everything there is a season, and for me, for now, this season of being an elected official has come to a close."

A renowned surgeon before he became a politician, Frist said he needed "a sabbatical from public life."

Those close to him said they expected him to return to the practice of medicine in some capacity.

"This is a heart surgeon, and he wants to go back and reenergize those parts of him," said David Winston, a Republican strategist who worked frequently with Frist.

Winston added, "Even as Senate majority leader, he would do heart operations on gorillas at the zoo."

Frist's associates also said his decision not to run for president had nothing to do with a Securities and Exchange Commission investigation of insider trading charges in connection with his sale of shares in HCA Inc., the hospital chain that his father helped found.

Frist has denied any wrongdoing in the matter, which has been under federal scrutiny for more than a year.

His decision came less than two months after former Virginia Gov. Mark Warner, a Democrat, surprised many in his party by announcing that he would not run for president. Warner said he was unwilling to make the family sacrifices demanded by a White House campaign.

The GOP race already had been reshaped by this year's midterm campaign. Six months ago, Sen. George Allen of Virginia was seen as a potential strong contender. But he stumbled as he sought reelection to the Senate, losing the race and effectively ending his presidential chances.

Frist Won't Seek Presidency In 2008 (TNN)

By Bill Theobald

Tennessean, November 29, 2006

Sen. Bill Frist, Republican majority leader from Tennessee, announced this morning that he will not be running for president in 2008.

"In the Bible, God tells us for everything there is a season, and for me, for now, this season of being an elected official has come to a close. I do not intend to run for president in 2008," Frist said in a statement released by his office.

The announcement comes after Frist spent several years laying the groundwork for a presidential bid. Frist had spent much of the past two years visiting key presidential states, including Iowa, creating a field operation and raising money for national, state and local candidates in these states.

Frist said he and his wife, Karyn, "will take a sabbatical from public life. At this point a return to private life will allow me to return to my professional roots as a healer and to refocus my creative energies on innovative solutions to seemingly insurmountable challenges Americans face," Frist said.

The statement makes unclear Frist's plans for the future.

"Karyn and I will seek the best opportunity to serve," Frist said. "I may eventually return to what I've done for most of my adult life, heal through medicine and health.

"In the short term, I will resume my regular medical mission trips as a doctor around the world to serve those in poverty, in famine, and in civil war. I will continue to be a strong voice to fix what is broken in our health care system and to address the issues of clean water and public health globally. We will stay actively engaged in policy issues affecting the lives of Americans."

Frist, who retires this year after two six-year terms, struggled at times as majority leader to move legislation through the complex political processes of the Senate.

He took a further blow when Republicans lost control of both the House and Senate in the November election.

Tennessee Republicans praised Frist's role in state politics.

"It was absolutely unbelievable to have what was arguably the second-most powerful man in the world being so involved in state politics as he has been," said Ron Ramsey, Republican majority leader in the state Senate.

Ramsey said he is disappointed -- but not surprised -- by Frist's decision

"You can see a trend that when you become the majority leader in the U.S. Senate that you have to make tough decisions, and sometimes those aren't the decisions you have to make to run for president," he said.

Tennessee Republican Party Chairman Bob Davis said he doesn't think Frist's future in politics is over.

"I think it's more of a 'Let's take a rest,'" Davis said. "You know he's a young man, and he's got plenty of time if he wants to do something like this down the road, and the sky's the limit for Sen. Frist."

Frist Says He Does Not Intend To Run For President In 2008 (WP)

By Michael A. Fletcher

The Washington Post, November 30, 2006

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist announced yesterday that he will not run for president in 2008, saying that he plans to "take a sabbatical from public life" and return to his Tennessee home and professional roots as a doctor.

Long viewed as a potentially formidable candidate for the GOP nomination, Frist seemed to be positioning himself for a presidential run earlier this year. He traveled to the early primary states of New Hampshire, Iowa and South Carolina to test the waters, and he used his political action committee to spread campaign contributions -- and sow goodwill -- among GOP candidates around the country. Meanwhile, he worked to cultivate an image as a staunch and thoughtful conservative.

But bruised by a series of political stumbles, Frist, 54, decided that now is not the time to run for higher office. "In the Bible, God tells us for everything there is a season, and for me, for now, this season of being an elected official has come to a close," he said in a written statement. "I do not intend to run for president in 2008."

Frist's decision creates an opening on the right flank of the GOP political spectrum, while still leaving a broad field of potential presidential candidates for 2008, which will mark the first time since 1952 that an incumbent president or vice president will not be vying for the nation's highest office.

His decision comes as part of an early winnowing of the field of potential presidential contenders. Former Virginia governor Mark R. Warner (D) said recently that he will not run, and two potential GOP candidates, Sens. George Allen (Va.) and Rick Santorum (Pa.), were defeated in their reelection bids earlier this month.

Frist, a pioneering heart-lung-transplant surgeon, never voted until age 36 and had no previous political experience when he was elected to the Senate in an upset in 1994. At the time, he promised to serve no longer than two terms, a vow he fulfilled when he decided not to run for reelection this year.

"I said I'd come to the Senate with 20 years' experience in healing, spend 12 years serving in Washington, then go right back to Tennessee to live where I grew up," stated Frist, who was said by his staff to be unavailable for interviews. "I've never deviated from that commitment."

Frist's background as a surgeon, his frequent work in Washington health clinics and his repeated travels to Africa to care for needy patients seemed to give him an image that added an unusual dimension to his conservative politics.

"What facilitated his rapid rise among the ranks was the fact that he was and is a conservative but came across as a very common-sense, reasonable conservative," said Jim Dyke, a communications consultant who has worked for VOLPAC, Frist's political action committee. "People think differently about him than the trademark conservative."

But Frist began to lose some of that aura after a series of politically damaging events, including an on-going investigation by the Securities and Exchange Commission into allegations of insider trading in his sale of shares in HCA Inc., a hospital chain founded by his father and his brother. The sale was completed just weeks before the company issued an earnings estimate that fell short of analysts' expectations, causing a drop in HCA's stock price.

Frist has also faced questions about his role on the board of a charitable foundation that paid consulting fees to some of his close political allies.

Last year, Frist injected himself into the legislative drama over Terri Schiavo, the brain-damaged and bedridden Florida woman who died after her husband decided to have her feeding tube removed, despite congressional efforts to reverse his decision.

After viewing a videotape of the woman, Frist, a surgeon, publicly questioned the diagnosis that said Schiavo would never recover. That action was widely viewed as a sop to religious conservatives. An autopsy later proved Frist wrong.

Also, Frist has been drawn into caustic confrontations with Senate Democrats since being elevated to majority leader in 2002, reinforcing the view of him as an intense partisan. Although friends and colleagues say he never violated his principles, they note that the job of majority leader obscured what they say is Frist's true character. Moreover, he was politically weakened when Republicans lost control of both chambers of Congress in the midterm elections earlier this month.

"Being majority leader, you become defined more by the job than by who you are," Dyke said.

Frist was not specific about his future plans other than to say that he wants to return to Tennessee and "refocus my creative energies on innovative solutions to seemingly insurmountable challenges Americans face." In the short term, he said, he plans to resume his trips to impoverished corners of the world to "serve those in poverty, in famine and in civil war" as a doctor. He also said that he plans to advocate reforming the nation's health-care system.

"He is intellectually curious and has a lot of ideas that he wants to pursue, and that is hard to do if you are running for president," said Amy Call, a Frist spokeswoman. "He needed to reconnect with himself and his vision and ideas before going forward with a presidential race."

Frist's Exit Creates Void For Southern Republicans (WSJ)

By David Rogers

Wall Street Journal, November 30, 2006

Leaving a Republican void in the South, Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist announced he won't run for the White House in 2008 and plans to return to the medicine and health-care fields that helped launch his political career 12 years ago.

The Tennessee Republican said he wants a "sabbatical from public life," suggesting he could eventually return to politics. But in an interview with The Wall Street Journal, Mr. Frist said he first needs time to reconnect with himself before plunging into a presidential race so soon after leaving the Senate next month.

"It's a tough decision that I thought a lot about but in the final analysis, for right now, it doesn't feel right inside," he said. "There's that little bit of hesitation, and I'm afraid that hesitation will come across as a lack of passion."

For Republicans, Mr. Frist's departure underscores the absence of any major center-to-right Southern figure in the party's presidential field thus far. Virginia Sen. George Allen had been in position, but he lost his seat in November's elections. Among the remaining contenders, Arizona Sen. John McCain, Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney, and Rudolph Giuliani, the former New York City mayor, all are outsiders to the region and each could face problems reaching out to the Christian conservative voters who have been such a force behind President Bush.

Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee could try to fill the gap, and Newt Gingrich may emphasize his Georgia bona fides. "A candidate from the South brings a certain advantage," said Mr. Huckabee, who isn't expected to make any final decision until after leaving office in January. "For me it's a double benefit. I am from the South and a governor has an executive viewpoint compared to a senator with a legislative mindset."

In Florida, where the legislature is already talking about moving up the primary to give voters more say in picking presidential candidates, there is sure to be more speculation about the future of Gov. Jeb Bush, the president's brother.

"We all know small-state governors from the South can't win the presidency," joked Republican strategist Whit Ayres, who nonetheless cautioned about overstating the region's impact. But the idea of having no one in the field riles Southerners, who have long dominated Republican circles. "That won't cotton well down here," said David Hill, a Republican pollster from Texas. "Southerners will wake up one day and realize they don't have a horse in the race."

Having pledged to serve just two terms in the Senate, Mr. Frist, who was a heart surgeon before entering politics, planned to leave Washington this year and had begun building a presidential campaign structure in key states such as South Carolina, New Hampshire and Iowa. But after early successes in the Senate, he has taken a beating in the press in recent years, and at 54 years old, he seems to acknowledge he had lost some of his own identity.

"Starting fund raising for a presidential race in January really doesn't leave time to re-energize and be myself, a self stripped away a little by being majority leader," he said. "I really do need to re-energize in terms of who Bill Frist is."

Within the Senate, the man who could most gain from Mr. Frist's departure is Sen. Sam Brownback, a Kansas Republican with strong ties to social conservatives. But Mr. Brownback, who will soon make an announcement about his own presidential intentions, lacks the fund-raising ability of Mr. Frist and risks being more easily typecast as a product of the far right.

Mr. Frist's appeal, which he didn't always sustain, was as a more centrist figure. He is very much the product of two Southern families. His father, a more conservative Mississippi-born figure, rose to become a prominent Nashville doctor, while his more-liberal Methodist mother's intellectual curiosity had a lasting impact on her youngest son.

Instead of Iowa and New Hampshire this winter, Mr. Frist said he hopes to go back to medical missions in Africa, in which he spends several weeks at a time treating rural patients, sometimes with surgery. And though he has no firm plans in medicine yet, he said he hopes to pursue innovations in health insurance to try to address the lack of coverage for millions in the U.S.

"I really do think I would be the only person in the presidential campaign who would go to bed every night and get up in the morning worried about addressing health care," he said. "And from a global competitive standpoint, someone has to address it."

As a senator, his imprint on health-care policy has been significant. Mr. Frist was the Senate's single-biggest force behind the new Medicare prescription-drug benefit in 2003. With his active encouragement, Congress has nearly tripled U.S. funding since 2001 to fight the spread of infectious diseases overseas, including funds for AIDS and clean water, two Frist priorities. And as much as he irritated both sides in the debate over embryonic stem-cell research, he took some political risk by breaking with the White House and social conservatives to support a more aggressive approach to federal funding.

But in the four years as Senate majority leader, Mr. Frist never seemed to find his footing. He was both the youngest leader since Lyndon Johnson and one of the least prepared for the job. Even today, his restless intellect and awkward speaking style make him something of a mystery and frustration to his colleagues.

Early gains under Mr. Frist in the 2002 and 2004 elections were wiped away with the loss of the Senate this month. He has been hurt politically by his close association with the White House as well as HCA Inc., the Nashville hospital chain founded by his family and a source of much of his wealth.

After divesting himself of stock in the company in 2005, Mr. Frist found himself caught up in an SEC investigation of alleged insider trading. He has denied any wrongdoing and no charges have been brought against him by the SEC, but the investigation could have been fodder for opponents in a presidential campaign.

Even as he was testing the waters, Mr. Frist often appeared torn between public life and giving up medicine entirely. "I admire him enormously," said Mr. McCain, who amid all the sparring has maintained a personal relationship with Mr. Frist. "Anybody who flies to Africa in the summer and treats children is a wonderful person."

Sen. Frist Will Not Run For President In 2008 (HILL)

By Elana Schor

The Hill, November 30, 2006

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.), who will step down from his seat this month with an uneven record at the chamber's helm, announced Wednesday morning that he would forego a White House run to take a hiatus from politics.

Frist's decision comes as little surprise to Washington prognosticators who saw scant opportunities for Frist to overcome his lackluster showing in early straw polls.

"In the Bible, God tells us for everything there is a season, and my season of being an elected official has come to a close," Frist said in a statement released by his office. "I do not intend to run for president in 2008."

Frist ascended to the Senate's top-ranked post with the Bush administration's blessing in 2002, just two years into his second term, after then-majority leader Trent Lott (R-Miss.) became mired in controversy over a racially insensitive comment. Lott, who this month capped his political resurgence with a victory in the GOP whip race, acknowledged lingering resentment at Frist's move in his 2005 biography.

In his statement, Frist said he would adhere to his plan for two terms in the Senate followed by a return to his home state, where he will resume his medical practice and focus on humanitarian concerns through overseas medical missions.

"At this point a return to private life will allow me to return to my professional roots as a healer and to refocus my creative energies on creative solutions to seemingly insurmountable challenges Americans face," Frist said.

Frist's reign was marked by the tense standoff over the "nuclear option" to curb judicial filibusters as well as a focus on social issues highly prioritized by conservative groups, from lawmakers' intervention in the case of brain-damaged Floridian Terri Schiavo to contentious floor debates on banning gay-marriage and flag desecration. Frist had no experience as a committee chairman or appropriator before leading the Senate, causing some hiccups in his attempts to unite centrists and conservatives within the conference.

Despite his mixed success as majority leader, Frist leaves the Capitol with his seat safely in Republican hands. Sen.-elect Bob Corker (R-Tenn.), who lost a 1994 primary bid to Frist, staved off a strong challenge from Rep. Harold Ford Jr. (D-Tenn.) this month to become the only GOP victor among this cycle's contested Senate races.

Frist Will Not Seek Republican Presidential Nod (CQ)

By Rachel Kapochunas

Congressional Quarterly, November 30, 2006

Republican Sen. Bill Frist of Tennessee took his name out of the running for the 2008 presidential campaign, announcing Wednesday that he and his wife, Karyn, will be taking a “sabbatical from public life.”

The outgoing Senate majority leader’s decision comes after he received some blame for his party’s drubbing in this month’s midterm elections that saw Republicans lose six Senate seats, allowing Democrats to win a 51-seat majority — a feat once thought highly improbable.

“In the Bible, God tells us for everything there is a season, and for me, for now, this season of being an elected official has come to a close,” Frist said in a statement. “I do not intend to run for president in 2008.”

Frist's decision to retire this year after two terms, combined with successful fundraising for his Volunteer Political Action Committee, signaled to many that he was setting the stage for a presidential bid.

Frist had promised to serve only two terms when he was first elected to the Senate in 1994 and now says he plans to return to the medical profession where he worked as a transplant surgeon.

"I will resume my regular medical mission trips as a doctor around the world to serve those in poverty, in famine, and in civil war," said Frist, who added he will continue to advocate for overhauling health care as well as securing clean water and public health internationally.

Frist's medical background put him in a controversial position during the congressional intervention into the case of Terri Schiavo, a Florida woman whose parents were challenging her husband's wish to have her feeding tube removed because Schiavo was in a persistent vegetative state. Frist reviewed videotape and read court affidavits that led him to conclude Schiavo's diagnosis may not have been correct.

Schiavo died despite congressional intervention, but Frist's involvement earned him praise from conservative groups while others in the medical community questioned his actions.

While Frist has generally backed the Republican Party's conservative tenets, his leadership in the Senate has drawn harsh criticism from some quarters. In 2005, his plan to change Senate rules to stop Democratic filibusters of judicial nominees fell apart after the bipartisan "Gang of 14" thwarted his efforts.

House Republicans were infuriated in early 2003 when he moved forward with tax cut legislation that was not nearly as robust as conservatives had hoped.

Frist's Senate seat will be filled by Republican former Chattanooga City mayor Bob Corker, who bested Democratic Rep. Harold E. Ford Jr. of the Memphis-area 9th District.

Frist's announcement was not expected despite the fact he has been ranking below other contenders in national polls.

Quinnipiac University conducted its latest "thermometer reading" of national leaders the week following the Nov. 7 election. In that survey, Frist was ranked near the bottom of a list of 20 national figures, some with reported presidential aspirations: Republican former New York City mayor Rudolph Giuliani led the poll, followed by Democratic Sen. Barack Obama of Illinois and Republican Sen. John McCain of Arizona.

Frist Announces He'll Forgo A Run For The White House (NYT)

By Kate Zernike

The New York Times, November 29, 2006

Bill Frist of Tennessee, retiring from the Senate as majority leader, said Wednesday that he would not run for president in 2008.

Mr. Frist, a second-term Republican who had long been considering a race for the White House, said he would instead take a "sabbatical" from politics and focus on work related to health care.

"In the Bible," he said in a statement from Nashville, "God tells us for everything there is a season, and for me, for now, this season of being an elected official has come to a close."

Mr. Frist had acknowledged that any campaign for the presidency would be uphill. But his party's loss of the Senate majority in the elections this month, on his watch, would have made it all the more difficult.

The senator alienated some moderate voters last year with his push for federal intervention to maintain life support on Terri Schiavo, a brain-damaged Florida woman. A heart-lung transplant surgeon before he ran for the Senate, Mr. Frist said he had viewed a videotape of Ms. Schiavo and believed that she had not suffered irreversible damage, contrary to what her doctors and husband believed and to what tests later confirmed.

But Mr. Frist had also created problems for himself on the right, considered his natural constituency, with his support for legislation expanding federal financing of embryonic stem cell research, a measure that President Bush vetoed this summer.

Aides said Mr. Frist had relished the idea of running from behind. (He won his Senate seat 12 years ago in a long-shot race against Jim Sasser, a Democrat who himself had been in line to be majority leader.) But in the end, they said, he decided that he simply did not have the fire to run.

"He in his heart knew that if he did this he'd have to spend a year and a half on a campaign," said Amy Call, a spokeswoman for the senator. "He wanted to get back to something more basic."

Mr. Frist leapt to the leader's role with the help of the White House in 2002 when Senator Trent Lott of Mississippi resigned from the post under pressure after making racially charged remarks. He had known all along, associates said, that it would be hard to run for president from the Senate, and particularly from the leadership.

"It didn't work for Bob Dole, it didn't work for Howard Baker as minority leader," said Bob Stevenson, a former longtime aide to Mr. Frist. "It's very difficult to let yourself shine through, because you're leading other members of your party."

Mr. Frist said in his statement that he would "return to my professional roots as a healer" and "refocus my creative energies on innovative solutions to seemingly insurmountable challenges Americans face."

"In the short term," he said, "I will resume my regular medical mission trips as a doctor around the world to serve those in poverty, in famine and in civil war. I will continue to be a strong voice to fix what is broken in our health care system and to address the issues of clean water and public health globally."

Though Democrats successfully campaigned this year on complaints that this had been a "do-nothing Congress," Mr. Frist's staff and supporters pushed back Wednesday against the idea that he had not been an effective majority leader. They issued a "fact sheet" that included a list of his accomplishments, among them legislation on energy, highway spending and bankruptcy and class-action reform, as well as the confirmation of two Supreme Court appointees.

"I think the leader gets high marks," said Senator Mitch McConnell of Kentucky, who has been Mr. Frist's No. 2 and will succeed him as Republican leader when the 110th Congress convenes in January.

If Mr. Frist's withdrawal has any effect on the race for the Republican presidential nomination, it is likely to be to clear more room for other candidates to run to the right. On Wednesday, he was praised by a leading Republican candidate, Senator John McCain of Arizona, who saluted his medical work in Africa "to improve the lives of those in poverty."

"We are lucky to have had Dr. Frist," Mr. McCain said, "as a principled leader, a true humanitarian and a respected colleague who worked every day to advance the causes most important to our nation."

GOP Plans Straw Poll Convention In Fla. (SPT)

By ADAM C. SMITH

St. Petersburg Times, November 30, 2006

MIAMI – Tired of playing second fiddle to the likes of Iowa and New Hampshire in picking presidential nominees,

Florida Republicans are positioning the Sunshine state to play a potentially huge role in the 2008 presidential race.

Not only are state legislative leaders working on moving Florida's primary to be one of the earliest in the country, but the state GOP is planning a straw vote convention for October 2007.

If the plan moves forward, next year the state would be crawling with Republican presidential contenders wooing 3,500 party activists in hopes of getting a big, early shot of momentum from America's biggest battleground state.

The state GOP has already blocked hundreds of rooms in Orlando for the non-binding "Presidency IV" gathering Oct. 17-20, hired a consultant to organize it, and briefed potential presidential candidates about an event that could cost the campaigns hundreds of thousands of dollars to organize for a strong showing.

"I'd certainly be comfortable with it,'' Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee, one of several potential Republican contenders for president, said Wednesday of the prospective early Florida popularity contest.

"Florida's a great state. It would be a great bellwether state, representative in many ways of a lot of different cultures and views from around the country.''

The nation watched as Florida Republicans held straw polls before the competitive 1980, 1988 and 1996 presidential primaries and Democrats held one in before the 1992 race.

In each unpredictable contest, delegates picked the country's eventual nominee – Ronald Reagan, George Bush, Bob Dole, and Bill Clinton, who credited the Florida contest with playing a crucial role in his winning the nomination.

The results are officially meaningless, but they play a big role in the crucial expectations game – who does surprisingly well or unexpectedly poorly — and campaigns work feverishly to win over delegates.

But frontrunners don't necessarily relish such events, because they have the most to lose.

So Republicans are closely watching how Governor-elect Charlie Crist handles the "Presidency IV" idea. While Crist has not endorsed anyone, he is widely seen as an ally of Sen.

John McCain, the presumed GOP frontrunner for 2008 and the only presidential prospect who endorsed Crist during his gubernatorial primary.

Crist did not respond to requests for comment Wednesday, and a spokeswoman said only that at this point, he's not focused on presidential politics.

Florida Democrats aren't talking about a straw vote for the Democratic primary, but the GOP event would be even more influential than past straw polls if the Florida primary moves from March to January or February.

That move has bipartisan support in Tallahassee, though the national parties bar most states from holding primaries before the first week of February.

DOJ_NMG_0100168

Florida could lose some delegates at their national convention if they buck the national parties, but the state still could be the first huge primary prize on the calendar – delivering more delegates than Iowa, New Hampshire and South Carolina combined.

Republican state House Speaker Marco Rubio has spearheaded the push for an early primary, and a spokeswoman for Senate President Ken Pruitt said he's on board too.

"Sen. Pruitt understands this is a priority of Speaker Rubio,'' spokeswoman Kathy Mears said of an early primary.

"He is very receptive to the idea and wants to be of assistance, and he believes this would be a good change for Florida."

As for the "Presidency IV" straw poll a state GOP spokesman Jeff Sadosky said no final decision has been made but the party has been working to lay the groundwork.

Critics say non-binding straw polls eat up vast energy and resources for what amounts to little more than a pointless popularity contest.

But supporters say they energize party faithful and also help raise big money. In 1996, candidates ponied up $100,000 to the state GOP for the privilege of participating in "Presidency III."

Republican consultant Sally Bradshaw of Tallahassee who has worked on prior straw polls in Florida and is working with the political action committee of Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney, said such events can help parties recruit grass roots volunteers and help parties start organizing early.

Famed Pastor Defends Invitation To Obama (AP)

By Nedra Pickler

AP, November 30, 2006

Famed pastor and best-selling author Rick Warren on Wednesday defended his invitation to Sen. Barack Obama to speak at his church despite objections from some evangelicals who oppose the Democrat's support for abortion rights.

Obama is one of nearly 60 speakers scheduled to address the second annual Global Summit on AIDS and the Church beginning Thursday at Warren's Saddleback Church in Lake Forest, Calif.

Obama, who is mulling a run for president, plans to take an HIV test during his appearance Friday and encourage others to do the same. The Illinois Democrat will be joined by a potential 2008 White House rival — Republican Sen. Sam Brownback of Kansas — and is urging unity to fight AIDS despite differences on other issues.

Conservative evangelical Rob Schenck, president of the National Clergy Council, e-mailed reporters Tuesday to protest the visit because of Obama's support of abortion rights. "Senator Obama's policies represent the antithesis of biblical ethics and morality, not to mention supreme American values," Schenck wrote.

Saddleback responded with a statement acknowledging "strong opposition" to Obama's participation. The church said participants were invited because of their knowledge of HIV/AIDS and that Warren, author of "The Purpose Driven Life," opposes Obama's position on abortion and other issues.

"Our goal has been to put people together who normally won't even speak to each other," the Saddleback statement said. "We do not expect all participants in the summit discussion to agree with all of our evangelical beliefs. However, the HIV/AIDS pandemic cannot be fought by evangelicals alone. It will take the cooperation of all — government, business, NGOs and the church."

Obama declined an interview request. But in a statement, he said while he respects differing views on abortion, he hopes for unity "to honor the entirety of Christ's teachings by working to eradicate the scourge of AIDS, poverty and other challenges we all can agree must be met.

"It is that spirit which has allowed me to work together — and pray together — with some of my conservative colleagues in the Senate to make progress on a range of key issues facing America," Obama's said.

Brownback, who has close ties to conservative Christians, responded to the dispute with a statement also calling for unity. "To win the fight against AIDS we must each set aside our differences and join together as human beings from all political, religious, and nonreligious walks of life, fighting for the lives of people who are suffering and dying," he said.

Though still in his first term in the Senate, Obama has attracted national attention for his fresh face, commanding speaking style and compelling personal story. He also has encouraged liberals to engage in religious discourse and not leave the topic to conservatives to claim as their own.

While in California, Obama also plans a Friday night appearance on "The Tonight Show with Jay Leno" to promote his best-selling book, "The Audacity of Hope."

As part of his consideration for a presidential run, Obama will make his first political visit to New Hampshire on Dec. 10 for a celebration of the state Democratic Party's victories in the congressional, gubernatorial and legislative races.

Obama has traveled to Iowa, site of the leadoff presidential caucuses, but New Hampshire hasn't been on his itinerary.

DOJ_NMG_0100169

The race for the 2008 Democratic nomination is considered wide open, and at least a dozen potential contenders are weighing formal bids, including front-runner Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York.

Church Is Urged To Disinvite Obama (WP)

By Alan Cooperman

The Washington Post, November 30, 2006

Antiabortion groups are assailing one of the nation's most influential evangelicals, the Rev. Rick Warren, for inviting Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.) to speak at a conference on HIV/AIDS at his Southern California megachurch this weekend.

In a statement, 18 antiabortion leaders called on Warren to rescind the invitation because Obama supports keeping abortion legal.

"You cannot fight one evil while justifying another," says the appeal, whose signers include Phyllis Schlafly of the Eagle Forum, Judie Brown of the American Life League and Tim Wildmon of the American Family Association.

Warren, author of the bestseller "The Purpose Driven Life," responded yesterday by asserting that he and his wife, Kay, are "staunchly pro-life" and "completely disagree" with Obama's position in favor of abortion rights.

Obama was one of 60 speakers invited to "share his views on AIDS, not abortion or any other issue," the Warrens said in a statement issued by their Saddleback Valley Community Church. They added that Obama and Sen. Sam Brownback (R-Kan.) will "present two different political perspectives" at the weekend "Summit on AIDS and the Church."

"Our goal has been to put people together who normally won't even speak to each other," the Warrens' statement said. "We do not expect all participants in the Summit discussion to agree with all of our Evangelical beliefs. However, the HIV/AIDS pandemic cannot be fought by Evangelicals alone. It will take the cooperation of all -- government, business, NGOs and the church."

A spokesman for Obama said he has no intention of withdrawing from the conference, where he is expected to take a public HIV test.

"While we will never see eye-to-eye on all issues, surely we can come together with one voice to honor the entirety of Christ's teachings by working to eradicate the scourge of AIDS, poverty and other challenges we all can agree must be met," a statement from the senator said.

Christian Conservatives Vs. AIDS (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, November 30, 2006

OF ALL THE international forums and events to mark World AIDS Day on Friday, what may be the biggest will happen in an unlikely place: little Lake Forest, Calif., just north of Mission Viejo. Its coming signals a shift in political momentum as AIDS awareness is promoted not just by Hollywood celebrities and gay activists but by conservative evangelical Christians.

The Rev. Rick Warren and his wife, Kay, will host their second annual summit on AIDS starting today. Warren, author of the bestselling book "The Purpose-Driven Life," is among the most influential evangelical leaders in the United States, and his summit will attract such politically diverse figures as Sens. Barack Obama (D-Ill.) and Sam Brownback (R-Kan.).

The focus on AIDS by evangelicals isn't new, but Warren is taking it to a new level. Though churches were initially and inexcusably silent on AIDS, attitudes began to shift as AIDS declined in the United States while growing in Africa. Pressure from his Christian base may have been a factor in President Bush's 2003 decision to start an initiative against AIDS, devoting $15 billion over five years to fight the disease. Now, Warren aims to increase church involvement.

All this religious intervention in the traditional province of doctors and scientists hasn't been entirely positive. Bush's anti-AIDS money comes with morality-based strings attached that infuriate secular health advocates. The most self-defeating is a directive forcing recipients to sign a statement that they will not use the money to aid any group that "does not have a policy explicitly opposing prostitution and sex trafficking."

This pledge has little practical effect; it doesn't prevent those who agree to it from treating sex workers for AIDS. But many potential recipients fear that it will, so they either stop working with prostitutes or decline U.S. funds.

About 7% of the AIDS initiative money, meanwhile, must be spent on abstinence programs. Though these programs may help lower AIDS rates, it's questionable whether they're more effective than other prevention methods such as distributing condoms. At any rate, U.S. bureaucrats should consider regional health needs before politics when setting funding formulas.

Yet these troublesome policy issues are also relatively minor. Bush and his Christian supporters seldom get the credit they deserve for their role in the global fight against AIDS. U.S. spending on the disease overseas has risen more than tenfold under

Bush, while Christian groups have given unselfishly to the cause. Churches, in fact, run health clinics in much of rural Africa; without them, stemming AIDS would be all but impossible. So praise the Lord and pass the antiretrovirals.

More Muslims Gaining Political Ground (WP)

By Michelle Boorstein

The Washington Post, November 30, 2006

Since Gaithersburg software engineer Saqib Ali was elected to the Maryland House of Delegates this month, he has been flooded with calls and e-mails from across the country asking: How'd you do it?

The calls come from American Muslims like Ali, who, longtime political watchers and Muslim activists in the area say, is the first Muslim elected to a statewide -- or districtwide -- office in Maryland, Virginia or the District.

Although the 31-year-old made little of his faith during the campaign -- in fact, he bucked those who said he should put it on his campaign literature -- he is part of a concerted march of Muslims into civic and political life. His campaign was part of a push that began after Sept. 11, 2001, with worries about civil liberties and immigration policy and has blossomed this year.

Minnesota Democrat Keith Ellison became the first Muslim to be elected to Congress. In the D.C. area, eight Muslims ran for office in Maryland this year, significantly more than in previous years, although only Ali won. And initial polling data and anecdotal evidence suggest that significantly more Muslims in Virginia registered and voted this month than in previous elections.

According to data gathered by the Muslim American Society and the Virginia Muslim Political Action Committee, the number of Virginia Muslims who voted was up 13 percent from 2005. The vast majority of the estimated 51,000 Muslims who cast ballots in Virginia voted for Democrats.

There are no statistics from previous years on Muslim voters in Maryland, but according to a post-election poll done by the Muslim American Society and the Virginia Muslim Political Action Committee, there are about 50,000 Muslim voters in Maryland, three-quarters of whom voted Nov. 7. A large majority voted for Democrats, the groups' data show. The Virginia Muslim PAC is gathering voting data throughout the country.

Data collection on U.S. Muslims is relatively new and imprecise, and even estimates of the community's size range from 1 million to 7 million. However, the available data mirror what activists and scholars of U.S. Islam say is indicated in anecdotal evidence: Muslims are quickly moving into the public sphere.

"It's very obvious that there is more involvement," said Zahid H. Bukhari, director of Georgetown University's Project MAPS, a long-term research project on American Muslims that estimates there are 1.5 million to 2 million registered American Muslim voters. "More Muslims are running for office; Islamic centers are becoming more of community centers; everybody is much more involved," Bukhari said.

Ali, whose parents were born in India and Pakistan, said he comes "from a family where they were always having political debates around the house, but then I found out that among all these family members who had all these grand ideas, none of them ever voted. There was a sense that, 'I don't like the way things are, but there's nothing I can do about it.' I thought: I'm going to show these people."

Starting in January, Ali will represent District 39, a horseshoe-shaped swath of land in Montgomery County. The area has a growing community of newly arrived South Asians and Latinos, and Ali said he focused on courting immigrants during his campaign in part because he thought they might not have voted before. He supports driver's licenses for residents regardless of their immigration status and in-state tuition for people who graduate from Maryland high schools; he opposes provisions of the federal Patriot Act.

"His pro-immigrant priorities completely jumped off the map for us," said Kim Propeack, advocacy director at CASA of Maryland, an immigrant rights group. "When I met him, I told him how happy I was to see someone with an unabashedly pro-immigrant attitude."

Ali did not talk much about his faith, however, which bothered some Muslims and non-Muslims, he said.

"I'm not hiding anything, but it didn't seem relevant. It doesn't make sense; no one advertises their church," he said.

In fact, candidates for public office often make faith part of their political identities. Maryland candidates Michael S. Steele, Douglas M. Duncan and Benjamin L. Cardin all spoke about their religious beliefs during their campaigns.

But running as a Muslim has its challenges. A Montgomery man was given a police warning during the campaign after he sat outside Ali's home with a sign saying "Islam sucks."

Amaney Jamal, a Princeton University political scientist who is working with the Pew Research Center on a survey of American Muslims, said that although civic engagement has been increasing, there has been a shift in focus from influencing Middle East policy to strengthening domestic institutions.

Muslim donors gave approximately $200,000 to Virginia candidates, up from $40,000 in 2002, said Mukit Hossain, director of the Virginia Muslim Political Action Committee.

Attendance at Muslim-oriented political events was also up, activists said. More than 600 people attended the Virginia Muslim Civic Picnic this summer, an event held for state candidates that has grown since it began in 2001. About 1,300 people attended a candidates' night a few weeks before the election at Falls Church mosque Dar Al Hijrah, Hossain said.

And last December, the Maryland Muslim Council formed to help field and promote candidates, among other things. Since the election, Hossain said, he has received phone calls from Richmond, Harrisonburg and Fredericksburg, as well as from other states where Muslims want to know how to form local political action committees.

"In this election, we saw a level of mobilization and engagement of Muslims that has never happened before," said Ibrahim Ramey, director of the Muslim American Society's human and civil rights division, at a news conference after the Nov. 7 election.

Activists at the news conference said they were celebrating the high turnout and the fact that Muslims apparently influenced a key election with national implications: James Webb's successful Democratic bid for the U.S. Senate seat from Virginia. The partisan leanings also were clear from the Webb lapel pin that Hossain wore.

Now that Muslims are starting to figure out how to turn out their vote, the horizon is becoming more complex. Heated debates are beginning over how prominent a role mosques will play in organizing people, whether Muslims will focus on civil liberties to the exclusion of social and economic issues, and whether they will remain a Democratic bloc, as they have since 2004.

"I don't want us to become overly dogmatic and introverted or to become a ghetto, as has happened in European countries," Hossain said. "I think the Muslim community can do a great job of bringing focus to social issues, whether they belong to the Muslim community or not. I hope, as we mature, we become a progressive force for other issues, not just civil liberties."

Since Ali won his race, he has been busy answering those requests for advice. "What I tell them is, know your community well, work hard and don't be a one-issue candidate," he said. "And don't let anyone paint you as 'the Muslim candidate.' "

Honey, I Shrunk The GOP (WSJ)

By Vincent J. Cannato

The Wall Street Journal, November 30, 2006

ALBANY, N.Y. -- The recent midterm election was bad news for Republicans, but it was even worse for New York Republicans. The GOP lost all three statewide offices by wide margins; its gubernatorial candidate did not even break 30%. Its sacrificial lamb for Senate did only slightly better, and representation in the state's 29-seat congressional delegation fell from nine to six seats. The most prominent state Republican is New York Mayor Michael Bloomberg, a former Democrat who, shall we say, wears his party affiliation lightly.

What a contrast with 1994, when George Pataki, a little-known Republican legislator, defeated three-term incumbent Gov. Mario Cuomo, one of the nation's leading liberal voices. Mr. Pataki, a social moderate and a fiscal conservative, rode into office on that year's Republican wave.

New York City's first Republican mayor in 30 years, Rudolph Giuliani, had strangely endorsed and campaigned for Mr. Cuomo. At the time, the move looked like political suicide. It is 12 years later and both Messrs. Giuliani and Pataki are making noises about running for president. Given the events of 1994, it is hard to believe that Mr. Giuliani is leading in some polls for the Republican nomination, while Mr. Pataki's ambitions are stuck in the low single digits.

What happened? In many ways, the open pit in Lower Manhattan is a depressing symbol of the Pataki years: That five years after 9/11 Ground Zero is still unbuilt is a sad testament to the political paralysis currently afflicting New York. This inability to provide leadership was coupled with an inability to change fundamentally the way business is done in Albany, reform the state's political culture and revive its economy. Mr. Pataki's tenure has too often been marked by a sleepy indifference to public policy and governance. And that has cost Republicans dearly.

Early in his first term, Mr. Pataki did cut income taxes and institute spending control. But as time passed, so did fiscal discipline. Today, the state's fiscal health and its overall economy are not much better than when Mario Cuomo left office. Spending has nearly doubled in the Pataki years, well above the rate of inflation. To support that spending, New York has the highest state and local tax burden of any state in the nation.

This has done little to spur economic growth. Since 1990 New York has consistently lagged behind the rest of the country in job creation. In the last 10 years, it ranked 41st among states in private-sector job growth. It still has not gained back all of the jobs it lost in the 2001 recession.

With high taxes and weak job prospects, the state's population is only barely growing. While New York City and its suburbs are muddling through, upstate New York is really being affected. Since 1990, a weak upstate economy has meant a decline of more than 25% in the population of 25- to 34-year-olds, as young, educated people flee for the South and West.

New York is now the nation's third largest state and is destined to fall to fourth soon as Florida's population continues to boom. While New York's population grew by 5.5% in the 1990s, Florida's increased by a whopping 23.5%, a trend that has kept pace in the last five years. If demography is destiny, New York will continue to see its political influence wane on the national scene. It has already lost almost a quarter of its congressional seats to reapportionment since 1980.

Mr. Pataki and Albany Republicans have been powerless to do anything about this. Though the governor's school tax relief program has helped reduce the property tax burden for some, it has failed to rein in local school spending, and overall property tax rates continue to climb. Meanwhile, Mr. Pataki's blatant attempt in his 2002 campaign to win the endorsement of Dennis Rivera -- the head of the leftward health-care workers union -- will cost New York taxpayers for years to come.

None of this amounts to fiscal conservatism and Mr. Pataki will have a difficult time explaining his record to Republican presidential primary voters if he chooses to run. His odds of becoming the fifth New Yorker to make it to the White House are very long indeed.

The New York Republican Party is at its lowest point in decades. The title of a new book by Conservative Party stalwart and former Pataki appointee George Marlin says it all: "Squandered Opportunities." The phrase aptly sums up not only the Pataki years, but also the fortunes of Republicans in Washington, for whom Mr. Pataki's governorship provides useful lessons.

Though the Iraq war and President Bush's low approval ratings helped drag down the party, there was something deeper going on. Republicans grew too comfortable with power and in so doing often forgot why they were elected in the first place. What happens when a party, whose central philosophical principle is that of limited government and the attendant preference for the free market over state bureaucracy, takes the reins of power? Unfortunately, we now have a good idea what the answer is. With few exceptions, we have gotten bigger government and more spending, and few reforms of already existing programs.

This kind of dissonance between the ideological beliefs of the Republicans and the way they govern has been a big reason for the morass in which the GOP now finds itself. If Republicans hope to succeed in New York and elsewhere, they need to figure out what a governing conservatism should look like.

They are either going to have to find a way to make their rhetoric match their actions or they are going to have to retool their ideological message. The party's future political success will depend on how its members reconcile their attitudes toward government with their desire to stay in office.

Mr. Cannato, a professor of history at the University of Massachusetts, Boston, is author of "The Ungovernable City: John Lindsay and his Struggle to Save New York" (Basic, 2001).

Waiting To Be Wooed (NYT)

By David Brooks

The New York Times, November 30, 2006

I've never been a swing voter before. For most of my adult life I've felt the Republicans tended to have the best approaches to expand economic opportunity, meet foreign threats and restore a culture of personal responsibility. But over the past few years I've grown estranged from many Republicans, especially the ones leading the House. I'm one of those suburbanites who thought the G.O.P. deserved to lose the last election, and now I find myself floating out there in independent-land, not a Democrat, just looking for something new.

It's like being the belle of the ball, because the Republicans really need to woo back people like me. I hope they won't mind if I offer a little advice on how to do it.

First, don't listen to your consultants. Over the next few months, pollsters are going to pick out the key demographic groups (left-handed Catholic orthopedists) and offer advice on how to kiss up to those people. Majorities are never built that way. You end up proposing inconsequential micropolicies and selling your soul.

Don't focus on groups, focus on problems. If you have persuasive proposals to address big problems, the majority coalition will build itself.

Second, be policy-centric, not philosophy-centric. American conservatism grew up out of power and has always placed great emphasis on doctrine. Today, in the wake of this month's defeat, Republicans are firing up the old debate among social conservatives, free-market conservatives and others about the proper role of the state. This stale, abstract debate will never lead anywhere and only inhibits creative thinking.

The Republican weakness is not a lack of grand principles, it's a lack of concrete policies commensurate with the size of 21st-century problems. If they would shelve the doctrinal debate for a second, Republicans — while not doing violence to their belief in the market, traditional values or anything else — could find plenty of policy ideas to deal with China and India, the entitlement crisis and so on.

Third, create a Republican Leadership Council. In the realm of ideas, Democrats own the center. Moderate Democrats have the Democratic Leadership Council, the Third Way and various cells within the Brookings Institution, such as the Hamilton

Project. Republican moderates are intellectual weaklings. They have no independent identity, so it's no wonder centrist voters prefer Democrats on one domestic issue after another.

Fourth, support stem cell research. This has become a symbolic issue denoting fundamental attitudes about science and progress. Moderates can understand why somebody is anti-abortion. But opposing stem cell work seems to close off research that could alleviate human suffering for the sake of a theoretical abstraction.

Fifth, support free trade, while responding to the downside of globalization. When the industrial age kicked in, many European nations built an elaborate welfare state, but didn't aggressively expand educational opportunity. Americans didn't build as big a welfare system, but, as the blogger Reihan Salam pointed out recently, we spent a lot on schools to foster social mobility.

The American way is to help people compete, not shield them from competition. Today that means nurturing stable families in which children can develop the social and cultural capital they need to thrive. (A significant expansion of the child tax credit would ease the burden on young parents.) It means publicly funded, though not necessarily publicly run, preschool programs in which children from disorganized homes can learn how to learn. It means radical school reform: performance pay for teachers, an end to the stupid certification rules, urban boarding schools where educators can set up local cultures of achievement, locally run neighborhood child centers to service an array of health and day-care needs.

Sixth, spread assets. Every citizen, from birth, should have an I.R.A.-type savings account. The tax code should encourage personal and employer contributions. These accounts would enhance savings and encourage an investor mentality, and once Americans became comfortable with them, they could be used as tools to reform Social Security and health care funding.

Seventh, raise taxes on carbon emissions and use the revenue to make the tax cuts on capital gains and dividends permanent. This would spur energy innovation and encourage investment more generally.

Over the past few years, the G.O.P. has become like a company with a great mission statement, but no domestic policy products to sell. Now's the time to get granular. And the thing to remember is, we disaffected voters are easy. We want to go home with you if you'll give us a reason.

A Veteran Moderate Moves On (WP)

By David S. Broder

The Washington Post, November 30, 2006

The House of Representatives wastes no sympathy on defeated members. So at the beginning of this week, Jim Leach of Iowa sat in an office almost devoid of furniture, the walls stripped bare of the mementos of his 30 years of service -- with just a few hours remaining before the painters moved in to prepare his domain for its new occupant.

Leach, who once was chairman of the Banking and Financial Services Committee, would have been in line to head the Committee on International Relations in the next Congress, had Republicans maintained their majority and had he been reelected.

But he lost, 51 percent to 48 percent, to college professor David Loebsack, as Democrats won top-to-bottom victories in Iowa this month.

Leach, noted for his independence, was the only Iowa legislator to oppose going to war in Iraq. That kind of record helped him prevail in past races despite his heavily Democratic district, which gave a higher percentage of its presidential vote to John Kerry than any other district held by a Republican.

But this year two special factors helped tip the balance against him. First, he became a target for crafting the Unlawful Internet Gambling Enforcement Act, which passed Congress as part of a larger bill in October and was signed into law just before the election.

The Poker Players Alliance, which had fought the measure banning banks and credit card companies from servicing Internet gambling firms, targeted Leach and other sponsors with e-mails to its members and publicity in poker magazines. A post-election survey paid for by the gambling group found a net 5-point swing against Leach attributable to that issue.

John Pappas, the spokesman for the alliance, said it is putting together a presentation for the new members of Congress using Leach's experience to show that "this issue is not a winner for them; in fact, the main proponent was hurt by it." The alliance wants poker exempted from the Internet gambling ban or the ban lifted in favor of government regulation and taxation.

In addition, the Christian Coalition criticized Leach for his support of embryonic stem cell research and for his insistence that the national GOP drop a planned mailing attacking Loebsack on the issue of gay marriage.

"But the big force," Leach said in a conversation in his nearly empty office, "was the accountability thing -- the overwhelming dissatisfaction with the Republican Congress."

Because he can understand and even sympathize a bit with that feeling, Leach said, "I am probably the least disappointed defeated member" of the vanished Republican majority.

On the other hand, the man who was known as "the conscience of Congress" because of his personal high standards -- no PAC money or out-of-state contributions -- said he regrets not being part of the policymaking at "a really critical moment for the United States in its relations with a changing world."

And he worries about the political dynamics of a Congress that is more and more polarized -- and therefore less and less representative of the American mainstream.

Leach was one of eight members of the dwindling tribe of Republican moderates who lost their seats this election, unable to separate themselves from the public rejection of a conservative-dominated White House and Congress.

In Leach's view, while presidential races tend to pull candidates to the center, in Congress the abundance of "safe" seats, gerrymandered to guarantee victory to one party or the other, makes party primaries the critical elections. And in those low-turnout primaries, it is the activists -- usually no more than "one-quarter of one-third" of the electorate -- whose views prevail.

"The Republicans have been governing from within" their party base, rather than reaching out to the other party, he said, and now that Democrats have the majority, they will be tempted by electoral dynamics to do the same thing.

It is possible, Leach said, that a new president could change the pattern, and he is rather hopeful that his early picks for the nominations -- Mitt Romney and Barack Obama -- might do that.

Meanwhile, he is weighing academic offers from his alma mater, Princeton, and other schools and a possible diplomatic post from the State Department.

But given what he has seen on Capitol Hill in his 30 years, it is possible to believe Leach when he says, "I feel kind of relieved" to be moving on.

Already Too Busy For Civility (WP)

By George F. Will

The Washington Post, November 30, 2006

That was certainly swift. Washington has a way of quickly acculturating people, especially those who are most susceptible to derangement by the derivative dignity of office. But Jim Webb, Democratic senator-elect from Virginia, has become a pompous poseur and an abuser of the English language before actually becoming a senator.

Wednesday's Post reported that at a White House reception for newly elected members of Congress, Webb "tried to avoid President Bush," refusing to pass through the reception line or have his picture taken with the president. When Bush asked Webb, whose son is a Marine in Iraq, "How's your boy?" Webb replied, "I'd like to get them [sic] out of Iraq." When the president again asked "How's your boy?" Webb replied, "That's between me and my boy." Webb told The Post:

"I'm not particularly interested in having a picture of me and George W. Bush on my wall. No offense to the institution of the presidency, and I'm certainly looking forward to working with him and his administration. [But] leaders do some symbolic things to try to convey who they are and what the message is."

Webb certainly has conveyed what he is: a boor. Never mind the patent disrespect for the presidency. Webb's more gross offense was calculated rudeness toward another human being -- one who, disregarding many hard things Webb had said about him during the campaign, asked a civil and caring question, as one parent to another. When -- if ever -- Webb grows weary of admiring his new grandeur as a "leader" who carefully calibrates the "symbolic things" he does to convey messages, he might consider this: In a republic, people decline to be led by leaders who are insufferably full of themselves.

Even before his studied truculence in response to the president's hospitality, Webb was going out of his way to make waves. A week after the election, he published a column in the Wall Street Journal that began this way:

"The most important -- and unfortunately the least debated -- issue in politics today is our society's steady drift toward a class-based system, the likes of which we have not seen since the 19th century. America's top tier has grown infinitely richer and more removed over the past 25 years. It is not unfair to say that they are literally living in a different country."

Well.

In his novels and his political commentary, Webb has been a writer of genuine distinction, using language with care and precision. But just days after winning an election, he was turning out slapdash prose that would be rejected by a reasonably demanding high school teacher.

Never mind Webb's careless and absurd assertion that the nation's incessantly discussed wealth gap is "the least debated" issue in American politics.

And never mind his use of the word "literally," although even with private schools and a large share of the nation's wealth, the "top tier" -- whatever cohort he intends to denote by that phrase; he is suddenly too inflamed by social injustice to tarry over the task of defining his terms -- does not "literally" live in another country.

And never mind the cavalier historical judgments -- although is he sure that America is less egalitarian today than it was, say, 50 years ago, when only about 7 percent of American adults had college degrees? (Twenty-eight percent do today.) Or 80 years ago, when more than 80 percent of American adults did not have high school diplomas (85 percent have them today), and only about 46 percent owned their own homes, compared with 69 percent today?

But notice, in the second sentence of Webb's column, the word "infinitely." Earth to Webb: Words have meanings that not even senators can alter. And he has been elected to be a senator, not Humpty Dumpty in "Through the Looking Glass." ("When I use a word it means just what I choose it to mean -- neither more nor less.") America's national economic statistics are excellent; Webb could actually tell us how much richer the "top tier" has become, relative to other cohorts, over a particular span. But that would require him to actually say whom he is talking about, and that takes time and effort, and senators -- Webb is a natural -- often are too busy for accuracy.

Based on Webb's behavior before being sworn in, one shudders to think what he will be like after that. He already has become what Washington did not need another of, a subtraction from the city's civility and clear speaking.

Abortion Foes Look To The Big Screen (WP)

By Robert D. Novak

The Washington Post, November 30, 2006

An invited audience that included Commerce Secretary Carlos Gutierrez gathered at National Geographic Society's auditorium Monday night for a screening of "Bella," an independently produced feature film. No mere movie, it offers hope for the beleaguered antiabortion movement to reverse the political tide running against it.

This was the eighth such screening in Washington. Monday night's audience reflected the reaction in more than 100 showings nationwide: an emotional experience for a stunning exhibition of cinema art that unexpectedly won a Toronto International Film Festival award. It is no propaganda film but a dramatic depiction of choices facing an unmarried pregnant woman.

"Bella," unknown to the general public, has generated excitement and anticipation in conservative Catholic and other antiabortion circles. The problem is getting the film in theaters around the country for its public premiere early next April. That is never easy for an independent film with no box-office names, but the problems are magnified when its message runs counter to the social mores of Hollywood.

"Bella" arrives in an environment that has grown bleak for enemies of abortion. The Democratic Party has become so much the party of abortion rights that, of 41 freshmen Democrats elected to the House, only three are antiabortion. Pro-life forces in the House suffered a net loss of about 13 members. That means statutory restrictions on abortion, which must be renewed by each Congress, are in serious jeopardy.

The loss of numerical strength on Capitol Hill reflects a public relations and political victory by the abortion lobby. Republican politicians tend to give only lip service to the issue, typified by President Bush's silence on abortion. Republican candidates have accepted support from pro-life forces -- and then kept quiet about abortion, leaving the field open to pro-choice advocates.

Thus, the antiabortion movement sees "Bella" as providential. It is entertainment, not propaganda. Although Monday's screening was sponsored by the National Council for Adoption, the word "adoption" is uttered only once in the film. There are no tirades against abortion. Indeed, it acknowledges a woman's pain of carrying a baby to term only to give it up for adoption. In the end, however, the film is a heart-wrenching affirmation of life over death.

"Bella" was conceived by three young Mexican men -- producer, director and lead actor -- who are conservative Catholics and want to make movies removed from Hollywood's culture of sex and violence. Bankrolled by a wealthy Catholic family from Philadelphia, they shot the film in 24 days in New York City.

The star is Eduardo Ver?stegui, a Mexican heartthrob as a lead performer in soap operas who now lives in Los Angeles. A devout Catholic, he told me he was tired of movies showing Hispanics as disreputable and immoral. In three years he has learned to speak English well enough to play the lead role mostly in English (with subtitles over the Spanish).

It was a stretch even to get "Bella" shown at Toronto, much less win an award. "Going into the festival," said the Hollywood Reporter, "absolutely no one, including the team of filmmakers that made 'Bella,' ever imagined it would capture the People's Choice Award, voted on by festival audiences."

But even with the Toronto prize, which in the past has led to Academy and Golden Globe awards, it is hard to get the film in movie houses, and it may be necessary for the filmmakers to form a distribution company. The avowed reason for the difficulty is the inexperience of the director and a cast with names unfamiliar to American moviegoers. But the film's producers say the same left-wing Hollywood establishment that attacked "The Passion of the Christ" is sniping at "Bella," which lacks a Mel Gibson in support.

If the crucifixion in "The Passion" was hard for non-Christians and some Christians to take, "Bella" on one level is a drama without religious overtones. But while the audience at Monday's screening was moved to tears, reaction from a commercial theater audience -- including women who have chosen an abortion -- could be different. The pro-life movement hopes, in the absence of effort by supposedly pro-life politicians, that it will point to a different way to deal with an unwanted pregnancy.

Iran's President Criticizes Bush In Letter To American People (NYT)

By Michael Slackman

The New York Times, November 30, 2006

BEIRUT, Lebanon, Nov. 29 — Iran's president, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, told the American people on Wednesday that he was certain they detested President Bush's policies — his support for Israel, war in Iraq and curtailed civil liberties — and he offered to work with them to reverse those policies.

The call came in the form of a six-page letter in English, published online and addressed to "noble Americans" that discussed "the many wars and calamities caused by the U.S. administration." It suggested that Americans had been fooled into accepting their government's policies, especially toward Israel.

"What have the Zionists done for the American people that the U.S. administration considers itself obliged to blindly support these infamous aggressors?" Mr. Ahmadinejad wrote. "Is it not because they have imposed themselves on a substantial portion of the banking, financial, cultural and media sectors?"

This was the latest public step by Iran's president to promote a dialogue with the United States. He wrote a letter to Mr. Bush in May, calling on him to shift his policies and open a discussion, but it was dismissed by the White House as irrelevant to the central issue dividing them — Iran's nuclear program. Then Mr. Ahmadinejad challenged Mr. Bush to a public debate, also dismissed by the White House.

On Wednesday, the administration's reaction remained unchanged.

"This is a transparently hypocritical and cynical letter," Nicholas R. Burns, under secretary of state for political affairs, said in Washington about the latest letter. "It reflects a profound lack of understanding of the United States."

Still, at least tactically the letter seemed to take a page from Mr. Bush himself, who, speaking to the United Nations General Assembly in September, sought to bypass the Iranian government and address the people directly. The letter also distinguished between the administration and the people.

"Undoubtedly, the American people are not satisfied with this behavior, and they showed their discontent in the recent elections," Mr. Ahmadinejad wrote. "I hope that in the wake of the midterm elections, the administration of President Bush will have heard and will heed the message of the American people."

But it was the emphasis on religious themes, specifically Shiite Muslim notions of justice and fighting oppression, that characterized the new letter as it did his letter to President Bush.

"Both our nations are God-fearing, truth-loving and justice-seeking, and both seek dignity, respect and perfection," the letter said.

The letter seemed directed at three audiences. It sought to reach out to Americans through religious values; to the Arab world, by emphasizing the Palestinian conflict with Israel; and to Mr. Ahmadinejad's political base at home, which includes the military, hard-line clerics and Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, the supreme leader.

The letter also employed an inferential, Iranian style of communication that experts say is likely to leave Americans cold.

"Americans are going to be very puzzled by it," said William Beeman, a linguistic anthropologist at Brown University who specializes in Persian. "People are simply not used to being talked to this way." He added, "It is almost a sermon, which is very much in keeping with his religious background. But I should also point out it is also a lecture."

The letter reminded Americans that "many victims of Katrina continue to suffer, and countless Americans continue to live in poverty and homelessness."

It also lamented: "Civil liberties are increasingly being curtailed. Even the privacy of the individuals is fast losing its meaning."

The president made no reference to the level of poverty, political freedom or judicial independence in his own country.

After referring to Abu Ghraib in Iraq and the prison at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba, he wrote: "I have no doubt that the American people do not approve of this behavior and indeed deplore it."

Since his election in June 2005, Mr. Ahmadinejad has pursued an aggressive and outspoken foreign policy, relying on the bully pulpit of his position to make up for the limited powers of Iran's presidency.

His refusal to end enrichment of uranium and his calls for the destruction of Israel have won him few friends in the West. But they have led to increasing popularity across the Muslim world.

Davoud Hermidas-Bavand, a professor of international relations at Tehran University, said the letter was mostly an effort to win the allegiance of Arabs. Iran has been trying to position itself as the pre-eminent power in the Middle East.

“His first objective is to get the sympathy of Arabs,” said Dr. Hermidas-Bavand. “The letter makes Ahmadinejad a subject of international talks, particularly in the Middle East.”

He said the letter gave insight into President Ahmadinejad’s understanding of American society and governance as being driven largely by Christian beliefs and values.

“He has probably been told that American people are religious and that is how Mr. Bush won, by addressing people’s sense of faith,” he said. “Now he wants to capitalize on this sense of religiousness.”

Iran finds its leverage rising, especially as Iraq struggles through bloody sectarian fighting. In Washington, there is increased pressure on the White House to open direct talks with Iran to help stabilize Iraq and Afghanistan.

Mr. Ahmadinejad offered a litany of sharp attacks on American policy — calling, for example, for withdrawal from Iraq. And he once again highlighted a central demand of Tehran: that it be treated as an equal by Washington.

But Professor Beeman also said that Americans should recognize that the letter did represent an overture. “Iran is saying, ‘We want to have a dialogue with you,’ ” he said.

Iranian President Makes Direct Appeal To Americans (WP)

By Robin Wright

The Washington Post, November 30, 2006

In an unusual letter to the American people, Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad yesterday called for the pullout of U.S. forces from Iraq and charged that Bush administration policy is based on "coercion, force and injustice."

The five-page letter, which was both conciliatory in references to "Noble Americans" and scathing in lambasting Jewish influence in the United States, said there is an urgent need for dialogue between Iranians and Americans because of the "tragic consequences" of U.S. intervention abroad.

In Iraq, he wrote, hundreds of thousands have been killed, maimed or displaced, while terrorism has grown "exponentially" and daily life has become a challenge. "With the presence of the US military in Iraq, nothing has been done to rebuild the ruins, to restore the infrastructure or to alleviate poverty," he wrote. ". . . I consider it extremely unlikely that you, the American people, consent to the billions of dollars . . . from your treasury for this military misadventure."

U.S. resources would be better spent at home, he added, to alleviate poverty and help the "many victims" of Hurricane Katrina.

Ahmadinejad also questioned whether terrorism can be defeated by traditional warfare. "If that were possible, then why has the problem not been resolved?" he wrote. "The sad experience of invading Iraq is before us all."

But the toughest language was reserved for Israel, which Ahmadinejad referred to as the "Zionist regime." The hard-line Iranian leader, who won an upset election last year, charged that Washington's "blind support" for Israel has allowed the nation to pursue policies against Palestinians without constraints. "No day goes by without a new crime," he said.

"What have the Zionists done for the American people that the US administration considers itself obliged to blindly support these infamous aggressors? Is it not because they have imposed themselves on a substantial portion of the banking, financial, cultural and media sectors?" he wrote. The letter was released by the Iranian mission to the United Nations.

The Bush administration dismissed the letter as a public relations stunt that included nothing new. "Actions speak louder than words, and I think if you look at the record of Iranian action, we, unfortunately, haven't seen any change in behavior that would indicate that they've got a new approach to things," said Tom Casey, a State Department spokesman.

The State Department also rejected calls for withdrawing U.S. troops, noting that the letter came one day after the United Nations, at Iraq's request, had renewed the mandate of the U.S.-led coalition force for another 12 months.

Casey told reporters that Iran has no credibility on Iraq, given Tehran's support for violence and the Shiite militias. "That includes its support for terrorism in Iraq. It includes its support for Hezbollah. It includes its support for Palestinianist rejection groups. It includes its continued defiance of the international community's efforts to deal with the Iranian nuclear program. . . . And that's why Iran finds itself in a very isolated place right now," Casey said.

In his letter, Ahmadinejad issued a warning to Democrats taking over the House and Senate that they would be "held to account" by history for their decisions.

"If the US Government meets the current domestic and external challenges with an approach based on truth and Justice, it can remedy some of the past afflictions and alleviate some of the global resentment and hatred of America," he wrote.

Iran's current positions on regional issues have taken on new importance in light of the debate over whether to include Iran and Syria in efforts to stabilize Iraq. The idea has been discussed within the Iraq Study Group, the bipartisan panel led by former secretary of state James A. Baker III and former representative Lee H. Hamilton (D-Ind.) that wrapped up deliberations yesterday on its policy recommendations for the White House.

This is not the first letter from the Iranian leader to the United States. In May, Ahmadinejad wrote a rambling 18-page letter to President Bush that reflected on common values between Christianity and Islam, then questioned how a "follower of Jesus Christ" could order countries to be attacked, lives destroyed and cities set ablaze. The White House did not respond.

Iran Leader Appeals To Americans On Iraq (AP)

By Edith M. Lederer

AP, November 30, 2006

Iran's president urged the American people in an open letter Wednesday to demand the withdrawal of U.S. troops from Iraq and reject what he called the Bush administration's "blind support" for Israel and its "illegal and immoral" actions in fighting terrorism.

President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's letter to "Noble Americans," which was distributed by Iran's mission to the United Nations, also accused Bush of governing by "coercion, force and injustice."

Ahmadinejad appealed to the American people to work to reverse the U.S. leader's policies, and called on the Bush administration and the new Democratic-controlled Congress to heed the results of the recent midterm elections.

He urged Bush to put the United States' "wealth and power in the service of peace, stability, prosperity and the happiness of all peoples through a commitment to justice and respect for the rights of all nations, instead of aggression and war."

In a message to Democrats, he said: "You will also be held to account by the people and by history."

"But if the approach remains the same, it would not be unexpected that the American people would similarly reject the new electoral winners," he said, adding that the recent elections did not reflect a victory but rather "the failure of the current administration's policies."

Ahmadinejad's letter also said the U.S. invasion of Iraq has led to hundreds of thousands of deaths, an exponential growth of terrorism and the destruction of Iraq's infrastructure.

"I consider it extremely unlikely that you, the American people, consent to the billions of dollars of annual expenditure from your treasury for this military misadventure," he said.

He suggested it would be beneficial for the U.S. to withdraw its troops from Iraq and spend its money instead on domestic problems, citing the "many victims" of Hurricane Katrina who continue to suffer and "countless" Americans living in poverty.

He also said the Bush administration's policies in its fight against terrorism were harming Americans directly.

"The U.S. administration's illegal and immoral behavior is not even confined to outside its borders. You are witnessing daily that under the pretext of 'the war on terror,' civil liberties in the United States are being increasingly curtailed," he said.

"I have no doubt that the American people do not approve of this behavior and indeed deplore it," he said.

Ahmadinejad focused some attention on the past good relations between the U.S. and Iran, and said both countries' people are "inclined towards the good, and toward extending a helping hand to one another, particularly to those in need."

Ahmadinejad has alienated many Americans by calling for Israel's destruction and repeatedly dismissing the Nazi Holocaust as a myth. He also strongly supports the Palestinian militant group Hamas and the Lebanese faction Hezbollah, which the U.S. considers terrorist organizations.

In his letter, Ahmadinejad accused the Bush administration of disregarding U.S. public opinion by supporting "the trampling of the rights of the Palestinian people" by Israel.

"What has blind support for the Zionists by the U.S. administration brought for the American people?" he asked. "It is regrettable that for the U.S. administration, the interests of these occupiers supersedes the interests of the American people and of the other nations of the world."

He urged Americans to support the right of the Palestinians to live in their own homeland.

Twice this year, Iran has proposed talks with the U.S. over the security situation in Iraq, but Ahmadinejad has said that for such negotiations to take place, Washington must change its behavior. On Sunday, he said Iran was ready to help the U.S. get out of the "Iraqi quagmire if the U.S. changes its bullying policy toward Iran."

Iran and the U.S. have had no diplomatic relations since 1979 when militants seized the U.S. Embassy in Tehran and kept 52 people hostage for 444 days.

Ahmadinejad wrote a rambling, 18-page letter to Bush in May, lambasting the U.S. leader for his handling of the Sept. 11 attacks and accusing the media of spreading lies about the Iraq war.

Washington dismissed the letter for also not addressing Iran's nuclear program.

Wednesday's letter also makes no mention of Iran's disputed nuclear program, which the U.S. alleges is geared toward secretly developing atomic weapons. The U.S. is leading the drive to impose U.N. sanctions on Tehran for its refusal to stop enriching uranium.

Americans Asked To Pressure Bush (WT)

By Betsy Pisik

The Washington Times, November 30, 2006

NEW YORK -- Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad appealed in a letter to the American people yesterday to pressure the Bush administration to leave Iraq and curtail its "blind and blanket" support for Israel.

Mr. Ahmadinejad said that since the U.S. invasion of Iraq terrorism has "grown exponentially" and Iraq's infrastructure remains in ruins.

The presence of American troops, he said, has created hardship for Iraqi families and tarnished the image of the United States abroad.

"I consider it extremely unlikely that you, the American people, consent to the billions of dollars of annual expenditure from your treasury for this military misadventure," Mr. Ahmadinejad wrote in a letter distributed through the Iranian Mission to the United Nations.

He said that Iraq has a constitution and a government, and the U.S. military expenditures would be better directed toward the survivors of Hurricane Katrina.

The letter was released hours before Mr. Ahmadinejad and Iraqi President Jalal Talabani announced a new security arrangement for Iraq.

"We discussed in the fields of security, economy, oil and industry. Our agreement was complete," Mr. Talabani told reporters in Tehran after a summit with the Iranian president. "This visit was 100 percent successful. Its result will appear soon."

Iran, which is overwhelmingly Shi'ite, has longtime links to Shi'ite militias and political parties in Iraq and has been accused by the United States of fomenting sectarian bloodshed.

The nature of the security agreement between Baghdad and Tehran was not disclosed.

President Bush was to have met with Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki in Amman, Jordan, yesterday to discuss the training of Iraqi police and other security details.

Mr. al-Maliki did not show up. The United States said the meeting would take place today.

In his letter, Mr. Ahmadinejad implicitly urged the Bush administration to heed the wishes of the American voters who returned the House and Senate to Democrats' control, based largely on discontent over the Iraq war.

Mr. Ahmadinejad warned the Democrats: "If the approach remains the same, it would not be unexpected that the American people would similarly reject the new electoral winners."

The Iranian government has made several overtures to the United States in recent months. The Bush administration has rejected all of them and has demanded that Tehran halt nuclear weapon-related activities.

"We have common concerns, face similar challenges, and are pained by the sufferings and afflictions in the world," Mr. Ahmadinejad wrote. "Both our nations are God-fearing, truth-loving and justice-seeking, and both seek dignity, respect and perfection."

Iran's President Appeals To U.S. Public Via Letter (USAT)

By Barbara Slavin

USA Today, November 30, 2006

Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad said Wednesday that U.S. forces should leave Iraq and he praised American voters for defeating Republicans in this month's elections.

He made the remarks in a 12-page letter addressed to “Noble Americans” and released by Iran's mission to the United Nations.

Now that Iraq has an elected government, “would it not be more beneficial to bring the U.S. officers and soldiers home and to spend the astronomical U.S. military expenditures in Iraq for the welfare and prosperity of the American people?” Ahmadinejad asked. On U.S. elections, he said Americans had shown “their discontent” and that President Bush should “heed the message.”

The letter, a broad condemnation of U.S. Middle East policy, was similar to one Ahmadinejad sent to Bush in May. Bush has not replied.

State Department deputy spokesman Tom Casey said Wednesday that it is hard to take the latest comments seriously “when Iran continues to actively work in a negative way in Iraq.”

The United States has accused Iran of interfering in Iraq by fostering violence and undermining the U.S.-backed government there.

Karim Sadjadpour, an Iran analyst at the International Crisis Group, which aims to resolve conflicts, said Ahmadinejad was “trying to take a page out of George Bush's playbook” by appealing to Americans and bypassing the U.S. government.

DOJ_NMG_0100180

In his 2005 State of the Union address, Bush promised Iranians that, “As you stand for your own liberty, America stands with you.”

Ahmadinejad, who attracted world attention by questioning the Holocaust and Israel's right to exist, continued in that vein with remarks likely to alienate Americans. He asserted that “Zionists” had hurt the American people and asked whether that was because they controlled “the banking, financial, cultural and media sectors?”

Shaul Bakhash, an Iran expert at George Mason University in Virginia, said the language was designed to appeal more to Arabs than Americans and “to claim for Iran the mantle of leadership of those who oppose America's ambitions in the world.”

Iran's Nuclear Ambitions Seen Similar To Holocaust (WT)

By Abraham Rabinovich

The Washington Times, November 30, 2006

JERUSALEM -- Iran's reported drive to make an atomic bomb has become an existential threat to Israel that some Israelis are likening to the Holocaust -- especially with the United States appearing to back away from confrontation with Tehran.

The alarmists include Aharon Appelfeld, a leading Israeli author who as a child survived the Nazi killing of 6 million Jews.

"For the first time since I'm in the country, I feel that we face a real existential danger," Mr. Appelfeld said.

The memory of the Holocaust is a central element in Israel's collective consciousness, a memory made more acute by Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's denial that the Holocaust happened.

"It's 1938," said former Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, "and Iran is Germany, racing to arm itself with atomic bombs."

Addressing a Jewish audience in Los Angeles this month, Mr. Netanyahu added his voice to a growing sense of alarm in Israel about Iran's seemingly inexorable march toward nuclear capability.

In his address, Mr. Netanyahu referred to Mr. Ahmadinejad's repeated calls for wiping Israel off the map.

"Believe him and stop him," Mr. Netanyahu said in the speech. "This is what we must do. Everything pales before it."

Israel has half assumed, half hoped that if international pressure on Iran to halt its nuclear development fails, the United States would in the end use military force.

In recent weeks, however, a war-weary Washington seems to be backing away from a confrontation.

In a meeting with French President Jacques Chirac, President Bush said that he would "understand" if Israel chose to attack Iran's nuclear installations.

To Israelis, that sounded like he would prefer it over an American attack. There was likewise little comfort from Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice's remark that the U.S. lacked sufficient intelligence on Iran's nuclear facilities to carry out a strike at this time.

Former Secretary of State Henry Kissinger wrote recently that "military action by the United States is extremely improbable in the final two years of a presidency facing a hostile Congress."

He, too, raised the possibility of a unilateral Israeli air strike.

Israel has apparently long been preparing such a strike. It acquired a large fleet of F-16 and F-15 warplanes and held intensive training exercises in anticipation of a confrontation with Iran.

The appointment last year of former air force commander Lt. Gen. Dan Halutz as chief of staff of the Israel Defense Forces (IDF) was widely seen as preparing for that confrontation in which the air force would play a central role.

It has become increasingly clear in recent years, however, that an attack on Iran's nuclear facilities would be infinitely more difficult than the successful attack on Iraq's nuclear reactor by Israeli planes in 1981.

Tehran learned the lessons of that attack and scattered its facilities at scores of sites, burying many of them deep underground and defending them with modern Russian anti-aircraft missiles.

Analysts have suggested that only a superpower like the United States could mount the massive and sustained attack that would be necessary to do substantial damage by boring ever deeper into the underground sites with bunker-buster bombs on repeated runs.

Even then, some analysts say, an attack might succeed only in delaying the program by a few years.

If Israel undertook the task alone, it would face not only uncertainty about the results of the air campaign but also the certainty of fierce Iranian retaliation, beginning with their long-range missiles and perhaps including attacks on Israeli targets around the world.

Prime Minister Ehud Olmert continues to hope for an international initiative.

"The big countries have to lead and we have to push them," he said. However, there is a realization in Jerusalem that there may be no one to push.

DOJ_NMG_0100181

Deputy Israeli Defense Minister Ephraim Sneh said: "I am aware of all of the possible repercussions of a pre-emptive Israeli military action against Iran and consider it a last resort. But the last resort is sometimes the only resort."

Rice To Meet Israeli, Palestinian Leaders (WP)

By Glenn Kessler

The Washington Post, November 30, 2006

DEAD SEA, Jordan, Nov. 29 -- Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice will meet Thursday with Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert and the Palestinian Authority's president, Mahmoud Abbas, as part of a U.S. effort to demonstrate progress on the Israeli-Palestinian peace effort.

Rice will travel to Israel and the Palestinian territories shortly after attending meetings between President Bush and Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki in Amman, Jordan. Then she will travel to this Jordanian resort for a conference designed to promote Palestinian democracy.

U.S. officials say the renewed attempt to promote peace between the Israelis and Palestinians is separate from efforts to bring stability to Iraq. But Rice's trip comes as U.S. officials have sought to persuade moderate Arab states to support U.S. endeavors in Iraq. Arab leaders have signaled that they expect the United States to demonstrate progress on building a Palestinian state, in part to assuage regional anger at the Iraq war.

In the past week, Palestinian factions have indicated support for a cease-fire intended to end rocket attacks on Israel, and Olmert outlined steps to foster peace. Under pressure from the United States, he offered to release hundreds of Palestinian prisoners if an Israeli soldier held in Gaza was released.

But U.S. officials predicted no major breakthroughs from Rice's visit. The Palestinians are pressing for a return to final-status negotiations, such as determining the border between the Israeli and Palestinian states, while Israelis are demanding that Abbas take action against armed Palestinian groups. Many nations, including the United States, have blocked funding for the Palestinian Authority until Hamas, the radical Islamic movement in control of the authority's ministries, agrees to recognize Israel.

The renewed emphasis on Middle East peace marks a shift for the Bush administration. Before the U.S. invasion of Iraq in 2003, some neoconservatives predicted that the fall of Saddam Hussein and the establishment of an Iraqi democracy would help foster peace in the Middle East, arguing that in effect the road to Jerusalem traveled through Baghdad. Now, experts say, the administration is acknowledging that the path toward stabilizing Baghdad leads through Jerusalem.

A senior State Department official, briefing reporters Wednesday night, said he felt uncomfortable with the nostrum that solving the Israeli-Palestinian crisis could be achieved by toppling Hussein -- and with the idea that the plights of Iraq and the Palestinians were still linked. "I don't like the idea of lumping these things together," he said on condition of anonymity under ground rules set by the State Department.

Still, the official acknowledged that there was a "core of moderate Arab support" for action on the Israeli-Palestinian front and that the administration was trying to exploit that.

After Rice talks with Israelis and Palestinians, she will meet here with foreign ministers from the predominantly Sunni Muslim countries that make up the Gulf Cooperation Council, including Saudi Arabia, and from Egypt and Jordan. The official said the interests of the United States and these nations are "broadly similar" on a range of issues, including concern about the growing power of Iran, a Shiite Muslim state.

Rice To Meet With Olmert In Jerusalem (AP)

By Anne Plummer Flaherty

AP, November 30, 2006

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice will meet Thursday with Israel's Prime Minister Ehud Olmert as the U.S. tries to pave the way for revived peace talks between Israel and the Palestinians.

Rice's trip to Jerusalem, announced Wednesday by State Department spokesman Sean McCormack, will follow a meeting Rice has scheduled for earlier Thursday with Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas in the West Bank town of Jericho.

Rice is trying to cement a shaky cease-fire agreement between the two sides. While U.S. officials are reluctant to express optimism, a long-lasting political deal between Israel and the Palestinians — backed by several Arab countries — would be a considerable victory for the Bush administration and is considered a necessity to quiet violence throughout the region, including Iraq.

Rice also plans to meet with Israeli Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni while in Jerusalem.

Rice's three-day trip comes as President Bush meets with Iraq Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki in Jordan's capital city, Amman. Bush is expected to press al-Maliki on a plan to train Iraqi forces faster so U.S. troops can come home sooner.

DOJ_NMG_0100182

Rice's meeting with Abbas would offer U.S. heft to the cease-fire that ended a five-month Israeli military offensive in the Gaza Strip and was aimed at halting the firing of rockets by Palestinian militants into Israel.

The truce came as Abbas, a member of the Fatah party, is trying to assemble a more moderate Palestinian government after elections handed Hamas control. Hamas' support of terrorism and refusal to recognize Israel's right to exist prompted the West and Israel to impose crushing sanctions.

Rice's trip was initially centered on a Mideast democracy and development summit sponsored by Jordan and Russia at the Dead Sea. U.S. officials say they hope to gain momentum there for two U.S.-backed initiatives that would spend money in Mideast countries to aid small businesses and non-governmental organizations.

Rice still plans to attend the summit Thursday evening.

Peace Of The Weak? Olmert And Abbas Balk (NYT)

By Steven Erlanger

The New York Times, November 30, 2006

JERUSALEM, Nov. 29 — Under regional pressure to move the Israelis and Palestinians toward renewed dialogue, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice is expected to meet their political leaders in a quick visit on Thursday. But with the Palestinians unable to agree on a new unity government, little significant movement is expected and Ms. Rice is likely to limit herself to public encouragement and private exhortation.

Weak governments are always in search of new agendas, but they are also prisoners of their weakness.

As much as the Bush administration would like to show serious progress in the Middle East, as a part of its effort to shore up support in the region for possible economic sanctions on Iran, both the Israeli and Palestinian governments are politically damaged by the summer's conflicts, with Hamas in the Gaza Strip and Hezbollah in Lebanon, and seem unable to make bold moves.

They have established a shaky cease-fire in Gaza. But they have been unable to agree even on a prisoner exchange, which is regarded as the minimum required before the Israeli prime minister, Ehud Olmert, and the Palestinian Authority president, Mahmoud Abbas, can meet.

Mr. Abbas was said by aides on Wednesday to be fed up with Hamas, the militant faction that controls the government, and to regard negotiations toward a national unity government to be at an end. There was a debate among those around him about whether even to meet with Ms. Rice, since he had made so little progress since their last meeting, on Oct. 4.

But he has been there before. On the day of their last meeting, Mr. Abbas, of the Fatah faction, said talks on forming a unity government had collapsed. "There is no dialogue at this stage," he said. Nearly two months later, the situation has barely shifted, with the Western world still waiting for a Palestinian government with which it can do business.

That would require the resignation of the Hamas government and agreement on a political program that at least can be interpreted to mean an acceptance of the West's three conditions: recognition of the right of Israel to exist, forswearing of violence and acceptance of previous Israeli-Palestinian agreements.

Mr. Abbas has been making some progress on negotiating the political program, which would commit the new government — but not the Hamas movement itself — to those principles. Even so, Hamas does not like parts of the document. Prime Minister Ismail Haniya, of Hamas, says he will not resign until he and other leaders, including the group's exiled political director, Khaled Meshal, are satisfied with it.

Hamas and Fatah, which controlled the government before Hamas won the Palestinian elections in January, also remain at odds over ministries. Hamas insists on retaining the right to choose the interior and finance ministers and accuses Mr. Abbas of trying to veto its favored candidates for other posts.

On Tuesday evening Mr. Haniya went off on a monthlong trip to visit Arab allies, meaning that nothing substantive is likely to happen until he returns.

As for Mr. Olmert, he has a safe legislative majority but shrinking public support and a continuing conflict with his defense minister, Amir Peretz, the head of the Labor Party.

The Olmert government was badly hurt by perceptions of misjudgments made during the war with Hezbollah, and a broad offensive in Gaza did not secure the release of a captured soldier or end rocket fire into Israel until the cease-fire was put together by Mr. Abbas over the weekend.

Mr. Olmert's main political program, a unilateral pullback of thousands of Israeli settlers who live beyond the current route of the West Bank separation barrier, was suspended after the war.

Critics in the center and on the right contend that unilateralism has proved to be a bad idea, with Hezbollah in Lebanon and Palestinian militants in Gaza perceiving Israel's withdrawal from both areas as weakness. Israel's unilateralism in those withdrawals also did nothing to strengthen elected leaders, including Mr. Abbas.

On Monday, Mr. Olmert again appealed to Palestinians to choose the path of peaceful negotiations, promising numerous concessions. But the speech was judged to contain little new, a repackaging of his old campaign wine in a new, less unilateralist bottle.

Mr. Olmert said that if the Palestinians could meet international standards, return the captured soldier and end the warfare, he would meet with Mr. Abbas, release prisoners, ease travel restrictions and renew dialogue toward peace, including the withdrawal of an unspecified number of settlers in the West Bank.

But there were a lot of "ifs" in Mr. Olmert's speech, and many hurdles for the Palestinians to leap. So far Mr. Abbas has been unable to push or cajole Hamas into accepting what is required even to qualify for the race.

While Mr. Abbas talks sometimes of firing Mr. Haniya, the presidency lacks authority under the Palestinian basic law to dissolve the Hamas-dominated Parliament or to call new elections. Any new prime minister would have to be approved by Parliament, making any such exercise seem moot and likely to touch off new fighting between Fatah and Hamas.

But the Bush administration has been weakened by the Democratic victory in the elections this month. As Mr. Bush and Ms. Rice try to develop their own new agenda for the Middle East, they seem to be understanding a lesson from the Clinton administration: that Israeli unilateralism can be bad for America as well as for Palestinian leaders who favor talking rather than shooting.

When the United States is seen to be an active participant, pushing its ally Israel to make concessions to the Palestinians, Israeli leaders can deflect domestic criticism by blaming Washington, the United States can earn credit with the Arab world for pushing Israel, and the Palestinians will be seen as an active player at the table, boosting negotiators like Mr. Abbas over the rejectionists of Hamas.

Israel's Offer (WP)

AFTER FIVE months of violence and political drift, there has been encouraging movement toward peace on the Israeli-Palestinian front this week. Much of it is because of Israel's prime minister, Ehud Olmert. Over the weekend Mr. Olmert agreed to a cease-fire in the Gaza Strip with Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas, a deal Israeli governments had refused to make for the past several years. On Monday -- though a few Palestinian rockets were still falling in Israel in violation of the cease-fire -- the prime minister delivered a major speech in which he offered the release of "numerous" Palestinian prisoners, a significant reduction in controls on the movement of people and goods in Gaza and the West Bank, and a full reopening of negotiations to create a Palestinian state.

In exchange, Mr. Olmert asked for the release of Cpl. Gilad Shalit, the soldier whose abduction by Palestinian militants touched off the Middle East's summer war and spelled the end of Israel's plan to unilaterally withdraw from the West Bank. Mr. Olmert said that peace negotiations -- the first in six years -- would depend on success in Mr. Abbas's effort to form a new Palestinian government that, unlike the present administration of the Islamic Hamas movement, would recognize Israel and renounce violence. But Mr. Olmert was clear about what those talks could lead to: "an independent and viable Palestinian state, with territorial contiguity" in Gaza and the West Bank. To create that state, he said, "Israel will agree to the evacuation of many territories and communities which were established therein."

With Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice due to meet with Mr. Abbas today, it's easy to dismiss Mr. Olmert's initiative as a public relations effort aimed at helping the Bush administration gain support it desperately needs from moderate Arab governments on Iraq and Iran. Mr. Olmert took care to describe the Arab peace initiative led by Saudi Arabia, which calls for the normalization of relations with Israel as part of an Israeli-Palestinian settlement, as in part "positive"-- the first kind words an Israeli leader has had for the plan since it was proposed in 2002.

Yet whatever its strategic motive, the Olmert initiative represents a genuine opportunity for Arab governments and Mr. Abbas. The challenge for the Palestinian president, and the Arab leaders who support him, is to use Mr. Olmert's words to break the deadlock on forming a government that can release Cpl. Shalit and commit itself to a peaceful settlement. That would unlock Israel's concessions on prisoners and movement, renew frozen international aid, and allow -- at last -- discussions on a final settlement. But it will require Hamas to soften the intransigent policy of rejection it has held since taking office in March. Do Palestinians really want their own state, or an endless war of attrition against Israel? Arab and European governments that have been insisting an Israeli-Palestinian settlement is the key to stabilizing the region must now insist that Hamas answer that question.

Palestinians Seek Conference On Israel (AP)

By Edith M. Lederer

AP, November 30, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0100184

Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas called Wednesday for an international conference to solve the Arab-Israeli conflict and urged Israel to drop its opposition to a meeting that would address all outstanding issues.

He said the so-called Quartet of key international players trying to promote Mideast peace — the United Nations, the United States, the European Union and Russia — should "play the role of an honest intermediary and guarantor" of the agreements reached at the conference.

Abbas made the proposal in a speech to the U.N. General Assembly on the International Day of Solidarity with the Palestinian People. His speech was read by the Palestinian U.N. observer, Riyad Mansour.

A fragile cease-fire went into effect early Sunday between the Palestinians and the Israelis, ending a five-month offensive in Gaza that has killed hundreds. Abbas said more than 510 Palestinians have been killed since June, bringing the total since September 2000 to more than 4,300 people, about a third of them children.

"We call upon Israel, which did not commit itself to the cease-fire, to end all its aggressive military actions in order to reach a comprehensive and mutual cease-fire," he said. "This shall enable us to create the right atmosphere and provide the necessary groundwork for the resumption of negotiations and the attainment of a just solution."

Israel's deputy U.N. Ambassador Daniel Carmon stressed the importance of this week's speech by Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert, who proposed that Palestinians return to peace talks, saying his country would be willing to leave most of the West Bank in exchange. He urged that it be read "very carefully and in the right context."

Asked about an international conference, Carmon said he was sure that in Abbas' speech "there were some very interesting and positive elements, but history has shown us that the best way to negotiate and to solve our problems is through direct talks between the parties."

Abbas, however, said finding a just solution based on previous agreements, the Quartet's stalled road map to peace, and the goal of two states — Israel and Palestine — living side by side in peace, requires much broader international involvement.

He warned that Israeli measures to maintain control over large and important parts of the West Bank, East Jerusalem and the Jordan Valley" will undermine the two-state solution and force the Mideast "into further violence and chaos, the consequences of which will not be limited to the Middle East region."

If Israel continues to reject an international conference and a role for the United Nations, Abbas said the Palestinians will seek a General Assembly resolution.

He called the 1947 General Assembly resolution that partitioned Palestine "the beginning of our people's ongoing tragedy." But he said "the occupation of our land cannot continue forever, and the time has come to put an end to the bloodshed and to decades of hatred and hostilities."

Adding to Palestinian problems is a Western boycott of the current Hamas-led government over its refusal to recognize Israel.

Lebanese Think The Unthinkable: Another Civil War (LAT)

By Megan K. Stack

The Los Angeles Times, November 30, 2006

BEIRUT — For a glimpse into Lebanon's precarious, death-tinged mood, consider the words of two young men. Each hails from an extreme end of this nation's gaping political and religious divide. And both say they are willing to die fighting for power.

Electronics student Shadi Akouri, a 23-year-old Christian, says he would "pay in blood" for control of the Lebanese government. "Hezbollah has arms and [is] making clear [it] wants this. OK, we want it too. If their intention is to fight, we'll fight. If you don't defend yourself, what is the point of existence?"

Across town, 18-year-old Hezbollah supporter Mohammed Haidar also said he was willing to give up his life. "When you want to change the government, people always die," said Haidar, a Shiite Muslim who says the U.S.-backed Lebanese government is illegitimate. "I will be on the front lines. Why? Because I want to build a country where we can hold our heads up because we are Shia."

As recently as last year, many Lebanese emphatically stated that there would never be another civil war, that their nation had suffered enough, killed enough, paid enough. They had learned a bitter lesson during a conflict that erupted among religious groups in the mid-1970s and raged until 1990.

Since the civil war, talk of religious sects had almost been considered taboo, at least in public. It was common to hear people complain about the Shiite Muslim party Hezbollah, but not the Shiites; the powerful Sunni Hariri family, but not the Sunnis.

When Christians, Sunnis and members of the Druze sect united to demand Syria's ouster in 2005, many Lebanese rejoiced in the notion that, at last, patriotism was about to overcome religious divisions.

But with Shiite Hezbollah making a hard play for greater power, and with Sunni-Shiite warfare in Iraq exacerbating religious friction throughout the region, conventional wisdom among Lebanese elites has become bleak. On both sides, a tone of wary negotiation has been replaced by hardened faces and fiery pledges to risk death to ensure that their own vision of Lebanon, and their faction's political power, prevails.

On the street, politics are openly laced with religious prejudice. Christians and Sunnis fret about being overrun by Shiites. There is tension among rival Christian factions over Maronite Catholic Michel Aoun's affiliation with Hezbollah, which is seen by other Christians as a betrayal of his sect. Acute animosity has flared between Shiites and Sunnis, fed by the civil war in Iraq.

The summertime war between Hezbollah and Israel stripped many Lebanese of their livelihoods and drained them of hope. With the economy in shreds and sectarian splits cracking open, there is a sense that the status quo is not worth preserving.

"I can see it in the eyes of my students," said Walid A. Fakherddine, a media and communications professor at the American University of Science and Technology. "The people are ready to go to war, or they want to leave the country. They can't stay where they are."

Many Lebanese even describe a sort of nostalgia for civil war, especially among youths too young to remember the bloody horrors of street battles, kidnappings and mortar attacks.

There is still hope the two sides can negotiate their way out of the crisis. But these days, many Lebanese bluntly say they expect to face another civil war; others just shrug and say "anything can happen."

Few rule out the possibility of further fighting.

Many people are afraid that if Hezbollah and its allies take to the streets in coming days to demand a change in government, as they have repeatedly pledged to do, clashes will erupt. Hezbollah members swear they will stay in the streets until the government falls. And their rivals have threatened to unleash security forces to defend government institutions attacked by demonstrators.

"We fear the reaction of the ruling majority when and if we decide to carry out these protests," said Trad Hamadeh, a Hezbollah member who resigned, along with other Shiite political officials, as labor minister this month. "They control security. They control the real power on the ground."

Lebanon's political woes deepened when Pierre Gemayel, the 34-year-old minister of industry and scion of a powerful Christian political family, was gunned down in the streets of Beirut last week.

Since Gemayel's death, the capital has become a montage of scenes of tension. Sunni and Shiite gangs have clashed in the southern suburbs. Rival Christian gangs brawled in the Christian neighborhood of Achrafieh.

During one recent rally, Christian electronics student Akouri stood on the gravel in a vacant lot during a rally in downtown Beirut. Nearby, college-age youths cupped hands around lit candles and chanted, "The one who killed Pierre, we want to drink his blood!" and, referring to Hezbollah leader Sheik Hassan Nasrallah, "Wait, Nasrallah, wait. We will dig your grave."

Messages of division, and a sometimes less-than-subtle call to arms, are blasting through Lebanon's many television channels. The antagonism is coming not just from the array of talk shows, but is implicit in carefully produced commercials.

The Future channel, owned by the Hariri family, has kept up relentless pressure on viewers to "remember the martyrs," or assassinated politicians. Cartoons show Lebanon as a prisoner with a ball and chain, presumably Hezbollah, around its leg, or as people choking on black fumes, also representing Hezbollah. "Let us live," runs the slogan.

On Hezbollah's Al Manar channel, the Lebanese government is routinely referred to as "Feltman's government" — a reference to U.S. Ambassador Jeffrey D. Feltman.

A commercial tells viewers: "We are the resisters. We are the ones whose homes were destroyed. We are the ones who were buried alive. We are the defenders of the nation. We are a sovereign Lebanon."

"I can't deny that Hezbollah is Lebanese, but they are supported by Iran. And I don't know what they are doing, where they are going," said Omar Alewian, a Sunni student. "If we have to do something … I'm ready to die."

Meanwhile, a handful of Cabinet ministers have taken up residence behind the gun-toting guards, high walls and armored personnel carriers that ring the prime minister's headquarters in downtown Beirut.

If any more ministers are killed, the government could collapse.

With rumors racing of a Syrian-backed plot to kill off opposition Cabinet members, the ministers are frightened for their lives.

"I'm nervous about my country blowing up," said Nayla Mouawad, the Christian minister of social affairs. "The people are put back with their old devils."

For ministers such as Mouawad, the sprawling hilltop headquarters has turned into a prison. Mouawad's hairdresser and secretary come through the checkpoints to visit her, but she refuses to leave. She knows well the dangers of political assassination; her husband, President Rene Mouawad, was killed in 1989. She blames Syria for the slaying.

Dressed neatly in a charcoal suit, smoking one Marlboro Light after another, Mouawad said she didn't anticipate getting her freedom back. Not any time soon.

"We expect the crisis will last," she said. "I expect violence."

U.S., N. Korea Reach No Deal On Talks (AP)

By Charles Hutzler

AP, November 30, 2006

U.S. and North Korean diplomats failed to reach an agreement Wednesday on when to resume six-nation talks on Pyongyang's disputed nuclear program, but stressed their commitment to moving the process forward.

U.S. Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill left Thursday after two days of talks with North Korean Vice Foreign Minister Kim Kye Gwan, during which he said presented ideas on how the regime — which conducted its first nuclear test last month — could disarm.

"These are ideas designed to make rapid progress," Hill told reporters at the airport without elaborating. "We discussed them and they're taking them back to Pyongyang and we hope to hear from them soon."

The North said in its own statement that it "promised to study these ideas."

Hill also said dates for the next round of six-nation discussions were raised but gave no details. The China-hosted talks involve the United States, North Korea, Japan, South Korea and Russia, which has not sent an envoy to Beijing.

"The purpose is that when we start the talks, that we really do make progress," Hill said. "The purpose of the six-party talks is not to talk, it's to achieve the denuclearization of the Korean peninsula."

Hill and Kim also met with Chinese Vice Foreign Minister Wu Dawei during the talks Tuesday and Wednesday. The Chinese Foreign Ministry said in a statement on its Web site late that the parties "frankly and deeply exchanged views on the issue of promoting the process of the six-party talks and improve mutual understanding," without elaborating.

"The three parties also agreed to strive for the progress of the talks," the statement said.

Japan's Kyodo News agency cited unidentified officials at the talks as saying Kim had demanded the U.S. lift financial sanctions and freeze U.N. sanctions that were imposed after the October nuclear test.

Hill said the issue of the Washington-imposed sanctions was discussed but he made it clear that denuclearization had to be addressed first.

"The best way for them to get out of sanctions is to get out of nuclear programs," he said. "Unless they denuclearize, nothing is going to be possible."

Hill, who had been scheduled to fly to Seoul after Beijing, canceled the trip, said Susan Stevenson, spokeswoman for the U.S. Embassy in Beijing. She did not give a reason. In Tokyo, U.S. embassy spokesman Jeffrey Hill said the U.S. envoy was scheduled to arrive in Japan Thursday for further talks with Japan's representative Kenichiro Sasae.

Meanwhile, Yonhap news agency, citing an unnamed South Korean Foreign Ministry official, said South Korea's Chun Yung-woo and North Korea's Gwan were to meet in Beijing on Thursday.

North Korea agreed in September 2005 to abandon its nuclear program in exchange for security guarantees and aid. But Washington imposed the financial sanctions against a Macau-based bank on suspicions it was laundering counterfeit money for the North Koreans. Angered by the move, Pyongyang withdrew from the talks two months later.

State Department spokesman Sean McCormack in Washington said that the main goal of the Beijing meetings was to "make sure that everybody, at least, has a good, solid understanding of what might happen" when the six-nation talks resume.

Japanese Prime Minister Shinzo Abe said in Tokyo that just resuming the talks was not the main objective. "Our efforts are aimed at holding six-party talks that produce results," he said.

Kim's trip to Beijing — a rare overseas visit for a North Korean official — and the presence of other negotiators had lifted expectations that there could be a breakthrough in ongoing efforts to restart the talks.

An unannounced meeting between Hill and Kim last month in Beijing led to Pyongyang agreeing to return to the arms negotiations amid heightened tensions after the Oct. 9 nuclear test.

Meanwhile, a South Korean lawmaker said Wednesday he believed the North was making preparations to possibly conduct a second nuclear test next month or early next year unless the U.S. offers economic concessions, such as lifting financial restrictions against Pyongyang.

"I believe that there are specific movements in North Korea to prepare for a second nuclear test," lawmaker Chung Hyung-keun said, citing intelligence obtained by state intelligence agencies, according to Chung's office. He did not elaborate.

There had been speculation that Pyongyang was preparing for a second test after it conducted its first nuclear explosion Oct. 9. Last month, however, South Korean media reported that the U.S. military had not detected any signs of preparations for a second test.

No Major Progress As US Holds Firm Against NKorea Nukes (AFP)

By Dan Martin

DOJ_NMG_0100187

AFP, November 30, 2006

The United States has insisted North Korea must give up its nuclear weapons during two days of intensive closed-door talks in Beijing that ended without a major breakthrough.

US Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill said he presented North Korean envoy Kim Kye-Gwan with proposals on how Pyongyang could move forward toward scrapping its fledgling nuclear arms program.

He said the North was now considering the proposals, which he described as "ideas that are designed to make rapid progress (toward de-nuclearization)."

Hill, the US pointman on North Korea, was speaking before departing Beijing for discussions with Japanese officials in Tokyo.

He said he was "hopeful" full six-nation talks aimed at ending Pyongyang's nuclear program would resume in December, but he reported no major concessions from either side in Beijing this week.

"We hope to hear back from the North Koreans soon," he added.

Hill said the United States and other nations would not back down on their insistence that North Korea give up its nuclear arms, despite Kim saying this week that it would use its new status as a nuclear power as leverage.

During the Beijing talks Tuesday and Wednesday, Hill held several meetings with Kim and China's chief negotiator to the six-party forum, Wu Dawei.

Envoys from South Korea and Japan also gathered in the Chinese capital amid a renewed drive to jump-start the roundtable negotiations, which also involve Russia.

It follows North Korea's first ever nuclear weapons test on October 9 and its pledge at the end of that month, under heavy international pressure and UN sanctions, to return to talks on dismantling the military program.

Nevertheless a restart date has proved elusive.

The six-party talks, which started in 2003, broke down late last year when North Korea walked out over separate financial sanctions imposed on it by the United States for money laundering and counterfeiting.

Hill said here late Wednesday that North Korea was told it must abide by an agreement made in September last year at the forum that it would give up its nuclear program in return for security guarantees and aid.

"We worked very, very hard to achieve that September plan... We want to get on with implementing it," Hill said.

He reiterated Thursday that: "The main issue in Beijing was how to get the North Koreans to make some tough decisions to move out of the nuclear business and if they make those tough decisions we will respond appropriately".

He added "good things" could start to happen for the isolated state if it complied.

Hill said the North Koreans offered no proposals of their own here but took the US plans back to Pyongyang for consideration.

He also appeared to take a firm line against dropping UN sanctions imposed on North Korea, until Pyongyang abandoned its nuclear program.

"I made pretty clear that all these issues, the sanctions, are all related to their nuclear programs and that the best way to get out of sanctions is to get out of nuclear programs," he said.

However, a US State Department spokesman late Wednesday would not rule out eventually suspending sanctions when the full talks restart, saying that, "If circumstances change, then we'll see what happens."

While holding out hope of a December resumption to the talks, Hill said the most important thing was carefully preparing the groundwork for success.

However, he also said urgent progress must be made.

"We think it is important to get going as soon as possible. We agreed on that with the Chinese and in fact with the DPRK (North Korea) as well.

"We've lost a year. The decision to fire off missiles and to test a nuclear device was a very clear setback for the process, so we need to get moving quickly."

Hill was to return to Washington after his Tokyo stop.

Hitting Kim Jong Il Right In The Cognac (WP)

By Elizabeth Williamson

The Washington Post, November 30, 2006

But effective this holiday season, there will be none of those things coming into North Korea, the United States hopes. After Pyongyang tested a nuclear bomb in October, the U.N. Security Council voted unanimously to deny the rogue nation and its leader, Kim Jong Il, foreign weapons, nuclear technology -- and luxury goods.

U.N. Resolution 1718 condemns North Korea's nuclear test and demands that the country return to six-nation talks aimed at ending the nuclear-weapons program. Until that happens, the United States says, there will be no Fender Stratocasters, Harleys, Ski-Doos or Marlboros.

Although the resolution spelled out the military hardware and technology that U.N. members will deny North Korea, it leaves the luxury category open to each country's interpretation for now. In Japan, a list of two dozen banned exports includes caviar and camcorders, wristwatches and cars.

The State Department's newly released list of no-go goodies blends knowledge and legend of the diminutive strongman's high-end tastes. Denying Kim what he craves, the theory goes, might prompt better behavior from a dictator who reportedly spends nearly a million dollars a year on rare cognac.

The resolution "reaffirms that proliferation of nuclear, chemical and biological weapons . . . constitutes a threat to international peace and security" and expresses the "gravest concern" at North Korea's claim to have tested a nuclear weapon Oct. 9.

The U.S. list of more than 60 items reads like a letter to Santa from the dictator who has everything. Yachts, water scooters, race cars, motorcycles, even station wagons and Segways won't be crossing the border this season. There shall be no more DVD players and televisions larger than 29 inches for the man whose film library of 20,000 titles betrays a yen for Bond and Rambo.

Kim's former chef has written that the man known as "Dear Leader" fancies sushi, Iranian caviar and shark-fin soup. He is said to have every grain of rice inspected for perfection. But he won't be served any of it on American china, which is on the list. After dinner, he often enjoys a glass of fine cognac -- so the United States put lead crystal and liquor on the list, too.

The U.N. resolution also freezes North Korean accounts in foreign banks that could be used to fund the weapons program. And it prohibits international travel by officials involved in the nuclear-weapons program and their families. That is ostensibly more bad news for Kim Jong Il's eldest son. Kim Jong Nam, who was then 29, was detained several years ago in Japan while reportedly trying to travel to Tokyo Disneyland on a forged Dominican passport.

The case against selling weapons and nuclear know-how to a bellicose government argues itself. Restricting designer duds, Chanel No. 5 and rare stamps involves subtler reasoning, said Jerrold M. Post, psychiatrist and director of the political psychology program at George Washington University. Post's book "Leaders and Their Followers in a Dangerous World" profiles Kim's eclectic tastes and includes a sales figure from Hennessy that puts Kim's annual cognac budget at up to $800,000 a year.

"It sounds very clever to me," Post said of the U.S. list. "It's designed only to frustrate the senior circle of cronies," he said, sparing most North Koreans, who survive on less than $1,000 a year.

Putting the kibosh on silk scarves, designer fountain pens, furs and leather luggage might inconvenience North Korea's leaders and their families, but Post doubts the luxury ban will inspire an institutional change of heart.

"Part of the support he musters with his followers is having the courage to stand up and forge forward," despite an iPod shortage, Post said. So lack of luxury won't end North Korea's weapons program "unless they use Hennessy to fuel their rockets."

The United Nations is still deciding whether to draw up its own list of banned luxury items, or leave the matter with individual member nations. The U.S. list, the most extensive so far, is also meant as a guide for nations that trade with North Korea more than the United States does. The government says U.S. trade with North Korea hovers in the $6 million range.

The United States reserves the right to take even more privileges away, should Kim's bad behavior continue -- or should his tastes change. "Goods may be added to this list taking into account national discretion on what constitutes a luxury good," reads a caveat at the top.

So while another nation may help Kim indulge his hankering for French vintages, there will be no -- repeat, no -- Samuel Adams beer on Kim's table this season. He has ruined that for himself.

Strong Protests For Visa Changes (WT)

By David R. Sands And Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, November 30, 2006

President Bush's proposal to loosen U.S. visa rules for a select group of allies yesterday drew strong protests from security analysts and strong support from countries that hope to benefit from the liberalized rules.

The starkly different reactions underscored the political force of the immigration security issue five years after the September 11 attacks, an issue that will quickly confront the new Democratic Congress early next year.

While the Department of Homeland Security (DHS) said yesterday there is no firm list of countries that would be given the waiver privilege, Mr. Bush's proposal to ease travel curbs for select allies in Eastern Europe and East Asia "is absolutely the wrong thing to do," said Janice Kephart, former counsel to the September 11 commission.

"All this would do would be to open up another loophole for people to get into the country at a time when we have yet to secure our borders against possible threats," she added.

But Slovak Ambassador Rastislav Kacer, whose country is one of about a dozen allies hoping to qualify for the Visa Waiver Program, said the change would eliminate a major irritant in relations between the United States and string of close allies in Central Europe.

"People in Slovakia say, 'OK, we support America in Iraq and around the world. Why are we not included in this program? Where is the justice?' " he said.

Mr. Kacer said ambassadors from a number of European countries hoping to join the waiver program will meet today with officials from the Department of Homeland Security to learn more about the administration's plans.

Citizens of 27 countries -- most from Western Europe but also including allies such as Australia, Japan and Singapore -- now can travel to the United States for tourism or business for up to 90 days without a visa. No countries have been added to the list since the September 11 attacks.

Slovakia is one of about a dozen countries stuck on the doorstep for admittance, along with Bulgaria, Cyprus, the Czech Republic, Estonia, Greece, Hungary, Latvia, Lithuania, Malta, Poland, Romania and South Korea.

Mr. Bush said Tuesday in the Estonian capital of Tallinn he would soon send a proposal to Congress to "loosen" the visa-waiver requirements to allow the applicants to qualify.

One major change: allowing countries with a visa-rejection rate above 3 percent, the current cutoff, to obtain the waiver, if those countries agree to other new security measures.

DHS spokesman Jarrod Agen said yesterday there is no timeline for the proposed changes, which still must be approved by Congress. He said there was "maybe a handful of countries" that would qualify for the waiver if the changes are adopted, but said the administration is not ready to "name names."

Sen. George V. Voinovich, Ohio Republican, said he planned to introduce a bill next week to extend visa-free travel privileges to countries allied with the United States in the global war on terrorism. Mr. Voinovich had been drafting his bill separately from the administration proposal, an aide to the senator said.

But Michael W. Cutler, a retired senior agent with the now-defunct U.S. Immigration and Naturalization Service, said he was "outraged" by Mr. Bush's suggestion that the number of visa-waiver countries be expanded without hurting security.

"The president is apparently willing to ignore high refusal rates for visa applications and is claiming that because aliens from visa-waiver countries generally leave the United States within [the authorized period], it is reasonable to have the citizens of those countries participate in a program that creates inherent national security vulnerabilities," Mr. Cutler said.

"He makes those assertions even though he knows our government lacks the ability to know when these aliens leave our country."

Daniel Griswold, a trade specialist at the libertarian Cato Institute, said Mr. Bush was apparently banking on a more friendly reception for the proposal with Democrats soon to be running Congress.

Mr. Griswold, who supports the change, predicted the visa waiver would be extended only to a tightly defined group of allies.

"I guarantee you the president was not talking about Saudi Arabia," he said.

Halliburton Unit To Pay $8 Million For Overbilling (WP)

By Griff Witte

The Washington Post, November 30, 2006

A Halliburton subsidiary agreed to pay the government $8 million to resolve accusations of overbilling related to the firm's work for the Army in the Balkans, the Justice Department said yesterday.

The allegations against KBR, formerly known as Kellogg Brown & Root, stemmed from orders placed with 10 foreign subcontractors that were working for KBR on military logistics support in 1999 and 2000. The accusations, made under the federal False Claims Act, included double-billing, inflating prices and providing products that didn't fit the Army's needs during the construction of Camp Bondsteel in Kosovo.

"The Department of Justice remains committed to vigorously pursuing allegations of procurement abuses affecting the military," Assistant Attorney General Peter D. Keisler said in a written statement.

KBR, which is being spun off by Halliburton, said in a written statement that the company was "pleased" with the resolution. "The government closed its investigations without making allegations of fraud or filing a complaint."

According to the company, it paid the government $2.1 million in 2001 as the result of an internal investigation.

The $8 million settlement is relatively small by the standards of other False Claims Act cases, said Patrick Burns, communications director of Taxpayers Against Fraud. Burns also noted that the settlement had been a long time coming, and said that the government needs to pay more attention to recent allegations of fraud in Iraq.

"At a certain point, justice delayed is justice denied," said Burns, whose nonprofit group promotes use of the False Claims Act, which dates to the Civil War. "People are going to say, 'When were we in the Balkans?' "

Several False Claims Act cases related to work in Iraq are pending, but none has resulted in a contractor having to repay money to the United States. In one lawsuit, whistle-blowers accused the firm Custer Battles of using its contracts in Iraq to cheat the government. A federal jury decided in March that the company should pay a $10 million penalty. But in August, a judge threw out the decision, ruling that the Coalition Provisional Authority, which ran Iraq at the time of the alleged fraud, was not a U.S. government entity.

KBR, the U.S. military's largest contractor in Iraq, is at the heart of several other pending False Claims Act cases, and its work is the subject of numerous federal investigations. Congressional Democrats have been particularly critical of Halliburton, which was run by Dick Cheney before he became vice president.

EU Struggles To Avoid Rift With Ankara (FT)

By George Parker In Brussels

Financial Times, November 30, 2006

Europe's leaders on Wednesday sought to prevent Turkey's troubled European Union membership bid from plunging into a full-blown crisis, as Ankara responded angrily to a call for much of the negotiations to be put on hold.

The events were sparked by a recommendation from the European Commission to freeze talks on almost a quarter of the negotiating topics because of a dispute between Turkey and Cyprus. Turkish officials expressed anger that they were not informed by Brussels in advance. One described the decision and its timing as "a bolt of lightning".

In meetings at a Nato summit in Riga, EU leaders pleaded with Recep Tayyip Erdogan, Turkey's prime minister, not to walk away from the membership talks. He later struck a more conciliatory tone in a news conference at Ankara airport, while insisting that there would be no more concessions on Cyprus.

"Actually let us not view this as a suspension... There will be something of a slowdown," he said. "We will continue on our path in the same direction... Our most important goal is to raise our country's standard of living."

Olli Rehn, EU enlargement commissioner, proposed on Wednesday that Turkey should be barred from opening detailed membership talks in eight out of the 35 policy areas.

The areas which related to items such as the free movement of goods, transport, customs and external relations consist of some of the biggest elements of EU policy.

The move was seen as too harsh by Britain, Spain and Italy, which argued that no more than three "chapters" in the membership negotiations should be put off limits.

But others like France and Germany wanted Mr Rehn to go further and Cypriot diplomats said his plan was "deeply disappointing".

Cyprus wants the EU to set a date to review Turkish progress on the ports issue - the kind of new deadline Mr Rehn wants to avoid.

Mr Rehn hopes the EU's 25 foreign ministers can bury their differences and agree to the new conditions for Turkey at a meeting on December 11.

He argues that the compromise plan would allow talks to continue on many other policy areas and keep the negotiations on track. "There will be no train crash," he said.

But his officials admit the bigger concern is Ankara's reaction to the conditions and the nagging fear that Mr Erdogan might eventually decide to walk away from the negotiating table.

The road to impasse

1999: EU declares Turkey is a 'candidate' for membership

2004: EU decides to begin negotiations with Ankara after concluding it has 'sufficiently fulfilled' human rights and democratic criteria

2005: Brussels approves negotiating mandate consisting of 35 topics or 'chapters' Ankara must fulfil, but warns 'overall progress' will be affected if Turkey refuses to open its ports to ships from Cyprus

June 2006: EU opens and closes chapter on science and research – the only part of the negotiations to date that has been concluded or even begun

September 2006 onwards: Progress on other chapters stalls as tensions rise over Turkish-Cypriot dispute. As an EU member state, Cyprus has a veto over all stages of the negotiations

November 2006: Commission recommends that the EU suspend negotiations on eight of the remaining chapters amid concerns that Turkey's bid could be jeopardised. Several EU member states back Brussels' stance. A decision is due to be taken next month

Turkey Set Back In Bid For E.U. Membership (WP)

By Molly Moore

The Washington Post, November 30, 2006

ISTANBUL, Nov. 29 -- The European Union's executive arm on Wednesday recommended cutting off talks with Turkey on several key issues in its efforts to join the 25-country bloc, a day after Pope Benedict XVI expressed support for the predominantly Muslim country's pursuit of membership.

"We confirm these negotiations must continue, although at slower pace," E.U. Enlargement Commissioner Olli Rehn told reporters in Brussels. "There will be no train crash. There is a slowing down because of works further down the tracks. However, the train continues to move."

Turkish Prime Minister Recep Tayyip Erdogan, attending a summit of the NATO alliance in Latvia, called the recommendation by the European Commission "unacceptable."

The latest rift between the European Union and Turkey came in the middle of Benedict's first papal journey to a Muslim country. The pontiff is using the visit to highlight secular Turkey's role as a bridge between the West and Islam. But the trip has come as tensions over possible E.U. membership have frayed relations between Turkey and its longtime Western allies.

Erdogan, who met with the pope for 20 minutes Tuesday at the Ankara airport before flying to Latvia, said the pontiff expressed support for Turkey's efforts to join the European Union, reversing the position he had expressed as a cardinal.

A Vatican spokesman, the Rev. Federico Lombardi, issued a statement noting that the pope has no official role in determining E.U. membership but that he "views positively" Turkey's attempts to join.

The European Commission recommended suspension of talks with Turkey on eight of the 35 crucial policy areas judged for E.U. membership. The decision followed the collapse of negotiations over Turkey's refusal to open its ports to vessels from parts of Cyprus controlled by the island's internationally recognized government.

Cyprus has been divided since 1974, when Turkish troops invaded the northern portion of the island in response to a coup d'etat that was supported by Greece. Turkey is the only country to recognize that zone, as the Turkish Republic of Northern Cyprus. Turkey refuses to recognize the southern section of the island; the entire island has been admitted to the European Union.

The pope is using his trip to try to improve relations with the Muslim world after a September speech in which he angered many Muslims by quoting a Byzantine Christian emperor who criticized Islam as embracing violence.

Within Turkey, the pope's first visit has received favorable reviews. The Turkish newspaper Hurriyet declared in a headline Wednesday: "It started well."

A statement purportedly released by the insurgent group al-Qaeda in Iraq to several Islamic Web sites Wednesday denounced the four-day visit as part of a "crusader campaign" against Islam and said Benedict was trying to "extinguish the burning ember of Islam" in Turkey.

Lombardi, the Vatican spokesman, said the statement demonstrated the need for all religions to fight "violence in the name of God."

The pope spent the second day of his trip reaching out to Turkey's small Roman Catholic community and to the Vatican's centuries-long rival, the Istanbul-based patriarch of the Orthodox Christian church. The pope will spend much of the remaining two days as a guest of Ecumenical Patriarch Bartholomew I.

On Wednesday morning, the pope traveled up a dirt road on a forested mountainside near the Aegean Sea to say Mass in Ephesus, where many Christians and Muslims believe the Virgin Mary lived her last years.

In remarks directed at Turkey's treatment of Christians, Benedict said, "I have wanted to convey my personal love and spiritual closeness, together with that of the universal church, to the Christian community here in Turkey, a small minority which faces many challenges and difficulties daily."

He also paid homage to an Italian priest who was shot dead in February as he knelt in prayer inside his church in the Black Sea port town of Trabzon. His slaying by a Turkish teenager was linked to anger over publication in Europe of cartoons of the prophet Muhammad.

Pope Urges Religious Tolerance In Turkey (AP)

Pope Benedict XVI began his pilgrimage among Turkey's tiny Christian communities Wednesday by paying homage to an Italian priest slain during Islamic protests and expressing sympathy for the pressures facing religious minorities in the Muslim world.

The messages — made at one of the holiest Christian sites in Turkey — could set the tone for the remainder of Benedict's first papal trip to a Muslim nation as he tries to strengthen bonds with the spiritual leader of the world's Orthodox Christians.

The pope is expected to sharpen his calls for what the Vatican calls "reciprocity" — that Muslim demands for greater respect in the West must be matched by increased tolerance and freedom for Christians in Islamic nations.

But too much pressure by the Roman Catholic pontiff could risk new friction with Muslims after broad gestures of goodwill in the opening hours of the trip Tuesday that sought to ease simmering Muslim anger over the pope's remarks on violence and the Prophet Muhammad.

A statement claiming to be from al-Qaida in Iraq denounced the pope's visit as part of a "crusader campaign" against Islam and an attempt to "extinguish the burning ember of Islam" in Turkey. Vatican spokesman the Rev. Federico Lombardi said the declaration — posted on several Islamic militant Web sites — shows the need for faiths to fight "violence in the name of God."

He said "neither the pope nor his entourage are worried."

Still Turkish authorities took massive security precautions for the Istanbul stop, with thousands of police on the street and roads cleared of all traffic for the papal motorcade.

The pope's deepening ties with Ecumenical Patriarch Bartholomew I — called the "first among equals" of the Orthodox leaders — also is watched with suspicion in Turkey as a possible challenge to state-imposed limits on Christian minorities and others. Benedict has declared a "fundamental" commitment to try to heal rifts between the two ancient branches of Christianity, which split nearly 1,000 years ago over disputes including papal authority.

At Bartholemew's walled compound in Istanbul, the pope stood amid black-robbed Orthodox clerics and urged both sides "to work for full unity of Catholics and Orthodox."

The pope began the day at the ruins of a small stone home at the end of a dirt road near the Aegean Sea — the site where the Virgin Mary is thought to have spent her last years.

At an outdoor Mass attended by 250 invited guests, the pope noted the challenges facing the "little flock" of Christians in Turkey.

"I have wanted to convey my personal love and spiritual closeness, together with that of the universal church, to the Christian community here in Turkey, a small minority which faces many challenges and difficulties daily," the pope said.

At times, he smiled and showed flashes of the pastoral flair of his predecessor, John Paul II, in one of the most intimate papal gatherings since John Paul's trip to remote Mount Sinai during a trip to Egypt in 2000.

Benedict went on to honor the memory of a Catholic priest who was slain in Turkey amid Muslim anger over the publication in European newspapers of caricatures of Muhammad.

"Let us sing joyfully, even when we're tested by difficulties and dangers as we have learned from the fine witness given by the Rev. Andrea Santoro, whom I am pleased to recall in this celebration," said Benedict, who later walked amid the crowd as they reached to touch his gold-and-white robes and cried "Viva il Papa" and "Benedetto," his name in Italian.

In February, a Turkish teenager shot the Italian priest as he knelt in prayer in his church in the Black Sea port of Trabzon. The attack was believed to have been linked to outrage over the cartoons. Two other Catholic priests were attacked this year in Turkey, where Christians have often complained of discrimination and persecution.

On Tuesday, the pope urged religious leaders of all faiths to "utterly refuse" to support any form of violence in the name of faith. He also said religious freedom was an essential element of democratic values.

He sought a careful balance as he held out a hand of friendship and brotherhood to Muslims, and expressed support for measures that Turkey has taken in its campaign to join the European Union.

But winning over Turkish sentiments may be easy compared with the complexities ahead.

The legacy of Christianity in Turkey is a tangle of historical and religious sensitivities.

Turkish armies captured the Byzantine capital Constantinople — now Istanbul — in 1453 to begin a steady decline for Christians, who had maintained communities in Asia Minor since the time of the Apostles.

As the Ottoman Empire collapsed in the early 20th century, large numbers of Armenian Christians perished in mass expulsions and fighting. Turkey vehemently denies that it committed genocide against Armenians, though many nations have classified the World War I-era killings as such.

Later, in the 1920s, Turkey and Greece carried out a massive population exchange under the treaty that established modern Turkey, with hundreds of thousands of Greek Orthodox sent to Greece and smaller numbers of Muslims going the other way.

Bartholomew heads the remnants of the Greek community in Istanbul that now number no more than 2,000 among about 90,000 Christians in Turkey.

But they still represent a powerful symbolic presence for the world's more than 250 million Orthodox, which often denounce Turkey for placing obstacles in the way of Bartholomew and his clerics.

Turkey refuses to acknowledge the "ecumenical," or universal, title of the patriarch and instead considers him only the head of the local Greek Orthodox community. The Turkish worry is that granting wider status to the patriarch could undermine the idea of a single Turkish nationality — a pillar of the nation's secular system — and inspire demands for special recognition by minorities including Kurds and Muslim groups such as Sufis and Alevis, considered a branch of Shiite Islam.

Now, Turkish officials are concerned the papal visit and support for Christian minorities could embolden Bartholomew to press Turkey for concessions, including return of confiscated property and the reopening of a Greek Orthodox seminary that closed more than two decades ago after authorities blocked new students. The EU has also pushed Turkey for greater religious openness to help its faltering bid for membership.

"Against the backdrop of universal peace, the yearning for full communion and concord between all Christians becomes even more profound and intense," he said at the ancient Christian site.

Nestling on a mountain in woods between the ancient city of Ephesus and the town of Selcuk, near the Aegean coast, St. John the Apostle is believed to have brought the Virgin Mary to the house to care for her after Jesus' death. Another belief maintains that the Virgin Mary died in Jerusalem.

The ruins of the house, whose earliest foundations date to the first century, have become a popular place of pilgrimage for both Muslims and Christians since the 1950s.

A chapel was built over the ruins, and some believe in the healing powers of both the chapel and waters flowing from a nearby spring.

Of Turkey's 70 million people, some 65,000 are Armenian Orthodox Christians, 20,000 are Roman Catholic and 3,500 are Protestant, mostly converts from Islam. Another 23,000 are Jewish.

Turkey Lauds Pope's EU Support (WT)

By John Phillips

The Washington Times, November 30, 2006

ISTANBUL -- Turkey praised Pope Benedict XVI yesterday for dropping his opposition to Turkish membership in the European Union.

"It started beautifully," said the mass circulation Hurriyet newspaper, "the pope told the world from Ankara that Islam was a religion of peace."

Turkey's other biggest daily Milliyet concurred.

"This trip is important for Turkey's EU membership. This is a big warning for politicians who think the EU is a Christian club," it said.

Benedict on Tuesday began a delicate four-day trip to this Muslim NATO nation by meeting Turkish Prime Minister Recep Tayyip Erdogan who afterward quoted the conservative German pope as having dropped his previous well-known hostility to Turkey becoming an EU member. The Vatican did not confirm specifically the Turkish leader's remarks. However, Vatican spokesman the Rev. Federico Lombardi said the pope "sees positively and encourages the passage of dialogue for the inserting of Turkey in the EU, on the basis of specific common values."

Benedict began the second day of his remarkable first official trip to a Muslim country yesterday by celebrating a Mass close to the ancient city of Ephesus near the Aegean coast in a ceremony for Turkey's embattled Roman Catholic community. The service was held next to the ruins of a house where the Virgin Mary is thought by some scholars to have spent her last years after she was taken there by St. John the Apostle.

"I have wanted to convey my personal love and spiritual closeness ... to the Christian community here in Turkey, a small minority which faces many challenges and difficulties daily," the pope told an intimate congregation of just 250.

He also honored the Rev. Andrea Santoro, an Italian priest who was fatally shot by a Turkish teenager in February in his church in the Black Sea port of Trabzon. The attack was thought to be linked to Muslim outrage over the publication of caricatures of the prophet Muhammad in European newspapers. Two other Catholic priests were attacked in Turkey this year.

Diplomats and commentators say in the first two days of his visit the pope has gone a long way toward reopening dialogue between Christians and Muslims who were angered over a speech he made in September in which he spoke of a medieval text that linked Islam and violence.

On Tuesday, in what some took as a rebuke of radical Islamists, Benedict urged religious leaders of all faiths to "utterly refuse" to support any form of violence in the name of their creeds.

The pope's schedule yesterday was highlighted by a meeting with Greek Orthodox Ecumenical Patriarch Bartholomew I, leader of the world's 300 million Orthodox Christians. The two major branches of Christianity represented by Bartholomew and Benedict split in 1054 over differences on the power of the papacy. The pope's deepening ties with Bartholomew, ... called the "first among equals" of the Orthodox leaders -- is watched with suspicion by authorities in Turkey as a potential challenge to state-imposed limits on Christian minorities and others. Benedict has declared a "fundamental" commitment to heal rifts between the two ancient branches of Christianity.

At Bartholomew's walled compound in Istanbul, the pope stood amid black-robed Orthodox clerics and urged both sides "to work for full unity of Catholics and Orthodox."

The Vatican yesterday dismissed a statement reportedly issued in Iraq by al Qaeda denouncing the pope's visit to Turkey as part of a "crusader campaign" against Islam.

"Neither the pope nor his entourage are worried" by the statement on a Web site, said Father Lombardi. Turkey's far-right Gray Wolves movement called a demonstration in Istanbul to be held today against the pope's visit but it was not clear whether authorities would allow the protest to go ahead.

British Find Radiation Traces On 3 Planes (NYT)

By Alan Cowell And Steven Lee Myers

The New York Times, November 30, 2006

LONDON, Nov. 29 — The case of the poisoned former K.G.B. agent took a bizarre twist when British Airways said that traces of radiation had been detected Wednesday on jets that flew between London and Moscow, establishing a possible Russian link and indicating that more than 30,000 people might have been exposed to the radiation.

The airline said tests had found “very low traces” of radioactivity so far on two of three Boeing 767s, which were singled out because the police suspected that passengers included people linked to the investigation. At least one of the planes flew between London and Moscow days before the former agent, Alexander V. Litvinenko, fell ill from the radioactive poison, polonium 210, that doctors say killed him.

The authorities did not say what substance was detected, but said the radiation posed little danger to the public.

In his last days, Mr. Litvinenko accused the Russian president, Vladimir V. Putin, of ordering his killing, a charge that Moscow has dismissed.

But the case, which has taken on cold war overtones, has clouded relations between Britain and Russia. On Wednesday, Prime Minister Tony Blair said his government was “determined to find out what happened” and stressed that “there is no diplomatic or political barrier in the way of that investigation.”

Willie Walsh, the chief executive of British Airways, said in a television interview that the three airplanes had made 221 flights, including trips to and from Moscow, since late October, carrying 33,000 people.

The airline said that, including more than 40 flights in both directions between London and Moscow, the planes had been used in flights between London and destinations including Athens, Frankfurt, Madrid, Istanbul, Stockholm, Düsseldorf, Germany, Barcelona, Spain, and Larnaca, Cyprus. The flights took place between Oct. 25 and Nov. 29, according to the British Airways Web site, www.ba.com.

While the airline said it had been told “the risk to the public is low,” it said it would contact all the passengers on the flights. Mr. Walsh encouraged them to consult health authorities if they had any concerns, adding that some 3,000 British Airways staff members would also be checked for radiation.

“The advice that we have is that the risk to public health is actually very, very low,” he said. “But I think it’s only right that we identify the flights that have been involved and make the information available to the customers.”

It is impossible to know the exact level of the health risk, if any, as the airline released no information about what substance was detected or the level of the radiation. Radiation from polonium 210 is considered dangerous to human health only if particles of the rare substance are inhaled or ingested or otherwise enter the body. Since its radiation cannot penetrate the skin, an accidental exposure aboard an airplane is likely to prove insignificant.

Mr. Litvinenko, a harsh critic of the Kremlin, died in a London hospital late last Thursday, and an autopsy is to be carried out on Friday.

According to Mr. Litvinenko’s supporters, he began to feel ill on Nov. 1, the same day he met an Italian contact in a sushi bar and two Russian men — including a former K.G.B. colleague — in a five-star hotel. Traces of radiation have been found in those and other places visited by Mr. Litvinenko on that day, according to the police.

According to the British Airways statement, however, eight of the Moscow trips flown by the three planes being examined took place before Nov. 1.

It was the first time that a physical link has been suggested with Moscow, and the first time that traces of radioactivity dating before Nov. 1 have been found. That could suggest that Mr. Litvinenko had ingested or breathed radioactive material before Nov. 1.

An official on duty at Domodedovo Airport in Moscow, Andrei D. Kositsyn, said in a telephone interview that a British Airways flight scheduled to leave Moscow around 5 p.m. on Wednesday was canceled Wednesday evening and that the aircraft was held at the airport. He said that the flight had been canceled for "technical reasons" but added that the airline had not informed airport officials of the exact reason for grounding the airplane.

He said he was not aware of any concern about radioactivity, which he said would have resulted in special precautions to quarantine the aircraft.

Another official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because of airport restrictions on contacts with news media, identified the plane as one that flew from Moscow to London on Oct. 31 and other dates.

Mr. Walsh of British Airways said the airplane grounded in Moscow would be tested there.

"Purely on a precautionary basis, scientific teams have been testing a number of locations identified as part of the police investigation over the last few days," a British Airways spokesman said, speaking on condition of anonymity under company policy. "Today they have started tests on two aircraft at Heathrow Airport and are making arrangements for a third plane to be tested."

It was not clear how the traces of radioactivity got onto the British Airways planes or whether polonium 210 had been found.

Last Friday, Andrei Lugovoi, a former K.G.B. associate of Mr. Litvinenko, denied in a radio interview that he or a colleague, Dmitri Kovtun, had any part in poisoning him when they met him in London on Nov. 1.

Speaking on Ekho Moskvy, an independent Russian radio station, Mr. Lugovoi said that he and Mr. Kovtun had met Mr. Litvinenko in a hotel on that day and had discussed business for 20 to 30 minutes.

Mr. Lugovoi later returned to Moscow but it was not immediately known how he had flown there.

An Italian consultant, Mario Scaramella, who met Mr. Litvinenko on Nov. 1 in the sushi bar, said Wednesday that he had been tested for radiation and had been cleared. Britain's Health Protection Agency said late Wednesday that 49 people working at two hospitals where Mr. Litvinenko was treated had been asked as a precaution to provide urine samples to establish whether they had been contaminated.

Spy Investigators Find Radiation On 2 British Jets (WSJ/AP)

The Wall Street Journal, November 30, 2006

LONDON -- Authorities found traces of radiation on two British Airways 767 jetliners yesterday as investigators widened their search for clues into the poisoning death of former Russian spy and Kremlin critic Alexander Litvinenko.

The airline said it would contact passengers who flew on the two jets.

Home Secretary John Reid disclosed the search following a meeting with Cobra, the government's emergency committee. Mr. Reid said two planes had been tested so far and that another would be.

The initial results of the forensic tests had shown very low traces of a radioactive substance onboard two aircraft, British Airways said. The carrier said the investigation is confined to the three planes, which will remain out of service until further notice.

All three planes had been on the London-to-Moscow route, British Airways said. In the last three weeks the planes had also traveled to routes across Europe including Barcelona, Frankfurt and Athens. Around 30,000 passengers had traveled on 220 flights on those planes, said Kate Gay, a spokeswoman for the airline.

High doses of polonium-210 -- a rare radioactive element usually manufactured in specialized nuclear facilities -- were found in Mr. Litvinenko's body, and traces of radiation have been found at sites in London connected with the investigation of his death.

Meanwhile, an Italian security expert who was one of the last people to meet with Mr. Litvinenko said that tests cleared him of radioactive contamination.

Mario Scaramella came from Rome to meet with Mr. Litvinenko at a sushi bar in London Nov. 1, the day the former intelligence agent first reported the symptoms that ultimately led to his death in a hospital's intensive-care ward.

In a deathbed accusation, the harsh Kremlin critic blamed Russian President Vladimir Putin for his poisoning. Mr. Putin has strongly denied the charge.

Probe Of Spy's Death Finds Radiation On 2 British Jets (WP)

By Kevin Sullivan And Peter Finn

The Washington Post, November 30, 2006

LONDON, Nov. 29 -- British authorities investigating the death of former Russian spy Alexander Litvinenko have discovered low levels of radiation on two British Airways jetliners, prompting the airline to ground the planes and issue warnings to as many as 33,000 passengers who traveled in the past month on those aircraft and on a third plane grounded in Moscow, company officials said Wednesday.

Airline officials said "the risk to public health is low" from contamination found on the Boeing 767 planes, but they urged passengers to call Britain's National Health Service or their doctors if they have symptoms or want information. Health officials have said the radioactive material that killed Litvinenko, called polonium-210, would have to be ingested or inhaled to be dangerous.

All three affected planes flew on the London-Moscow route, but they also made a total of more than 220 flights that landed in Barcelona; Athens; Stockholm; Vienna; Istanbul; Madrid; Larnaca, Cyprus; and the German cities of Dusseldorf and Frankfurt, airline officials said. The airline posted on its Web site, http://www.britishairways.com, a full list of flights made by the grounded aircraft dating back to Oct. 25.

The radiation found on the planes is an important new clue for investigators who are trying to solve an extraordinary case that has caused political tensions between London and Moscow. It may help determine where the polonium-210 came from as detectives follow the trail of the radioactive substance.

Airline officials said they acted at the request of government officials who are investigating the mysterious death last week of Litvinenko, 43. His family and friends have alleged that he was murdered, but police have said only that his death is "suspicious."

Traces of radiation have also been found at Litvinenko's London home, as well as a central London restaurant, a hotel and two offices that he visited Nov. 1, the day he fell violently ill.

Litvinenko's supporters allege that he was killed on orders from Russian President Vladimir Putin, an assertion that Kremlin officials have labeled nonsense. British Prime Minister Tony Blair on Tuesday called Litvinenko's death "a very serious matter" and said, "We are determined to find out what happened and who is responsible."

It was unclear Wednesday night whether police suspect that polonium-210 was carried into Britain aboard one of the planes or whether they think that people who had been contaminated by it left the country aboard one of them, or both.

Former KGB agent Andrei Lugovoy and two other Russian men who met with Litvinenko at the Millennium Hotel bar in Grosvenor Square on Nov. 1 later returned to Moscow. Police said traces of radiation were found at the hotel bar, which has been closed to the public.

Since the Litvinenko investigation started, more than 1,100 people have called a help line for those worried over possible exposure to the radioactive substance, health officials said. Eight people showing some symptoms were referred for further tests.

The two planes on which radiation had been detected were grounded at Heathrow Airport on Tuesday evening and a third remained on the ground in Moscow awaiting radiation testing, an airline spokeswoman said. A company spokesman said British Airways employees were attempting to reach all of the estimated 33,000 people who traveled on those planes, mainly by telephone and e-mail.

British Airways has also set up special telephone numbers, listed on its Web site, for people to call to determine whether they were on one of the planes in question.

Nancy McKinley of the International Airline Passengers Association in Dallas said the large number of passengers and flights involved over a relatively short time period illustrate the complexity of issues involved with airline security.

"This shows that you can't look at this industry without thinking about the global implications," she said.

In Moscow, officials reported that another prominent Russian had suddenly fallen ill. Former acting prime minister Yegor Gaidar became sick Friday at a conference in Ireland, vomiting and then losing consciousness for three hours, according to his spokesman.

Gaidar's daughter, Maria Gaidar, said that the incident had posed a serious threat to her father's life but that his condition was improving. He was transferred from Dublin to a Moscow hospital on Sunday.

Doctors have not identified the cause of the illness and are considering the possibility that Gaidar, 50, might have been poisoned, his spokesman said. Gaidar became ill in the afternoon.

Gaidar fell ill at a university just outside Dublin where he was answering questions about a new book he had written. He has been a critic of Putin's policies, particularly the increasing of state control over important sectors of the economy.

Valery Natarov, the spokesman for Gaidar, told news agencies here that "nobody has ruled out the poisoning version. It is being considered, and doctors are studying all the symptoms and consequences to cure Yegor and diagnose the causes."

A close colleague of Gaidar's, Anatoly Chubais, a deputy prime minister under Russian President Boris Yeltsin and now the head of the country's state electric company, said that Gaidar was "on the verge of death" Friday and that the symptoms did not appear to be the result of a natural illness.

Russian officials have argued Litvinenko's death stemmed from an overseas plot by disaffected exiles to discredit Putin, not an order issued by the Kremlin.

Gaidar, who served as acting prime minister under Yeltsin from June to December 1992, was one of the architects of the post-Soviet transition to a market economy. He was later reviled by many Russians who blamed him for their impoverishment during a time when favored tycoons enriched themselves from the privatization of state assets.

Radiation Found On British Airways (USAT)

By Jeffrey Stinson

USA Today, November 30, 2006

LONDON — British Airways late Wednesday sought thousands of passengers who might have been exposed to a radioactive substance found aboard two jets by investigators looking into the poisoning death of a former Russian spy.

Britain's Health Protection Agency stressed that the risk to the public was slight.

British Airways said “very low traces” of a radioactive substance were found on two Boeing 767 jetliners in London. A third Boeing 767 was grounded in Moscow.

Law enforcement authorities and airline officials would not say whether the substance was polonium-210, a rare isotope found in the body of former KGB officer Alexander Litvinenko, who died in London on Nov. 23.

Litvinenko, 43, was living in London and had become a bitter critic of Russian President Vladimir Putin. From his deathbed, he accused Putin of masterminding his poisoning.

The three British Airways planes have recently flown the London-Moscow route, and made other stops in Barcelona, Frankfurt and Athens, the carrier said. It said 33,000 passengers flew aboard 221 flightson the three jets in recent weeks; about 3,000 crewmembers and airport workers had contact with the aircraft.

The airline posted a list of the flights on its website. It asked passengers who flew them to call a help line. It urged non-British nationals to call their doctors.

Airport security screeners have equipment to check passengers and cargo for radiation, but generally use it only after terrorism warnings, said Stephen Luckey, an aviation security consultant.

Polonium-210 is used in nuclear weapons. The Health Protection Agency said in a statement, “It can only represent a radiation hazard if it is taken into the body — by breathing it in, by taking it into the mouth, or if it gets into a wound. It is not a radiological hazard as long as it remains outside the body.”

British Home Secretary John Reid said radiation tests on the airliners were part of the Litvinenko investigation.

Russia has denied any role in Litvinenko's death, which has been classified by British police as “suspicious” but not a murder. The case has chilled relations between London and Moscow. Members of Prime Minister Tony Blair's Cabinet have criticized Putin as anti-democratic and authoritarian.

Before his death, Litvinenko said he met in London with Russians who had traveled from Moscow. Traces of polonium-210 have been found at six sites he visited, including a sushi restaurant and the London offices of Russian tycoon Boris Berezovsky, a Putin critic.

Dozens of people who worked at or visited the six sites and the London hospital that treated Litvinenko have been tested for radiation exposure.

Litvinenko's body is to undergo an autopsy Friday.

Putin Calls Gaidar After Mystery Illness (FT)

By Arkady Ostrovsky

Financial Times, November 30, 2006

President Vladimir Putin telephoned Yegor Gaidar on Wednesday as the former Russian prime minister recovered in hospital from a mysterious illness friends claim was an attempt to poison him.

Kremlin sources told the Financial Times Mr Putin was concerned about Mr Gaidar’s health and wished him a speedy recovery from the violent attack he suffered in Ireland last week, the day after former Russian spy Alexander Litvinenko died in London from apparent radiation poisoning. The two men had known each other for many years and still met occasionally, the sources said.

DOJ_NMG_0100198

A colleague of Mr Gaidar, Anatoly Chubais, a top government figure under the former president, Boris Yeltsin, and now head of the country's electricity monopoly, on Wednesday blamed Mr Putin's opponents for what he feared was a poisoning attack.

Mr Chubais said the sudden bleeding and vomiting Mr Gaidar suffered while attending a conference in Dublin should be considered in the same chain of events as Mr Litvinenko's death and last month's murder of Anna Politkovskaya, a journalist.

"The version of attempted poisoning, attempted murder should undoubtedly be considered seriously," Mr Chubais said.

Mr Gaidar, who heads an economic think-tank in Moscow, told the Financial Times he had felt ill after eating a simple breakfast and collapsed in the afternoon.

Mr Gaidar said doctors were concerned for his life and he had never felt so close to death.

The illness subsided after a few hours but doctors have been unable to identify the cause of his symptoms. Mr Gaidar was in a stable condition on Wednesday, undergoing more tests at a Moscow hospital. Maria Gaidar, his daughter, said: "Doctors still can't figure out a reason for what happened."

Mr Gaidar is a soft critic of Mr Putin and has repeatedly voiced his concern about the clampdown on democracy in Russia.

However, both Mr Chubais, who himself survived an assassination attempt last year, and other people close to Mr Gaidar have ruled out the possibility of a Kremlin-sponsored attempt on Mr Gaidar.

Mr Chubais said: "For me there is no doubt that the deathly Politkovskaya-Litvinenko-Gaidar chain, which by a miracle was not completed, would have been attractive for the supporters of un unconstitutional, forceful change of power in Russia."

Mr Chubais' line corresponds with that of the Kremlin, which blamed opponents of Mr Putin for the murder of Ms Politkovskaya and Mr Litvinenko.

¦British Airways said on Wednesday that "very low traces of a radioactive substance" had been found on two of three Boeing 767 aircraft it had taken out of service after being notified by investigators probing Mr Litvinenko's death.

New Leader Vows To Oust U.S. Anti-drug Squad (WT)

By Carmen Gentile

The Washington Times, November 30, 2006

MIAMI -- Ecuador's outspoken new leader has promised to end the U.S. military's counternarcotics operations in the South American country, saying it targets rebels from neighboring Colombia.

Even though his victory will not be official until later this week , Rafael Correa, the leftist economist with a doctorate from the University of Illinois, said shortly after Sunday's election that he would not renew the agreement with the United States.

The agreement, which allows the U.S. program to operate out of an airstrip in the port city of Manta, some 140 miles southwest of the capital, Quito, expires in 2009.

Leading up to Sunday's election, Mr. Correa said he hoped to have good relations with the United States "within a framework of mutual respect."

Ecuador granted the U.S. Air Force permission in 1999 to conduct its counternarcotics flyover operations and drug-seizure missions in the region.

The Manta Forward Operating Location houses up to 475 personnel and operates up to eight aircraft. All aircraft are unarmed and support counternarcotics operations only, the U.S. military said.

Ecuador is considered one of the world's leading producers of cocaine, after Colombia and Bolivia.

Last year, the U.S. operation out of Manta seized some $640 million in illegal drugs and so far this year has confiscated narcotics totaling $2.5 billion in street value.

The U.S. forces also have arrested some 260 suspected drug traffickers so far this year, said Capt. Nancy Kuck, a U.S. Air Force public-affairs officer stationed in Quito.

Since the program's inception, the United States said it has spent $71 million on construction at the base and contributes more than $6.5 million annually to the local economy.

However, Mr. Correa is firm on ending the program, claiming Washington uses the base to carry out attacks on Colombian rebels known to hide along the porous jungle border dividing Ecuador and Colombia.

Colombian rebels from the Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia (FARC) have been known to wage attacks on Colombian forces and then flee to relative safety across the border into Ecuador. They also are known to use revenue from the drug trade to fund their decades-long war.

The U.S. military denies Mr. Correa's claim, but adds that the Manta operation would not shy away from capturing traffickers on Ecuadoran soil that were associated with Colombian groups.

"We reject any implication that the aircraft are there for any other mission other than counterdrug missions," said Air Force Master Sgt. Jose Ruiz, a spokesman for the Pentagon's Southern Command in Miami.

Mr. Correa's distaste for the U.S. presence in the region is not unfounded, said Mark Weisbrot, co-director of the Washington-based Center for Economic and Policy Research.

"I'm not sure it's in Ecuador's interest to continue to have a foreign military presence in their country," Mr. Weisbrot said. "This U.S. war on drugs is a dubious proposition. ... It's not affecting the street price of drugs here [in the United States] or the quantity available."

Other disagree, noting that Ecuador's continued cooperation with U.S. efforts to counter drug trafficking would signal to Washington the country's willingness to cooperate on other issues as well.

"Losing the Manta air base would be detrimental [to the U.S. drug program], but it would be more detrimental for Ecuador because it would confirm for Congress that Ecuador isn't keen on cooperating," said Stephen Johnson, a Latin America analyst at the Heritage Foundation.

Why Canada's Liberals Could Pick An Iraq-war Supporter As Their Leader (CSM)

By Rebecca Cook Dube

The Christian Science Monitor, November 30, 2006

TORONTO

It would be hard to imagine a more unlikely leader for Canada's Liberal Party than Michael Ignatieff, the Harvard professor-turned-politician.

He supported the deeply unpopular Iraq war, has less than a year's experience as an elected official, and has spent most of his adult life in Britain and the US.

And yet, Mr. Ignatieff is the front-runner going into this weekend's Liberal Party leadership election. With the Conservative minority government barely holding on to power, the contest's winner could be next in line to become the next prime minister of Canada.

Despite a campaign dogged by controversy, from the beginning Ignatieff has been compared to the legendary former Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau - not so much for his policies as for the aura of hope and charisma that surrounds him. Canada's liberals have been battered in recent years by scandal, allegations of widespread corruption, and a disastrous election last January in which they lost their 12-year grip on the prime minister's office.

"There's a real hunger for a more visionary, poetic leadership in Canada," says pollster Frank Graves, president of Ottawa-based EKOS Research Associates. "Michael Ignatieff is trying to tap into that. Whether he's successful remains to be seen."

At a recent campaign rally in a Toronto pub, Igantieff's fans talked about him as the Liberal Party's savior.

"I've been through them all: Pearson, Trudeau, Diefenbaker," said 75-year-old Irene Roth Romanowicz, naming Canada's most illustrious prime ministers in recent history. "His quality, his integrity - there is no man that I've met or any politician that I feel so strongly about," insisted Ms. Romanowicz, who has volunteered for Ignatieff's campaign ever since he moved back to Toronto in 2005 to run for Parliament.

Ignatieff does tend to inspire strong feelings wherever he goes. The son of a Canadian diplomat descended from Russian nobility, he first made a name for himself in England, as an academic, documentary filmmaker, and journalist. More recently, he served as director of Harvard University's Carr Center for Human Rights. While there, he dramatically split from the left with a 2003 essay in The New York Times Magazine supporting the US-led war in Iraq.

"Virtuous disengagement is no longer a possibility," Ignatieff wrote. "The disagreeable reality for those who believe in human rights is that there are some occasions - and Iraq may be one of them - when war is the only real remedy for regimes that live by terror."

Ignatieff, who met Kurdish survivors of Saddam Hussein's chemical-weapons attacks on a 1992 trip to Iraq, took pains to distance himself from the Bush administration, placing his views squarely in the frame of human rights.

But he didn't always distance himself from America, often using the pronouns "we" and "our" in essays about US foreign policy. Earlier this year, Ignatieff said he regretted his pronoun choice: "Sometimes you want to increase your influence over your audience by appropriating their voice, but it was a mistake."

While Ignatieff's decades-long absence from Canada is frequently noted, it hasn't killed his candidacy, as it might in other countries.

"Canada's colonial culture ... prizes those who have gone to the 'center' to learn," says University of Toronto political science professor Stephen Clarkson, referring to Ignatieff's sojourns in Canada's former colonial ruler, England, and its current dominant influence, the US. "It's not held against you in Canada the way it would be in the States or France or Britain."

What almost did kill off Ignatieff's run were several campaign gaffes. In August, he told the Toronto Star that he was not "losing sleep" over civilian deaths in Lebanon. Then in October, he told a French-language television show that Israel's July 30 missile strike on the Lebanese village of Qana, which killed dozens of civilians, was a "war crime."

Ignatieff's opponents used the opportunity to paint him as a bumbling political neophyte.

Then Ignatieff jumped from the frying pan into the fire with remarks late last month supporting the Liberal Party's Quebec wing's quest to have Quebec recognized as its own nation.

"I speak for those who say Quebec is a nation, but Canada is my country," Ignatieff said. His comments sparked a hailstorm from critics from across the political spectrum who blamed him for reopening a painful, divisive debate 11 years after the latest Quebec referendum on secession was defeated.

But that criticism lost some of its sting when Parliament this week overwhelmingly passed a motion put forth by Conservative Prime Minister Stephen Harper declaring that Quebeckers "form a nation within a united Canada." All but one of Ignatieff's main rivals fell in line with it, making Ignatieff look like a leader on the Quebec issue.

The controversy around his comments, though, demonstrates Ignatieff's unusual approach to campaigning. "He's not running a front-runner's typical, cautious campaign," Professor Clarkson says. "He's been acting as an intellectual, not as a politician worried about not offending important sectors of the electorate."

Whether that approach will win over the delegates he needs to become the Liberal Party's next leader will become evident once voting starts Friday night. Ignatieff's main rival is Bob Rae, a political veteran and former premier of Ontario. They are trailed by Stéphane Dion, an experienced member of parliament from Quebec, and Gerard Kennedy, a former Ontario education minister.

"Anything can happen because it's so close," Clarkson says. "The speeches will be very important." Most of the delegates at this weekend's leadership convention in Montreal are committed to one politician on the first ballot - but after that, their allegiances may shift, and any of the candidates could win. In his own words

"The disagreeable reality ... is that there are some occasions - and Iraq may be one of them - when war is the only real remedy for regimes that live by terror."

"To defeat evil, we may have to traffic in evils: indefinite detention of suspects, coercive interrogations, even pre-emptive war.... The question is not whether we should ... but whether we can keep lesser evils under the control of free institutions."

"Congress failed to put the ... case for war to adversarial scrutiny and debate. The news media allowed itself to be managed and browbeaten. The war may or may not bring democracy to Iraq ... but it hasn't done democracy any good at home."

"[America] is the last nation left whose citizens don't laugh out loud when their leader asks God to bless the country and ... further its mighty work of freedom."

EU Aims To Toughen Approach On Emissions (WSJ)

By Jeffrey Ball And Leila Abboud

The Wall Street Journal, November 30, 2006

Toughened European restrictions on global-warming emissions mark the latest sign of the political and economic difficulty in addressing the environmental problem, and come at a time when pressure is mounting on the U.S. to adopt similar caps.

In an announcement that worried business leaders across Europe, European Union officials yesterday told some member countries to impose tougher curbs on industries starting in 2008 -- a move that could increase costs for businesses -- because the European system is failing to produce big-enough emissions cuts. Under a nascent system, governments require certain industries to cap their production of carbon dioxide, a gas produced by fossil-fuel combustion that is contributing to global warming.

The EU said nine of the 10 countries that had submitted proposals for capping emissions between 2008 and 2012 had been too generous to industry. The EU told those countries that during the 2008-12 period, they must cut the emissions of their industries covered under the cap by a collective 7% from the 2005 level.

Germany, the EU's biggest economy, was ordered to cut the emissions of its covered industries by 4.4% from the 2005 level, prompting complaints from some of the country's largest firms. "We find the EU target for Germany unacceptable," said Julia Scharlemann, a spokeswoman for German power company RWE AG. "The cap is going to be a considerable burden for our company."

France withdrew its plan from consideration and plans to resubmit it in the coming weeks. Italy, the EU's fourth-largest economy, has yet to submit its plan.

The United Kingdom was the only country whose plan was approved by the EU without changes. Even in the U.K., the emissions caps are "a definite disadvantage for U.K. industry," said Clemens Huettner, a London-based emissions trader at German firm Heidelberg Cement. He said he's already seen increased imports of materials made from concrete in recent months from developing countries in Asia and Africa -- places that, unlike Europe, aren't subject to emission caps.

Yet EU officials said further emissions cuts are crucial to address global warming. "Our deeds must really match our words now," said Stavros Dimas, the EU commissioner for the environment.

DOJ_NMG_0100201

The European dispute highlights the practical difficulties of implementing global-warming-emission constraints. Europe's system has often been held out as a model for the U.S., the world's biggest producer of such gases, as it comes under growing pressure to adopt a scheme to limit emissions.

The U.S. has rejected the Kyoto Protocol, the global-warming treaty whose mandated emission cuts are behind Europe's so-called cap-and-trade system. Citing potential damage to the U.S. economy, Washington also has declined to impose domestic caps on emissions of carbon dioxide.

But pressure on the U.S. government is increasing. Yesterday, the U.S. Supreme Court heard oral arguments in a lawsuit seeking to force the federal government to regulate carbon-dioxide emissions under the Clean Air Act. A Supreme Court decision isn't expected for several months.

U.S. states have begun moving to limit carbon-dioxide emissions, largely in an effort to pressure the federal government to impose a cap. Earlier this year, California became the first state to pass an economywide limit on carbon-dioxide emissions -- a law that could be affected by the Supreme Court's ruling. Meanwhile, some leaders of the Democratic Party, which won control of Congress in this month's elections, have said they will push for legislation imposing federal global-warming-emission constraints.

Much of industry remains opposed to a potential U.S. cap, noting that it would amount to a disadvantage against competitors in developing countries like China, which even under the Kyoto accord don't face emission constraints.

That kind of lobbying led to the current dilemma in Europe, whose system imposes emission caps on utilities and energy-intensive industries such as steel, cement and paper. Together, those industries account for about half the EU's total global-warming emissions.

Senator Wants Probe Into Chinese Logging (AP)

By Matthew Daly

AP, November 30, 2006

A Democratic senator Wednesday asked the Bush administration to investigate Chinese logging practices that he said have hurt U.S. producers of hardwood used in furniture.

In letters to the U.S. Trade Representative and other officials, Oregon Sen. Ron Wyden urged the administration to investigate practices ranging from subsidies of China's timber industry to possible fraudulent labeling of Chinese hardwood plywood and illegal logging.

"Over the past few years, the U.S. hardwood plywood sector has experienced a dramatic downturn, which has put the entire U.S. industry in jeopardy," Wyden wrote, citing declines since 2003 ins U.S. production, shipment volume and market share.

"At the same time, the Chinese hardwood plywood sector has been surging. This dramatic growth in the Chinese industry — at the apparent expense of U.S. industry — is extremely troubling because it may be based on a number of illegal trade practices," Wyden said.

Wyden, a member of the Senate Finance Committee, said he would seek to hold a hearing on the issue next year after Democrats take control of Congress.

A spokesman for U.S. Trade Representative Susan Schwab said her office will review the letter. A message left Wednesday with the Chinese Embassy in Washington was not immediately returned.

Schwab, the Bush administration's top trade negotiator, said in a speech Tuesday that President Bush hopes to achieve bipartisan support for an aggressive trade liberalization agenda in the next Congress, even with Democrats in control.

Schwab warned against any move to erect protectionist barriers against imports, something that critics say are needed in the face of record trade deficits they contend are costing American jobs.

Many Democrats campaigned against Bush's trade policies this fall, saying the administration had failed to do enough to halt the loss of manufacturing jobs to low-wage foreign countries such as China. Since Bush took office in 2001, the United States has lost nearly 3 million manufacturing jobs.

Joseph Gonyea III, chief operating officer of Oregon-based Timber Products Co., said he and others in the U.S. support free trade — as long as it is fair.

"This is not a Republican or Democrat issue. This is about protecting good jobs in communities throughout our country, by ensuring that business is not only done in free trade but in fair trade," Gonyea said.

China is one of the world's fastest-growing producers of hardwood plywood, with total exports topping $13 billion last year.

A June report by the U.S. International Trade Commission said that "a relatively large portion of China's log imports may be from questionable sources." The report estimated that as much as half of China's hardwood log imports from Russia and West Africa are from suspicious or illegal sources.

For $150, Third-World Laptop Stirs A Big Debate (NYT)

By John Markoff

The New York Times, November 30, 2006

CAMBRIDGE, Mass. — When computer industry executives heard about a plan to build a $100 laptop for the developing world's children, they generally ridiculed the idea. How could you build such a computer, they asked, when screens alone cost about $100?

Mary Lou Jepsen, the chief technologist for the project, likes to refer to the insight that transformed the machine from utopian dream to working prototype as "a really wacky idea."

Ms. Jepsen, a former Intel chip designer, found a way to modify conventional laptop displays, cutting the screen's manufacturing cost to $40 while reducing its power consumption by more than 80 percent. As a bonus, the display is clearly visible in sunlight.

That advance and others have allowed the nonprofit project, One Laptop Per Child, to win over many skeptics over the last two and a half years. Five countries — Argentina, Brazil, Libya, Nigeria and Thailand — have made tentative commitments to put the computers into the hands of millions of students, with production in Taiwan expected to begin by mid-2007.

The laptop does not come with a Microsoft Windows operating system or even a hard drive, and the screen is small. And the cost is now closer to $150 than $100. But the price tag, even compared with low-end $500 laptops now widely available, transforms the economic equation for developing countries.

That has not prevented the effort, conceived by Nicholas Negroponte, a prominent computer researcher, from becoming the focal point of a debate over the value of computers to both learning and economic development.

The detractors include two computer industry giants, Intel and Microsoft, pushing alternative approaches. Intel has developed a $400 laptop aimed at schools as well as an education program that focuses on teachers instead of students. And Bill Gates, Microsoft's chairman and a leading philanthropist for the third world, has questioned whether the concept is "just taking what we do in the rich world" and assuming that that is something good for the developing world, too.

Mr. Negroponte, the founding director of the M.I.T. Media Laboratory, said he was amused by the attention his little machine was getting. It is not the first time he has been challenged for proclaiming technology's promise.

"It's as if people spent all of their attention focusing on Columbus's boat and not on where he was going," he said in an interview here. "You have to remember that what this is about is education."

Seymour Papert, a computer scientist and educator who is an adviser to the project, has argued that if young people are given computers and allowed to explore, they will "learn how to learn." That, Mr. Papert argues, is a more valuable skill than traditional teaching strategies that focus on memorization and testing.

The idea is also that children can take on much of the responsibility for maintaining the systems, rather than relying on or creating bureaucracies to do so.

"We believe you have to leverage the kids themselves," Ms. Jepsen said. "They're learning machines." As an example, she pointed to the backlight used by the laptop. Although it is designed to last five years, if it fails it can be replaced as simply as batteries are replaced in a flashlight. It is something a child can do, she said.

That philosophy, at the heart of the project's world view, has stirred criticism for its focus on getting equipment to students rather than issues like teacher training and curriculum.

"I think it's wonderful that the machines can be put in the hands of children and parents, and it will have an impact on their lives if they have access to electricity," Larry Cuban, a Stanford University education professor, said in an interview. "However, if part of their rationale is that it will revolutionize education in various countries, I don't think it will happen, and they are naïve and innocent about the reality of formal schooling."

The debate is certain to enter a new phase when the machines go into full-scale production by Taiwan-based Quanta Computer, the world's second-largest laptop maker. (The manufacturer, unlike the project itself, will make a profit.) Overnight, even though it will not be available to consumers, the laptop could become the best-selling portable computer in the world.

The project now has tentative commitments for three million computers and will begin large-scale manufacturing when it reaches five million with separate commitments from at least one country each in Africa, Latin America and Asia. Based on current negotiations, Mr. Negroponte says he expects that goal to be reached by mid-2007.

It got a significant boost on Nov. 15 when the Inter-American Development Bank signed an agreement to supply both loans and grants to buy the machines.

"Several years ago, I thought it was an illusion or a utopian idea," said Juan José Daboub, managing director of the World Bank and an independent economic-development expert. "But this is now real and encouraging."

Mr. Negroponte said the manufacturing cost was now below $150 and that it would fall below $100 by the end of 2008.

DOJ_NMG_0100203

One factor setting the project apart from earlier efforts to create inexpensive computers for education is the inclusion of a wireless network capability in each machine.

The project leaders say they will employ a variety of methods for connecting to the Internet, depending on local conditions. In some countries, like Libya, satellite downlinks will be used. In others, like Nigeria, the existing cellular data network will provide connections, and in some places specially designed long-range Wi-Fi antennas will extend the wireless Internet to rural areas.

When students take their computers home after school, each machine will stay connected wirelessly to its neighbors in a self-assembling "mesh" at ranges up to a third of a mile. In the process each computer can potentially become an Internet repeater, allowing the Internet to flow out into communities that have not previously had access to it.

"The soldiers inside this Trojan horse are children with laptops," said Walter Bender, a computer researcher who served as director of the Media Laboratory after Mr. Negroponte and now heads software development for the laptop project.

Each machine will come with a simple mechanism for recharging itself when a standard power outlet is not available. The designers experimented with a crank, but eventually discarded that idea because it seemed too fragile. Now they have settled on several alternatives, including a foot pedal as well as a hand-pulled device that works like a salad spinner.

Ms. Jepsen's display, which removes most of the color filters but can operate in either color or monochrome modes, has made it possible to build a computer that consumes just 2 watts of power, compared with the 25 to 45 watts consumed by a conventional laptop. The ultra-low-power operation is possible because of the lack of a hard drive (the laptop uses solid-state memory, which has no moving parts and has fallen sharply in cost) and because the Advanced Micro Devices microprocessor shuts down whenever the computer is not processing information.

The designers have also gambled in designing the laptop's software, which is based on the freely available Linux operating system, a rival to Microsoft's Windows. Dispensing with a traditional desktop display, the software substitutes an iconic interface intended to give students a simpler view of their programs and documents and a maplike view of other connected users nearby.

A video-camera lens sits just to the right of the display, for use in videoconferencing and taking digital still photos of reasonable quality. The computer comes with a stripped-down Web browser, a simple word processor and a number of learning programs. For e-mail, the designers intend to use Google's Web-based Gmail service.

Only one program at a time can be viewed on the laptop because of its small 7.5-inch display.

Mr. Negroponte has been a globetrotting salesman for the project, winning Libya's participation when he was summoned by Col. Muammar el-Qaddafi to a meeting in a desert tent on a sweltering August night. But there have also been setbacks. The Indian Education Ministry rejected a proposal to order a million computers, noting that the money could be better spent on primary and secondary education.

Mr. Negroponte said he had been re-energized by the recent arrival of the first 1,000 working prototypes. The prototypes, he said, will give him new ammunition to convince government leaders that his tiny machines can be a positive force for social development. [On a visit to Brazil on Nov. 24, Mr. Negroponte presented one of the prototypes to President Luiz Inácio Lula da Silva.]

He said a program would be created to enable those in the developed world to underwrite a laptop for a child in a designated country and to correspond with the recipient by e-mail as a sort of "glorified pen-pal program." But however attractive the idea of a $100 or $150 laptop, he said there were no plans to make it generally available to consumers.

"They should buy Dell's $499 laptop for now," he said. "Ours is really designed for developing nations — dusty, dirty, no or unreliable power and so on."

In his two decades as director of the Media Laboratory, Mr. Negroponte often faced criticism because the institution's impressive demonstrations of technology only occasionally led to commercial applications.

"He has spent his whole career being accused of being all icing and no cake," said Michael Hawley, a computer scientist and one of Mr. Negroponte's former students. To that kind of scoffing, he said, the laptop's success would be Mr. Negroponte's best retort.

US Concerned By Kenya Political Upheaval Ahead Of Polls: Senator (AFP)

AFP, November 30, 2006

A top US senator voiced concern over political developments in Kenya ahead of next year's general elections, as the opposition warned of mass action to protest alleged government malfeasance.

A day after the son of Kenya's revered founding president Jomo Kenyatta, Uhuru Kenyatta, was ousted as opposition leader with reported government backing, US Senator Russell Feingold said the move was troubling.

"On the face of it, the decision raises questions for me about the rule of law and transparency," said Feingold, a Wisconsin Democrat set to be chairman of the Africa sub-committee on the Senate Foreign Relations Committee.

"I see a potential danger that this electoral experience could be different from the last one," he told reporters on a visit to Nairobi.

He referred to Kenya's much-hailed 2002 polls in which Kenyatta was defeated by current President Mwai Kibaki in what many observers believed was one of Africa's most and free and fair elections.

Kenyatta had been the hand-picked successor to former president Daniel arap Moi to lead the Kenya African National Union (KANU) party, which his father had founded and had ruled the country for nearly 40 years.

But on Tuesday, he lost that position when the government recognized a splinter KANU faction and named a scandal-plagued former minister close to Moi, Nicholas Biwott, as the new party chief.

Moi, who succeeded Jomo Kenyatta as president in 1978 and ruled the country with an iron fist for the next 24 years, endorsed the decision, denouncing Uhuru Kenyatta's decision to join a larger opposition alliance.

That coalition, the Orange Democratic Movement-Kenya (ODM-K), meanwhile warned of mass protests to protest Kenyatta's ouster as KANU leader and official leader of the opposition.

ODM-K chairman Henry Kosgey said it would mobilize demonstrations to ensure rule of law prevails in the run-up to December 2007 general elections, when Kibaki is expected to seek re-election.

"We are asking the government to revoke the decision to register Biwott as the KANU chairman with immediate effect," he told reporters. "If it fails to do so, we will resort to mass action to restore the rule of law in this country."

Kenyatta, who had allied his KANU wing with ODM, said Biwott's recognition was a clear sign that the government and former president Moi were conspiring to sabotage his faction ahead of the polls.

"The impunity with which our government continues to subjugate and submerge multi-party democracy must now confound all of us," he said.

"We are an opposition party whose ultimate goal is to wrest power from the ruling party, but we did not expect the government of the day to employ crude and unorthodox means of vanquishing its opponents," Kenyatta told reporters.

Kenyatta's group voted Monday to join the ODM-K but retain its KANU identity, but the government went ahead and recognized Biwott's Moi-backed bid to register himself as the new party chairman.

Mayfield settles for $2 million; A Portland-area man, who sued the U.S. over his treatment in a bombing case, tells of ordeal

BRYAN DENSON The Oregonian

Brandon Mayfield, the Portland-area lawyer wrongly linked to the deadly Madrid, Spain, train bombings of 2004, accepted a $2 million settlement Wednesday in his lawsuit against the federal government, setting up a legal showdown over the constitutionality of the USA Patriot Act.

The United States will pay the convert to Islam $1.9 million for the emotional toll he suffered from two weeks of imprisonment as a material witness to a crime he knew nothing about, with another $100,000 going to his wife and three children for their suffering.

The government also agreed to destroy all materials seized from Mayfield's home and office. And it agreed to issue the 40-year-old lawyer another apology for FBI foulups that matched him to a fingerprint found in Madrid, leading to his investigation as a possible terrorist.

At a news conference Wednesday in a downtown Portland high-rise, the lean, bespectacled lawyer likened his ordeal to an Orwellian nightmare.

"I am talking about the George Orwell frightening brave new world in which Big Brother is constantly watching you, complete with 24-hour surveillance, thought control and doublespeak," Mayfield said. "Where war means peace. Freedom is slavery. Ignorance is strength. Where torture is morality. And an act that strips you of your civil rights could be called a Patriot Act."

Mayfield and his wife, Mona, said the $2 million settlement will help pay their lawyers and put their children through college. But they said the money could never make them whole for what they described as illegal violations of their privacy.

"To this date," Mayfield said, "the government has refused to tell us where they placed their electronic listening devices and cameras, leaving myself and family to forever wonder if they were listening to our most private conversations, watching our most intimate interactions."

The Mayfields hired celebrity lawyer Gerry Spence of Wyoming, prominent Portland civil rights attorney Elden Rosenthal and Newport attorney Michele Longo Eder, to sue federal officials, contending that he was targeted because he is a Muslim. The lawsuit also challenged the constitutionality of a provision of the USA Patriot Act.

Mayfield said he would continue to pursue his challenge to key provisions of the 2001 law, including one that allows searches without requiring the government to show probable cause that a crime has been committed.

The lawyer was taken into custody by federal agents in May 2004 and detained for two weeks as a material witness in the Madrid bombings. But he acknowledged that he and his family felt they had been watched well before the arrest, including the day they found dirty shoe prints on a clean carpet in their home, a place in which shoes were never worn.

"The government agents came into my home," said Mona Mayfield. "They bugged my home. They tapped my phone lines and terrorized my family -- and simply because we're Muslim."

Robert Jordan, the special agent in charge of the FBI in Oregon, disputed the contention that Mayfield was targeted because of his faith. He pointed out that the event triggering the investigation was a fingerprint found in a bag of detonators in Madrid; only later did the FBI learn that the lawyer was Muslim.

"If the same fingerprint identification came in again, we would do the exact same thing," Jordan said. "Not only did we do nothing wrong here, but everything we did was premised on a fingerprint identification. Our investigation was extremely thorough and extremely professional."

"But the investigation," Jordan acknowledged, "was built on sand, because the investigation was predicated on this fingerprint that the (FBI) lab later determined they were wrong about."

Two weeks after Mayfield's arrest, Spanish investigators linked the fingerprint to an Algerian national. Mayfield was released from custody the same day.

The Mayfield case prompted reforms of FBI fingerprint analysis procedures, Jordan said. Agents are now more circumspect in the manner by which they take fingerprint data, which must now be corroborated by an independent investigator, he said.

Jordan publicly apologized to Mayfield when the FBI acknowledged the fingerprint error in May 2004. But Wednesday, by agreement of the government and Mayfield's lawyers, it was the U.S. Department of Justice's turn to apologize.

"The United States acknowledges that the investigation and arrest were deeply upsetting to Mr. Mayfield, to Mrs. Mayfield, and to their three young children," the Justice Department wrote, "and the United States regrets that it mistakenly linked Mr. Mayfield to this terrorist attack."

Wednesday's settlement amounts to part one of Mayfield's case against the U.S. government. The settlement allows the lawyer to continue his lawsuit challenging the constitutionality of the Patriot Act provision that put him under secret surveillance.

Prior to enactment of the Patriot Act, government agents could, under the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, get a judge's approval for wiretaps and other surveillance only if they could show their primary purpose was to investigate a foreign agent as part of a matter of national security.

The Patriot Act changed that law, said Rosenthal. Government agents can now get permission for the secret surveillance by saying their investigation is partly rooted in an international terrorism case.

"Here Mr. Mayfield fell right in the cross hairs," Rosenthal said. "They were investigating the crime of international terrorism, and without presenting probable cause to anybody that Mr. Mayfield could be connected to the crime, they got all these warrants."

Mayfield is challenging the law on grounds that it violates constitutional search-and-seizure constraints.

Constitutional law professor Carl Tobias, a professor at the University of Richmond, said he was leery of a challenge to the Patriot Act on grounds that it allowed flimsy pretexts for government snooping. "But that doesn't mean you shouldn't try," he said.

Rosenthal said lawyers for Mayfield and the government will set up a briefing schedule in the next week or two. The case is expected to be argued before U.S. District Judge Ann Aiken early next year.

Spence told reporters Wednesday that the Patriot Act should worry all Americans.

"We have some secret agents," he said on a conference line from Jackson Hole, Wyo., "who file secret papers that we can never see. And they're filed in a secret proceeding, and no right is given to the citizens . . . And out of those secret papers comes a secret order. And then people come secretly to your house, and they secretly break into your house. And they secretly put in listening devices.

"So that secretly the entire lives of these people become the property -- not of us, not of the parties, not of the citizens -- but our private lives become the property of the United States government. . . . So that this becomes their asset.

"They've stolen the most sacred part of our lives."

Mayfield settlement still leaves a lot to be settled

I t was just possible, at Wednesday afternoon's news conference to announce a partial settlement in Brandon Mayfield's case against the U.S. government, to reassure oneself that the system worked.

After all, the Beaverton attorney -- who was arrested and held and had his office and home secretly searched and monitored following a fingerprint misidentification -- is receiving $2 million and an apology from the government that abused his rights and his family.

But the experience of the case, and the procedures and the laws involved, argue that the system is still a ways from working. Just how far will be considered by another Mayfield lawsuit, challenging the constitutionality of parts of the U.S.A. Patriot Act, and new congressional judiciary committees likely to take a more challenging view of expanding claims of government power.

Mayfield, an active Muslim convert, was arrested in May 2004 after Spanish officials reported a computer match of his fingerprint with one found on a bag of detonators after a massive terrorist train bombing in Madrid. The match turned out to be false, and Spanish investigators doubted it well before the fingerprint was matched to a Moroccan militant and Mayfield was released.

But by then, Mayfield had been held for two weeks as a material witness on charges that could bring the death penalty, and his home and office were searched -- with cameras and microphones installed -- under sections of the Patriot Act allowing the government to act in secret and give him no opportunity to challenge the actions.

Mayfield's experience, pointed out his attorney Gerry Spence, was based on "secret papers that we can never see, and out of those papers came a secret order, and then people come secretly to your house, and they secretly break in."

Any government will always make mistakes, and this outcome shows that the U.S. government can still be held accountable. Robert Jordan, special agent in charge of the Portland FBI, insisted Wednesday that aside from the fingerprint misidentification, "We are very proud of what we did here."

But a cloak of secrecy makes it hard to check government power or defend citizens' rights, to know just how much Mayfield's Muslim identity overwhelmed doubts about the evidence that the Spanish raised very early in the process. It makes it impossible for Mayfield to know, even now, what the FBI learned about him and who else might know it now.

"There's a part of me that walked into the Multnomah County Detention Center," said Mayfield, "that never walked out."

You could sit in the news conference Wednesday and conclude that the system worked.

But you'd also conclude that it needs to work better.

German who alleges CIA torture urges U.S. congressional oversight of the agency

By DESMOND BUTLER, Associated Press Writer

WASHINGTON_Khaled el-Masri claims he was kidnapped by American intelligence agents in Europe, drugged, blindfolded and flown to a prison in Afghanistan, where he was tortured in abject conditions far from the rule of law.

Now the Kuwaiti-born German citizen has come to the country he accuses of abusing him. On Wednesday, el-Masri was in Washington recounting his allegations of physical and mental abuse with hopes of encouraging Congress to exact greater oversight of CIA activities and force the U.S. government to acknowledge what happened to him.

"I really want to raise awareness in the Congress so that they can bring some pressure to bear and make changes," el-Masri said after he briefed Senate aides and reporters Wednesday.

A federal\l "l" appeals\l "l" court\l "l" in Richmond, Virginia, heard arguments Tuesday by el-Masri's attorneys that a lawsuit he filed against the former head of the CIA should be reinstated. He arrived Sunday from Germany, attended Tuesday's hearing and planned two days of briefings on Capitol Hill.

"What really matters to me is that I would like to know why this was done to me, and I want an explanation and an apology," he told reporters, speaking of his lawsuit. "I think that we can all benefit from what happens in my case, including others who are still in prison in other parts of the world without the rule of law."

El-Masri alleges he was kidnapped while attempting to enter Macedonia for a vacation on Dec. 31, 2003. He claims that after 23 days of being held and interrogated in a hotel, he was flown to a CIA-run prison known as the "salt pit" in Kabul, Afghanistan. During about four months of captivity there, he says, he was beaten and sodomized with an object. One masked interrogator, he said, told that he was beyond the rule of law and could be buried without a trace.

"The conditions that I was confronted with were not fit for a human," he told reporters, speaking in German. Besides being tortured, he said, he was fed barely edible food and putrid water.

"It was like water you left in an aquarium for years," he said. "When you took one sip, the taste stayed in your mouth for hours."

The CIA has refused to comment on el-Masri's allegations, which have put a spotlight on the intelligence agency's secret rendition program to deliver captured terror suspects for interrogation in foreign countries. The practice has been heavily criticized by human rights groups.

El-Masri's lawsuit, filed against former CIA director George Tenet and others, was dismissed in May by a judge who ruled that a trial could harm national security by revealing details about CIA activities.

El-Masri, said he still trusts in American justice and bears no ill-will toward Americans.

"But I do have a lot of grievances against the people who have permitted this to happen and who have tried to sweep it under the rug," he told Senate staff members.

ACLU lawyer Ben Wizner told the court in Richmond on Tuesday that el-Masri was "the public face of a publicly acknowledged program." Since the basics of the rendition program already are common knowledge through media reports, he argued, the lawsuit could be considered without exposing state secrets.

Greg Katsis, a lawyer for the U.S. Justice Department, argued that the government properly invoked its state secrets privilege to protect information outlined in a classified affidavit that Judge T.S. Ellis III read before dismissing the lawsuit

El-Masri's allegations also are the subject of a German parliamentary investigation that is trying to clarify when German government officials became aware of el-Masri's case and whether German security services participated in interrogations in Afghanistan.

KBR to settle Balkans overcharging case for $8 million

By DAVID IVANOVICH
Copyright 2006 Houston Chronicle Washington Bureau

WASHINGTON — Houston's Halliburton Co., has agreed to pay $8 million to settle a long-running dispute with the U.S. Army over alleged overbilling for work in the Balkans, the Justice Department said today.

The agreement resolves allegations under the False Claims Act regarding purchase orders Halliburton subsidiary KBR awarded to 10 foreign subcontractors in 1999 and 2000.

KBR, which has admitted no wrongdoing, had been accused of double-billing and providing products that didn't conform to the army's specifications during construction of Camp Bondsteel in Kosovo.

The government also had alleged the company inflated prices by failing to ensure adequate competition when making procurements.

"The Department of Justice remains committed to vigorously pursuing allegations of procurement abuses affecting the military," Peter Keisler, assistant attorney general for the Justice Department's civil division.

Company spokeswoman Melissa Norcross, in an e-mail, said "KBR is pleased to confirm the close of the United States' investigation into KBR's government contracting in the Balkans in 1999 and 2000."

Judge Orders Agency to Restore Aid to Katrina Evacuees

By SHAILA DEWAN

The Federal Emergency Management Agency must restore housing assistance, and pay back rent, to thousands of Hurricane Katrina evacuees who had been deemed ineligible for long-term housing assistance, a federal judge ruled today.

The judge, Richard J. Leon of federal district court in the District of Columbia, wrote that the agency must also improve an appeals process that evacuees had long said was confusing, contradictory and amounted to an arbitrary denial of help.

“It is unfortunate, if not incredible, that FEMA and its counsel could not devise a sufficient notice system to spare these beleaguered evacuees the added burden of federal litigation to vindicate their constitutional rights,” the judge wrote.

The suit was brought by Acorn, a housing advocacy group that runs the Katrina Survivors Association. Michael Kirkpatrick, a lawyer with the nonprofit group Common Ground, who represented Acorn, said that according to numbers provided by FEMA in court papers, as many as 11,000 families could be affected by the ruling.

A spokesman for FEMA, Aaron Walker, said the agency had not yet decided whether to ask a higher court to stay the ruling.

Last spring, FEMA began notifying thousands of families who were given emergency shelter after the storm that they did not qualify for long-term help in the form of rent and utility payments. That came as a surprise to most of the families, who had been given housing vouchers good for a year.

For months, families who had lost everything struggled to understand why they had been rejected and how to appeal that decision.

In a process that Judge Leon called “Kafkaesque,” families received notification letters that contained “reason codes” instead of actual reasons, were given different information each time they called FEMA’s help line, or found that FEMA had erroneously determined that their home had “insufficient damage” or that someone else in their household (often a roommate) had already applied for assistance.

Bill White, the mayor of Houston, where many evacuees wound up, was so outraged by the ineligibility rulings that he sent a team of building inspectors to New Orleans to prove that the evacuees’ original homes were uninhabitable.

“Some families were told ‘Reason for denial: Other,’ and there’s no explanation for what other means,” Mr. Kirkpatrick said. Some families received two letters listing two different reason codes.

The judge said that FEMA’s lack of clarity amounted to a deprivation of due process rights, pointing out that FEMA itself admitted that thousands of families had been incorrectly ruled ineligible.

But in a statement issued after the ruling, Mr. Walker, the FEMA spokesman, continued the agency's longstanding defense of the process, saying that FEMA had given applicants 60 days to appeal and had listed the required qualifications.

"Additionally, FEMA established a team dedicated to handling appeals on an expedited basis and initiated calls to applicants in an effort to help them understand what documentation was needed to process their case," Mr. Walker wrote.

The process of transferring families from emergency housing to long-term help began last spring, but Mayor White repeatedly persuaded FEMA to delay evictions while they reviewed each family's file.

Those families who managed to stay in FEMA-funded apartments until the end of August are entitled to reinstatement of rent payments and reimbursement for three month's worth of back rent, the judge ruled. As a result of the decision, all families deemed ineligible, no matter when, will get a more thorough explanation of the reason and how to appeal it.

Shut your eyes: Can you tell a $1 from a $5? Maybe soon; Bills may change shape, size to help the blind

By Barbara Hagenbaugh
USA TODAY

WASHINGTON — Americans have seen sweeping changes in their currency in recent years, from the addition of a rainbow of colors on bills to a rotation of quarter designs honoring U.S. states. But one of the most dramatic changes may be yet to come.

Following a judge's ruling this week that U.S. bills discriminate against blind people, the government may be forced to change the nation's paper currency so that everyone can easily distinguish one denomination from another.

The most likely option would be different sizes of bills so that blind people could measure one bill against another to determine each bill's value. Such a system is used throughout the world. Other options include imprinting the money with Braille or adding textures.

The government argued that such changes would be too costly. But U.S. District Judge James Robertson said here that the government failed to prove that such a burden outweighed the need to make money more accessible to blind people, whose rights are protected by law. He also noted that the USA is the only country that does not make its currency easily recognizable by those with vision problems.

"There was a time when disabled people had no choice but to ask for help — to rely on the 'kindness of strangers,' " he wrote. "We have evolved, however."

Robertson gave the government 10 days to appeal the decision.

"We have made no determination as to what the government's next step will be," Justice Department spokesman Charles Miller said.

Rep. Pete Stark, D-Calif., says he plans to dust off a bill he first introduced in 1979 that would differentiate bills by cutting off different corners of currency.

"It seems inexpensive and simple," he says.

The government's argument that it would cost too much to differentiate denominations "doesn't hold water," says Dennis Forgue, head of the currency department at Harlan J. Berk, a Chicago numismatic and antiquity firm. "It's not something that's hard to do."

But vending machine owners say approximately 1.5 million machines in the USA would have to be altered at a cost of $50 to $400 each, depending on the change in the bills, National Automatic Merchandising Association chief counsel Tom McMahon says. "We are terribly disappointed," he says.

Anita Calkins, 67, went blind after getting glaucoma in 1990. She folds her bills so that different denominations are folded different ways. When receiving change in stores, she asks clerks to hand her the bills individually from higher denomination to smaller denomination.

"It takes a little while, and I know it slows up everybody behind me," the New Mexico resident says.

Says plaintiff Patrick Sheehan, 53, of Silver Spring, Md.: "We're hoping that the Department of the Treasury will not appeal this case and … do what the rest of the world has done."

Blind inmate's claim that prison withheld eye drugs is reinstated

By LARRY NEUMEISTER, Associated Press Writer

NEW YORK_A California man who said he went blind in prison because he was denied medication can try to hold prison officials responsible, a federal appeals court ruled as it reinstated a lawsuit that had been tossed out by a judge.

The decision by the 2nd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals means Rodney Thomas can pursue his claim that authorities failed to ensure he received medication for glaucoma after he was arrested by Drug Enforcement Administration agents in Los Angeles on Sept. 7, 2001.

Jon Romberg, a law professor at the Seton Hall University School of Law who handled the appeal with two third-year law students, Kathryn Diehm and Adam Wells, said he was "happy" with the ruling.

"The court reinstated his case and most importantly recognized that prison supervisors can be liable if they know about a serious medical problem and fail to correct it," Romberg said.

He said Wednesday he had not been able to notify his client, who is incarcerated at a California prison where his telephone use is limited.

The appeals court, in an 11-page decision handed down Tuesday but made public Wednesday, upheld a lower court's ruling that the DEA agents could not be held responsible in federal court in New York, but it reinstated the lawsuit against three prison officials.

The three-judge panel noted that a federal magistrate judge at Thomas' first court appearance in New York issued an order directing that he receive glaucoma medication. Present at the hearing were two of three prison officials named as defendants in the lawsuit _ the warden and the clinical director at the Metropolitan Correctional Center in Manhattan.

"Where, as here, prison officials were personally instructed by a federal judicial officer to see to an inmate's urgent medical needs, by that fact alone they are personally involved," the appeals court wrote.

Thomas' lawyers told the appeals court that his vision was within normal limits when he was arrested but had deteriorated to legal blindness three months later because his prescription eye medications were not delivered consistently.

The arresting agents took away the medication he carried with him and he was mostly denied treatment as he was transferred from Los Angeles to New York to face charges resulting from a probe of a drug ring possibly stretching from New York to California, they said.

In addition, they said, a doctor at the New York Eye and Ear Clinic wrote to the prison to say Thomas had not received his medication and was at "high risk for blindness" without them.

In court papers, lawyers for the government argued that the prison officials could not be held responsible because they did not directly administer health care to inmates.

A spokeswoman for federal government\l "l" lawyers\l "l" handling the case said there would be no comment Wednesday.

Thomas' lawsuit, alleging an unconstitutional denial of medical care, sought $750,000 in damages.

Thomas was convicted of drug charges; Romberg said he didn't know how long his prison sentence is.

Group: Sarbanes-Oxley needs to loosen up; Today ' s plea to focus on USA ' s ability to compete

Greg Farrell

A group of prominent business executives and academics is planning to issue a call today for government regulators to ease up on the enforcement of the Sarbanes-Oxley Act. The group, dubbed the Committee on Capital Markets Regulation, asserts that some elements of the stringent law, which was passed in the wake of accounting meltdowns at Enron and WorldCom, have threatened the USA's leadership position in the global capital markets.

While the group has no legal standing, its recommendations are expected to be taken seriously by Congress, the business community and the Securities and Exchange Commission, which is expected to discuss the paper's contents at its public meeting Dec. 13. The reasons:

*Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson gave his blessing to the group in September, saying it was important for U.S. capital markets to remain competitive.

*Several lawmakers, including Sen. Chuck Schumer, D-N.Y., have publicly bemoaned the fact that foreign companies have been scared away by the USA's regulatory environment and increasingly looked to London or other financial centers to list their shares.

*One of the co-chairs of the group, Columbia Business School Dean Glenn Hubbard, served as chairman of the Council of Economic Advisers under President Bush.

According to Hal Scott, the Harvard Law School professor who spearheaded the study, recent trends in litigation and regulation threaten to undermine the USA's position as the world's dominant capital market.

Scott says that 40 years ago, onerous banking regulations drove U.S. banks to London, where they helped spark the growth of the Eurobond market. He sees a similar trend with initial public offerings: Fewer than 10% of foreign companies that went public in the last year did so in the USA.

"We've got a major problem here," he says.

The solution, according to the committee, is to change the legal environment in the USA, where class-action lawyers win billions in settlements from public companies each year; ease up on Section 404 of the Sarbanes-Oxley Act, which forces even small companies to spend several million dollars to establish strong internal accounting controls; and urge the SEC to ensure its rules make sense from a cost/benefit point of view.

Jack Coffee, an expert in securities law at Columbia who consulted on the project, doesn't think over-regulation has scared away foreign issuers. Instead, he says, the threat of getting sued in U.S. courts is more of a concern.

Scott says the study was funded by the Starr Foundation, a group headed by former AIG chairman Maurice "Hank" Greenberg, and a philanthropist who didn't want to be named.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Ruling Due On Moussaoui Evidence (AP)

By LARRY O'DELL, THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

AP, December 1, 2006

Sept. 11 plaintiffs' lawsuit goes to court based in Richmond

A federal appeals court in Richmond will decide in coming weeks whether some families of the Sept. 11 victims should be given evidence from the trial of confessed al-Qaida conspirator Zacarias Moussaoui for civil lawsuits filed in New York.

U.S. District Judge Leonie Brinkema of Alexandria has ordered the government to give the plaintiffs nonsensitive information that prosecutors turned over to Moussaoui's attorneys but was never introduced at his trial.

DOJ_NMG_0100219

Justice Department lawyer Steven Lane yesterday urged a three-judge panel of the 4th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Richmond to overturn that ruling. He argued that Brinkema lacked authority in the New York cases and that there is no precedent for allowing civil plaintiffs to intervene in a criminal case.

Lane said the case isn't about whether the plaintiffs are entitled to the evidence; it's about the proper procedures for obtaining it.

"We're prepared to respond in good faith to discovery requests made in New York under settled civil-discovery procedures," Lane said, adding that "there was no need for the district court to create from whole cloth a novel procedure" in this case.

Nathan Lewin, attorney for the plaintiffs, argued that Brinkema properly exercised her discretion to allow access to the evidence in "an unusual case involving victims of the worst terrorist act in the history of mankind."

Appeals court Judge Roger Gregory asked if Brinkema's order amounts to an open door for any citizen to intervene in a criminal case.

It does not, Lewin said, because Brinkema made it clear that this is a rare case in which the plaintiffs have demonstrated a compelling need for the evidence.

"This group of civil litigants, their rights should be viewed as importantly as the criminal prosecution of someone who allegedly participated in the terrorist act," Lewin said.

About 6,600 plaintiffs are listed in three negligence lawsuits against parts of the airline industry and those alleged to have financed the terror group that hijacked airplanes and crashed them into New York's World Trade Center, the Pentagon and a Pennsylvania field.

In her April 7 order, Brinkema said the Sept. 11 plaintiffs enjoy special privileges as a result of legislation passed by Congress. Lane argued that the legislation says nothing about allowing civil discovery in a criminal case.

Moussaoui, the only person in this country charged in the attacks, was sentenced to life in prison in May after a jury found him responsible for at least one death on Sept. 11.

The government has said it provided more than 2 million pages of unclassified documents to Moussaoui's defense. Classified documents are exempt from Brinkema's ruling.

The appeals court usually rules several weeks after hearing oral arguments.

No Domestic Spying In Ohio Terror Case (WP/AP)

By Andrew Welsh-huggins, The Associated Press

The Washington Post, December 1, 2006

COLUMBUS, Ohio -- A federal judge who dismissed a challenge of the Bush administration's domestic spying program said the case against a convicted al-Qaida supporter was built on statements he made to investigators, not evidence from warrantless eavesdropping.

The challenge by Iyman Faris, now serving a 20-year prison sentence, was among the first to seek evidence of warrantless eavesdropping by the National Security Agency, a practice that began after the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001.

Judge Leonie Brinkema of the Eastern division of the U.S. District Court in Virginia dismissed his challenge earlier this month; her ruling was unsealed Wednesday.

The case against Faris rested on statements he made to investigators, "not on statements Faris had made to third parties that might have been intercepted," Brinkema wrote.

Faris, a former Ohio truck driver, pleaded guilty in 2003 to a plot to destroy the Brooklyn Bridge. He has tried to withdraw his plea, saying he had no connection with al-Qaida and his first attorney gave him bad advice about pleading guilty.

Faris has argued that his terrorism conviction should be thrown out on the grounds that the government illegally spied on him. He said investigators improperly obtained evidence against him and that his trial lawyer was ineffective.

The government has said information from a court-ordered wiretap led them to Faris. But Brinkema said her review of government documents found no evidence that the "constitutional rights of Faris were infringed by the manner in which his name came to the attention of the FBI."

Faris' attorney David Smith said Thursday that his client wants to appeal the case as far as possible. Phone messages seeking comment were left with the U.S. attorney's office.

Two Britons Facing Extradition To U.S. Lose Court Appeal (WP/AP)

The Washington Post, December 1, 2006

LONDON, Nov. 30 -- Two British men charged with terrorism-related offenses may be extradited to the United States, a court ruled Thursday.

Lawyers for Haroon Rashid Aswat and Babar Ahmad argued that, despite U.S. assurances, there was a risk that the men would be mistreated, or tried and sentenced as enemy combatants.

Dismissing the appeal, Lord Justice John Laws said that argument "would require proof of a quality entirely lacking here." The court did not immediately rule on whether the two men could appeal the decision to the House of Lords.

Ahmad faces charges of supporting terrorism, conspiring to kill Americans and running a Web site used to fund terrorists. Aswat is accused of plotting to set up a camp in Bly, Ore., to train Islamic fighters.

Dodd Proposes Restoring Rights For Terrorism Suspects (NHR)

By Mary E. O'Leary

New Haven Register, December 1, 2006

Christopher Dodd, Connecticut's senior U.S. senator, has proposed revamping the newly authorized military commissions to restore habeas corpus protections for terrorism suspects, as well as to curb executive interpretation.

U.S. Sen. Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., is expected to co-sponsor the legislation, according to Dodd's office.

Habeas corpus is a writ ordering that a person in custody be brought before a court; it places the burden of proof on those detaining the person to justify the detention.

Dodd also has written to President Bush, asking that implementation of the commissions be delayed until a new secretary of defense is given a chance to scrutinize elements of the new law.

Bush has proposed that Robert Gates replace Donald Rumsfeld, who has been defense secretary for the past six years and the main strategist behind the Iraq war.

Although there will be a majority of Democrats in the Senate when the 110th Congress convenes in January, it is not clear whether Dodd will be successful in convincing his colleagues to adopt his proposal. The 51-49 Democratic majority is not capable of overriding a presidential veto.

The Supreme Court threw out the commissions as originally defined by the Bush administration and Congress enacted a revised system this fall which limits the usual courtroom rights of defendants, allows the president to interpret the meaning and application of the Geneva Convention and removes judicial review of all habeas claims brought by detainees.

It also grants retroactive protection to U.S. personnel who engaged in rough treatment of prisoners, allows the CIA to continue its once-secret program of detaining prisoners overseas and broadens the definition of enemy combatant.

In signing the bill in October, the president said it was needed in the fight against terror. "It is a rare occasion when a president can sign a bill he knows will save American lives," Bush said at the time.

Trials are expected for the 14 senior al-Qaida members recently transferred to Guantanamo Bay in Cuba, but advocates for the other 400 detainees fear the lack of habeas corpus leaves the majority of them in limbo.

A study of those being held at Guantanamo found that more than half were not picked up on the battlefield in Iraq or Afghanistan, but were picked up in Pakistan and turned in for bounty payments.

Dodd feels the lack of habeas corpus protections for detainees undermines the moral authority of the United States and puts American servicemen and women in jeopardy.

"There is a right way to do this and a wrong way to do this. It's clear that people who perpetrated these horrendous crimes against our country and our people have no moral compass and deserve to be prosecuted to the full extent of the law. But in taking away their legal rights, the rights first codified in our country's Constitution, we're taking away our own moral compass as well," Dodd said.

A Lawyer In Marine Corps Khaki Wins Australian Support For His Guantánamo Client (NYT)

By Raymond Bonner

The New York Times, December 1, 2006

SYDNEY, Australia, Nov. 29 — David Hicks, a 30-year-old Australian who is about to begin his sixth year at Guantánamo Bay, is gaining supporters for his release from diverse quarters.

The rock singer Bono made an appeal during a concert in Brisbane. One of Australia's pre-eminent writers, Richard Flanagan, dedicated his most recent novel, "The Unknown Terrorist," a searing indictment about authorities and journalists who have effectively rounded up innocent individuals, to him.

On Monday, the attorneys general from Australia's eight states and territories sent a letter to the federal attorney general demanding that Mr. Hicks be brought home, and asking 10 specific questions about the conditions of his detention.

They wrote the letter after meeting with the man who has become the star of the David Hicks show, as it were, Michael D. Mori, a major in the United States Marine Corps.

With short-cropped hair, and a burly chest full of ribbons, Major Mori is Mr. Hicks's appointed military lawyer, and this month, sponsored by the Australian Lawyers Alliance, a trial lawyers group, he took his PowerPoint appeal across this vast continent, from Brisbane, on the east, to Perth on the west.

In Sydney, an audience of some 600 — students, lawyers, workers — applauded thunderously when he finished.

The audience here included Mamdouh Habib, in a suit and ponytail, looking far more fit than when he was released from Guantánamo, in early 2005; the Bush administration declined to prosecute him, which would have allowed evidence that he had been tortured after being taken to Egypt to be heard in court.

Major Mori was on his sixth visit here. In his short-sleeved khaki Marine Corps shirt, green trousers and highly polished black shoes, he made the case for Mr. Hicks's release. He began with a blowup of an article from The New York Times Magazine: "Rahmahullah Hashemi was the Taliban's chief spokesman abroad. So how did he end up at Yale?"

"This is the hypocrisy," Major Mori began. "I get up every morning and scratch my head that David Hicks is in Guantánamo for five years and the chief spokesman for the Taliban is at Yale." He feigned bewilderment. The audience loved it.

American and Australian officials have said that Mr. Hicks trained with Al Qaeda, and was picked up on the field of battle, in October 2001. But they say he did not shoot any American solider, or any civilian, during the war in Afghanistan.

If Mr. Hicks is returned to Australia, he will be a free man, because training with Al Qaeda was not a crime in Australia at the time.

Australia's intelligence agency considers Mr. Hicks a dedicated enemy of the West. The Australian counterterrorism police, however, see him as a misguided soul, a wanderer in search of meaning.

A high-school dropout — too much drinking and drugs, too little studying, his parents have said — Mr. Hicks spent time in the Outback skinning kangaroos before going to Japan, where he broke horses. For an unknown reason, he went off to Kosovo during the Balkan wars to fight with the Kosovo Liberation Army, a Muslim guerrilla force. The war ended before he could fight.

He came home, to Adelaide, in southern Australia, and tried to join the Australian Army, but was turned down. "He's a soldier wannabe," Major Mori says. He attended an evangelical church for a while, found that unsatisfactory, then started attending the local mosque, and eventually converted. He made his way to Pakistan and Afghanistan.

"All it would take is a phone call from John Howard, and David Hicks would be coming home," Major Mori told his audience here. Britain had its citizens released, he noted. Then, seeming to goad the Australian government further, he said that even Pakistan and Afghanistan had obtained the release of their citizens.

Major Mori's meeting with the state attorneys general seemed to have an impact on Mr. Hicks's case.

"We were shocked by Major Mori's account of the day-to-day treatment of Hicks," Bob Debus, attorney general for the state of New South Wales, of which Sydney is the capital, said in an interview.

"Neither I, nor any of my colleagues, have any particular sympathy for David Hicks," Mr. Debus said. "But we have a bedrock commitment to the principles by which he should be dealt with."

DOJ_NMG_0100222

Michael Pelly, a spokesman for Philip Ruddock, the federal attorney general, said the Australian government was extremely frustrated that Mr. Hicks had not yet been brought to trial. It has repeatedly expressed this frustration to the Bush administration, Mr. Pelly said. “Nobody in this government is happy about the length of time this has taken,” he said in an interview.

During Mr. Ruddock’s most recent trip to Washington, he was told that the suspected senior Qaeda operatives now at Guantánamo, like Khalid Shaikh Mohammed, would be tried first. “Our response was, can’t you walk and chew gum at the same time, can’t you have multiple military commissions?” Mr. Pelly said.

Major Mori has been “a very effective advocate,” Mr. Pelly said. “He’s very popular in Australia.”

Raiding Your Inbox (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, December 1, 2006

IN THE LATEST illustration of the Bush administration's disregard for your privacy, the Justice Department is trying to convince a panel of federal judges that the FBI should be free to read your e-mail without obtaining a warrant.

It's not all your e-mail — only messages left on a Web-based system such as Hotmail or on your Internet service provider's computers. A 1986 law forbids the interception and disclosure of e-mail and other online transmissions without a warrant. But there is an exception. If the messages are more than 180 days old, they can be obtained merely with a subpoena or a court order, which investigators can obtain more easily than a warrant.

Now the Justice Department is arguing, in a case before an appeals court in Ohio, that even new messages can be obtained without a warrant if their intended recipient has already read them. The Justice Department views an opened e-mail left on a service provider's computer as more like a postcard left on a table than a sealed letter in a drawer. Which is to say, its owner has no reasonable expectation of privacy.

About a jillion e-mail users would beg to differ. The Internet is far more popular, and connections to it more persistent, than they were in 1986. Yahoo, Google and other Web-based services offer vast storage capacity to users, enticing them to treat their online inboxes as file cabinets. Part of the utility of these services is that they enable people to keep all their e-mail in one place that can be reached from any Internet-connected computer, not just the one in their home or office.

The change in technology not only makes the Justice Department's position absurd, it undermines the law's 180-day limit. When the law was drafted, e-mail was typically stored by Internet service providers only until a user dialed in and checked his or her account. It would then be sent to the subscriber's computer and deleted from the provider's servers. Lawmakers set the 180-day threshold to distinguish between wanted but unread mail and messages in an abandoned account. Now users store e-mail on the Web for years.

Given these changes, U.S. District Judge Susan Dlott was right last month to find that e-mails stored online cannot be read by investigators without a warrant. (The case involves a business owner accused of fraud.) The Justice Department's view is inconsistent with the 4th Amendment, although it is in line with the administration's tendency to trample privacy rights in pursuit of suspected criminals and terrorists.

The U.S. 6th Circuit Court of Appeals should rein in the feds and strike down the provisions of the law that are out of sync with the technological realities of the broadband era — and the privacy expectations of Americans.

Mayfields' Home Goes From Safe To Sinister (OREG)

By Joseph Rose

The Oregonian, December 1, 2006

Privacy - Small changes, shoe prints and a growing feeling that someone is watching traumatize family

The dirty blue Toyota minivan rolls into the gravel driveway. From behind the wheel, Mona Mayfield smiles. Her husband, riding shotgun, looks frazzled, hardly in the mood for company.

A day after accepting $2 million from the U.S. government, which wrongly linked him to the deadly 2004 Madrid train bombings, Brandon Mayfield steps out of the vehicle. Two years after he was locked up as a possible suspect in an act of terrorism he knew nothing about, the often-disheveled, soft-spoken Muslim still seems reluctant to go into detail about what his family endured.

"I want to write a book," he says.

Then, with a sigh, he relents, offering an invitation into his Beaverton home. The settlement money is for his family's suffering. People, he says Thursday, should get a taste of what their government is paying for.

Unlocking the bottom of two deadbolts on the front door, Mona Mayfield steps past a bowl of spent cigarette butts, picks up a gift basket left on the front step, and gives a warning.

"It's a little messy," she says. "We haven't been around much."

Brandon Mayfield pulls off his loafers. "We don't wear shoes in the house," the 40-year-old lawyer says. "That's one of the ways we knew they had been here, breaking in and watching us."

Weeks before the FBI took Brandon Mayfield into custody on May 6, 2004, in the bombings that killed 191 in Spain, the family found dirty shoe prints on a clean carpet in their oldest son's room.

Actually, the Mayfield house is as neat as a pin. Volumes of the Holy Quran, gold lettering decorating their spines, sit on a shelf next to a television. A fire burns in a wood stove.

"I guess I'm happy I settled, but I have mixed feelings," he says. "I envisioned my day in court. I guess I'm a little disappointed I couldn't shed a little more light on what happened behind the scenes."

It's also hard, he says, to shake the chill left by the government secretly spying on him.

FBI foulups linked Brandon Mayfield to a fingerprint found in Madrid. Agents got permission under the USA Patriot Act to set up surveillance inside the family's home.

What conversations did they hear? What intimate moments did they see? It's a secret. Mayfield will never know.

Noticing that the conversation is being taped, he stops. Please, he says, turn off the recorder.

Mona Mayfield walks in from the kitchen. At first, she says, they thought a burglar was getting into the house while they were gone during the day. "We never lock the top deadbolt on the door," she says. "Twice, I came home, unlocked the bottom bolt and the door wouldn't budge. Someone had locked the top piece."

Once, she found the clocks in the house blinking. She called PGE to ask about the power failure. "They told me there hadn't been an outage," she recalls.

The day Brandon Mayfield, an Army veteran, was arrested at his West Slope law office may have been the worst.

Mona Mayfield was at home. FBI agents knocked on the door. Entering the house, they said something about a fingerprint and the Madrid bombing. She couldn't believe it. It had to be a mistake. Leaving the house with federal agents rummaging through belongings, Mona Mayfield went to pick up her children from school. She told them their father had been thrown in jail as a material witness in a terrorism case.

At first, they thought she was joking. Then they broke down. At home, they turned on the television to find pictures of their father flashing in a nightmarish rhythm with video footage of the train-bombing carnage.

Jail was "dark and ugly"

Sharia, who was 12, walked to the television. "She touched her hands to the screen," Mayfield recalls. "She started to cry. She said, 'Daddy, you never complained about anything. You're so nice. How could this happen to you?' "

Hearing the story from his wife, Brandon Mayfield tries to hold back tears. He removes his spectacles, wipes his eyes.

He says he doesn't want to talk about his two weeks in jail. "Other than to say it was dark and ugly," he says.

During that time, he says, his children heard taunting at school about their dad being a terrorist.

Samir was 10. On the day his dad was released from jail, the boy was glued to his father, afraid he would be taken away again, Mona Mayfield says. He refused to sleep in his room or go outside to get groceries from the car after dark. "He'd say, 'I'm afraid of the FBI,' " she says.

In the months after, Shane, who is now in college, began to struggle in school and lost his joy of soccer and dragon-boat racing.

Mona Mayfield wants to move. The house holds too many bad memories, she says. "I don't know when that will happen," she says.

During their sneak-and-peak ventures into the Mayfield home, the FBI took, among other things, more than 300 photos as well as hair samples and six cigarette butts, the Mayfields say. "I'm the smoker," Mona Mayfield explains.

DOJ_NMG_0100224

Brandon Mayfield continues to pursue his challenge of the constitutionality of the Patriot Act. "This happened because I am a Muslim," he says.

Mayfield finishes a bowl of cream of mushroom soup and says he has to get going. He has a 2 p.m. live interview with Court TV at the KATU studios in Northeast Portland.

In the driveway, a gray Buick Skylark is parked next to an old Toyota with a "Stop George Bush" bumper sticker. Mayfield takes the Skylark.

Law practice suffers

Driving down Oregon 8 toward Portland, Mayfield says it took him months to stop checking his rearview mirror to see whether someone was following him.

The other day, at his law office, the fax machine stopped working. Something was wrong with the phone line. The phone company couldn't explain it. "Something like that still makes me nervous," he says.

Mayfield's family law practice, which provided little more than a slow and steady income before his arrest, suffered for months, he says. "Some clients were afraid I was still being bugged," he says. "One insisted on going to the coffee shop in my building to talk."

He brakes at a red light and says business is better, but some things have changed. "I have more Muslim clients now," he says, hitting the gas.

Someone honks. Mayfield looks up and notices the light hasn't turned green.

He speeds up, cruising through the red light, causing the blue plastic Muslim prayer beds hanging from the rearview mirror to start dancing.

In the aftermath of the settlement, Mayfield says he has avoided "the mainstream media." Most traditional television stations and newspapers, he says, painted him as a terrorist before the facts were known. Since then, few have done more than cursory investigations into the FBI's stumbles, he says.

Mayfield won't say how much of the $2 million will go to pay his attorney bills. "Let's just say it's a big chunk," he says.

Near the Skylark's gear shift, a real estate flier advertises a "well-maintained, stylish home in the Miller highlands."

In the KATU studio, Mayfield finds himself on a couch again, sitting in the lobby, waiting to go before the cameras for Court TV. A station employee stops to tell him the wait will be short. He asks her whether MSNBC might be interested in talking to him.

Mayfield wants some privacy with his attorney, Elden Rosenthal. They speak for about 10 minutes before Mayfield says he is done talking for this story. Preparing to go on national television, he says the questioning has worn him out.

The two men get up and disappear into the studio.

Looks like we'll have to wait for the book.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Specter: No New Spy Law For Now (PHI)

By Steve Goldstein

The Philadelphia Inquirer, December 1, 2006

WASHINGTON - Sen. Arlen Specter (R., Pa.) said yesterday that attempts to legislate review of the government's domestic surveillance program were virtually dead for this year and expressed doubts that a solution would soon be found under a Democratic-controlled Congress.

"We could legislate on the subject next week, but we're not going to for a great many reasons," Specter said, referring to the remaining weeklong session on the congressional calendar. "Why Congress can't come to grips decisively, eludes me.

"I think it would be ideal to have congressional oversight on the program in detail, and I look forward to what will happen next year," he told an American Bar Association gathering. "I have grave reservations as to how successful we will be, given the administration's unwillingness to share those secrets."

The outgoing chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee used the speech to highlight the panel's achievements during his two years as leader, but he also groused about "endless unproductive activity of Congress" and the failures of congressional oversight to review controversial Bush administration programs.

Specter said FBI Director Robert Mueller would testify before his panel Wednesday on whether law enforcement and intelligence agencies are sharing information.

The 9/11 terrorist attacks "could have been prevented if the CIA and the FBI had communicated," Specter asserted.

He reserved his harshest criticism for inaction on the warrantless surveillance program conducted by the National Security Agency. "No one wants to allow al-Qaeda to make plans for another attack... but it's a matter for justification," Specter said. "The president does not have a blank check."

The terrorism-surveillance program, as the NSA effort is known, was secretly approved by President Bush in the weeks after the 2001 attacks.

For five years, the NSA - which is barred from spying within the United States - has monitored tens of thousands of international phone calls and e-mail messages to and from people in the United States.

Specter and many Democrats - including Sen. Patrick Leahy of Vermont, who will succeed him as chairman - believe the program violates the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act of 1978. That law requires that court orders be obtained to eavesdrop on people inside the United States.

Bush acknowledged the existence of the secret program a year ago, after reports about it were published. The White House wants legal authority to continue it, saying it is an invaluable tool in tracking communications with al-Qaeda and other terrorist groups.

After initially calling the program an abuse of presidential authority that "can't be condoned," Specter has been trying to forge a compromise between the administration and Congress that would allow it.

A Leahy spokesman said "more answers" were needed before legislation could be adopted.

Cyberthreat Against Online Trading And Banking Sites Is Called Baseless (USAT)

By Mimi Hall

USA Today, December 1, 2006

WASHINGTON — A jihadist website warns that attacks will be launched beginning today against online stock trading and banking websites, but it's highly likely that the threat is baseless, the Homeland Security Department said Thursday.

“There is no information to corroborate this … threat,” Homeland Security spokesman Russ Knocke said.

He said the U.S. Computer Emergency Readiness Team (CERT), an interagency group that monitors cyberthreats, informed financial services “out of an abundance of caution as a routine matter.”

A government official familiar with the threat said a militant Islamic website warned of a “denial of service attack” and said many financial services websites are well-fortified to withstand such an attack even if it came.

The official would not allow his name to be used because of the sensitivity of divulging information about companies' security capabilities and intelligence gathering.

The potential terrorist threat is the latest to be made via the Internet. In October, the Homeland Security Department notified football stadium owners in seven cities about postings on numerous websites that alleged radioactive bombs would be set off during upcoming games.

The messages set off a brief scare before federal authorities announced they were a hoax. A 20-year-old Wisconsin grocery clerk was later charged by federal authorities with making a terrorist threat over the Internet. Prosecutors alleged that the man, Jake Brahm, posted the threats as a prank.

The charge carries a maximum sentence of five years in prison and $250,000 fine.

Authorities said Brahm admitted posting the same threat about 40 times on various websites over several weeks.

Financial Firms Are Warned Of Terrorist Cyber Threat (WSJ)

By Robert Block And Randall Smith

The Wall Street Journal, December 1, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0100226

Homeland Security officials warned the nation's financial institutions of a possible terrorist cyber threat from al Qaeda, but played down the danger, saying the scheme was "more aspirational than operational."

"There is no intelligence corroboration," said Homeland Security spokesman Russ Knocke, adding that the warning was issued out of "an abundance of caution."

A government official said the alert followed a message-board posting yesterday from al Qaeda sympathizers, urging followers to join in cyber attacks against U.S. financial targets over the next month.

Financial institutions took the warning in stride, with many of them indicating that they get such warnings from time to time and that this particular warning hadn't changed their level of vigilance.

An alert was sent to computer experts by the department's Cyber Emergency Response Team, a group that keeps computer users and industry alert to potential computer dangers. But the official said there is little evidence suggesting that the threat was credible or even real.

The threat allegedly came from a previously unknown group called the e-Jihaddi hackers, who called on Islamic computer experts and non-Muslims to participate in attacks on U.S. banks and financial institutions. The group called for a "Guantanamo" revenge raid on "infidel banks" and said non-Muslims willing to help "will be welcomed." Counter-terrorism experts said the group was looking to send Internet worms and viruses to bank Web sites to try to deny bank services to customers.

Financial institutions are among the best-prepared sectors in the country when it comes to defending against cyber attacks. Because of threats to daily trade from hackers, cyber crooks and identity thieves, banking and financial trading houses have developed robust electronic security. Since the Sept. 11 attacks, all aspects of security across the industry have increased.

A spokeswoman for TD Ameritrade Holding Corp., based in Omaha, Neb., said the online broker is "aware of the threat." She added, "We are always prepared for these types of incidents, and we really can't disclose further information about that because it would be compromising our security."

A spokesman for San Francisco-based Charles Schwab Corp., which offers online trading, said, "We are keeping a careful eye on the situation with a variety of monitoring and security measures that we have in place."

A spokesman for CME Group Inc., which operates the Chicago Mercantile Exchange, said in an email that "We take all aspects of security seriously." Representatives for NYSE Group Inc.'s New York Stock Exchange and Nasdaq Stock Market Inc. declined to comment. Representatives at major banks and other securities firms couldn't be immediately reached for comment.

Imam Disputes Tie To Hamas (WT)

By Audrey Hudson

The Washington Times, December 1, 2006

Omar Shahin, one of six imams removed from a flight last week, says he has traveled the country since the September 11 attacks to promote understanding of the Muslim religion, but he once worked for a group linked to terrorist financing. He insists that the terrorists who leveled the World Trade Center were not Muslims.

Mr. Shahin says he cut ties to KindHearts after the Treasury Department began investigating the group, that "true Muslims" do not murder and were not responsible for the attacks on the Pentagon and World Trade Center.

"If they claim they are Muslim, they are wrong," Mr. Shahin said yesterday in a telephone interview. "Despite what religion they claim, even if they are all Arabs, to say they are Muslims is wrong, completely wrong.

"We have been asked by God and by the prophet Muhammad to respect all human life. The Koran is very clear, to save one life he saves all human life, and whoever kills one person, he kills all humankind, and that is what Islam is all about."

Mr. Shahin was a representative and fundraiser for KindHearts, which the Treasury Department says "coordinated with Hamas leaders and made contributions to Hamas-affiliated organizations," in a Feb. 19 statement after freezing the groups' assets.

KindHearts was established by Khaled Smaili, an official with the Global Relief Foundation, after the government froze the al Qaeda-affiliated foundation's assets, according to the Treasury Department.

"When they shut down, I had no clue what they were doing," Mr. Shahin said. "I made sure they are licensed as an American organization with the federal government and states, and that's all I did, I was just a fundraiser and representative.

"I stopped and have no relations with anyone, anymore, because they are under investigation."

Mr. Shahin said that KindHearts donated money, through his efforts, to the tsunami victims in Southeast Asia, to Southerners hit by Hurricane Katrina, and to the Red Cross in the wake of the September 11 terrorist attacks.

Mr. Shahin lives in Phoenix and is the president of the North American Imam Federation, which serves the spiritual and tangible needs of Muslim scholars, helps them improve their relationship with the community, and encourages Muslims to observe the Islamic acts of worship.

He has a doctorate in Islamic law and is a professor at the Graduate Theological Foundation. He also received degrees in Islamic study from universities in Sudan and Saudi Arabia, and holds a diploma in Koranic recitation from the University of Jordan.

He is a native of Jordan and is a naturalized American citizen.

Mr. Shahin is the spokesman for the imams who attended his federation's conference last week in Minnesota and were evicted from US Airways Flight 300 because of suspicious behavior.

The imams dispute the account of seven witnesses, including two law-enforcement officers, that the imams shouted hostile slogans and took unassigned seats in a pattern used by terrorists. Mr. Shahin calls the reports "exaggerations" and "false statements."

"I did everything normal, I did not do anything that is not normal in my mind." He said he and his colleagues were removed from the plane because three of the men said prayers in the concourse.

Mr. Shahin said they did not orchestrate the event to create a lawsuit or make a public issue of profiling Muslim passengers.

"We love US Airways, and we want to fly with them," Mr. Shahin said. The Council on American-Islamic Relations will pursue a lawsuit on the imams' behalf, Mr. Shahin said.

Mr. Shahin says they were not led off the plane in handcuffs, as reported, nor were they kept in handcuffs during their five-hour detention, and they were not harassed by dogs.

Witnesses and aviation-security officials say security concerns arose because of the seating arrangement which resembled a controlled pattern used by the September 11 hijackers -- two in front, two in the middle, two in the rear of the plane. Law-enforcement officials say the men were not in their assigned seats.

The request by three passengers, including Mr. Shahin, for seat-belt extensions, also concerned flight attendants. "That was a dead giveaway," one federal air marshal said yesterday. Flight crews are cautioned about giving out seat-belt extenders because you can turn it into a weapon very easily. You swing that belt buckle, and you can potentially kill someone."

Mr. Shahin says that after they were questioned and released, US Airways declined to sell them another plane ticket, even after an FBI agent intervened at the imam's request. "I told him, 'Please sir, to call them.' And he did and talked for more than 20 minutes. He was trying to tell them we have no problem with the government and we can fly with anybody, but they still refused. He told me, 'I'm sorry I did my best.' I really appreciated it."

Paul McCabe, FBI spokesman in Minneapolis, says no such call took place on behalf of the men. "That never happened," Mr. McCabe said.

Imams' Eviction From Plane Reflects Tough Post-9/11 Calls (USAT)

USA Today, December 1, 2006

After the Sept. 11 attacks, the need for tougher scrutiny of passengers at airports was glaringly obvious. So was the potential for innocent Muslims to be treated like criminals.

Last week, those two concerns collided head-on at the Minneapolis airport.

Six Muslim clerics returning from a religious conference were removed from a US Airways flight after passengers and crew reported suspicious behavior to the pilot. The imams were questioned by authorities and released.

The imams charge that they were singled out because they prayed quietly in Arabic at the gate before boarding and have demanded an investigation. “Flying while Muslim,” they appropriately note, is no more an offense than “driving while black,” a reference to the common complaint of African-Americans pulled over without credible cause.

If there were nothing more to this episode, the clerics would have grounds for outrage. Ethnic profiling violates American values and shouldn't be the basis for traffic stops or airport security.

But behavioral profiling — assessing the pattern of what people do in the context of the known threats — makes sense. Based on the official report of what crew and passengers told police, it appears that the clerics' behavior lacked self-awareness or was intentionally provocative. Either way, it provided reasonable grounds for concern:

•A passenger handed a note to a flight attendant saying that the six men were cursing U.S. involvement in Iraq before the flight, mentioning Saddam Hussein and chanting “Allah” several times. A gate agent said he became suspicious “by the way they were praying very loud.” Another passenger said one imam expressed extreme fundamentalist views.

•An off-duty flight attendant on the plane and other passengers told police the men switched their seat assignments to a configuration associated with the 9/11 attacks, with two in first class, two in the middle and two in the rear. One imam made two trips to the back of the plane during boarding to speak to his colleagues, the attendant said.

• Three of the men asked for seat belt extenders, which they didn't appear to be portly enough to need. The extenders, which consist of a metal buckle and belt that could be used as weapons, weren't attached to the seat belts but were found on the floor.

The combination of these events caused the pilot to request the men's removal.

Some facts in this case are in dispute and warrant further investigation. If nothing else, it underscores the tough judgment calls that airline crews and security personnel have to make under tight time pressure.

Ethnic profiling must be avoided, but fear of being wrong shouldn't make passengers and crew shy about alerting authorities to suspicious behavior. That would jeopardize safety for all passengers, Muslim and non-Muslim alike.

U.S. Assigns Terror Score To International Travelers (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, December 1, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 30 (AP) —Without notifying the public, federal agents for the past four years have assigned millions of international travelers, including Americans, computer-generated scores rating the risk they pose of being terrorists or criminals.

The travelers are not allowed to see or directly challenge the risk assessments, which the government plans to hold for 40 years.

The scores are assigned to people entering and leaving the United States after computers assess their travel records, including where they are from, how they paid for tickets, their motor vehicle records, past one-way travel, seating preference and what kind of meal they ordered.

The existence of the program, the Automated Targeting System, was quietly disclosed earlier in November when the government published details about it in the Federal Register. Privacy and civil liberties lawyers, Congressional aides and law enforcement officers said they thought the system had been applied only to cargo.

The notice, by the Department of Homeland Security, called the program “one of the most advanced targeting systems in the world.” The department said the nation’s ability to spot criminals and other security threats “would be critically impaired without access to this data.”

Still, privacy advocates view the program with alarm. “It’s probably the most invasive system the government has yet deployed in terms of the number of people affected,” said David Sobel, a lawyer at the Electronic Frontier Foundation, a civil liberties group devoted to electronic data issues.

Government officials could not say whether the program had led to the arrest of any terrorists.

A similar Homeland Security project for domestic air travelers, now known as Secure Flight, caused a furor two years ago in Congress. Lawmakers barred its use until it passes 10 tests for accuracy and privacy protection.

DOJ_NMG_0100229

Mr. Sobel said the government notice also raised the possibility that faulty risk assessments could cost innocent people jobs in shipping or travel, government contracts, licenses or other benefits.

The notice said the data may be shared with state, local and foreign governments for use in hiring decisions and in granting licenses, security clearances and contracts. In some cases, the data may be shared with courts, Congress and private contractors.

Phoenix Test Site For TSA X-ray (USAT)

By Thomas Frank

USA Today, December 1, 2006

WASHINGTON — The federal government plans this month to launch the nation's first airport screening system that takes potentially revealing X-ray photos of travelers in an effort to find bombs and other weapons.

Transportation Security Administration screeners at Phoenix Sky Harbor International Airport will test a "backscatter" machine that could vastly improve weapons detection but has been labeled a "virtual strip search" by the American Civil Liberties Union. Backscatter can show clear images of nude bodies.

At Phoenix and another yet-to-be-decided test airport, the machines will blur or shade images to obscure body parts and medical devices. The TSA also will look at using the machines in subways.

"It's time to get them out and get feedback from [screeners] and the traveling public," said Randy Null, TSA assistant administrator. The TSA has been considering the machines since 2002 while struggling with privacy issues.

Null said the TSA is now "very comfortable" with privacy protections manufacturers have built into the machines, which scatter low-intensity X-rays to peer under clothing for hidden items.

Barry Steinhardt, head of the ACLU's technology and liberty program, said operating the backscatter machines at airports will pave the way for widespread use — and abuse. "As this technology becomes commonplace, you're going to start seeing those images all over the Internet," Steinhardt said. "These images are going to have high commercial value."

In the upcoming airport tests, the machines will be used only on travelers who require extra screening beyond a metal detector. Those passengers will be offered the option of being photographed from the front and back by the backscatter machine or undergoing the customary pat-down by a screener.

Null said the machines could some day replace metal detectors if they can operate faster than the 15-20 seconds backscatter takes to screen one passenger.

Backscatter machines, used in prisons and at Customs checkpoints to find drugs, have been touted as an improvement to metal detectors, which don't sound alarms for plastic or liquid explosives or ceramic knives. The Homeland Security Department inspector general singled out backscatters last year as a way to close a loophole at checkpoints.

The Phoenix airport, the nation's eighth busiest, will get a machine made by American Science and Engineering of Massachusetts. In a nod to privacy considerations, the machines will show only blurred outlines of travelers but will enable screeners to see weapons.

The blurred images "trade off detection for a level of privacy," said Richard Mastronardi, company vice president. The fuzzier photos "start to lose the ability to see … C4" plastic explosives, he said.

The TSA will test a similar machine that generates blurred images using electromagnetic waves. Using the machines on suspicious subway passengers is "a ways off," the TSA's Null said. The TSA could recommend but not require them in subways.

FEMA Chief Says Agency Has Learned Lessons From Katrina (MCT)

By James Rosen

McClatchy Newspapers, December 1, 2006

WASHINGTON - Federal Emergency Management Agency director David Paulison, chosen to head the troubled disaster-relief agency in the aftermath of the Hurricane Katrina debacle, said Thursday it has made huge strides in the 15 months since the historic storm.

DOJ_NMG_0100230

Paulison, a former firefighter picked by President Bush to rebuild FEMA's ability and reputation, pointed to a series of organizational and procedural changes that are designed to clarify the roles of the various federal, state and local agencies during a disaster and to speed relief to those stricken.

While Paulison was bullish on the changes at his agency, which was roundly criticized for its failures during Katrina, there has been little independent evaluation of FEMA's new actions to improve its response.

In a report on Sept. 6, the Government Accountability Office found that "there is little information available on the extent to which these changes are operational."

During his speech at the National Press Club, Paulison ticked off more than a dozen improvements driven by the need to operate under a new vision.

"All responses are local, but we no longer wait for local folks and the states to be overwhelmed before we step in." he said. "That old model simply does not work. It has to be an all-for-one, one-for-all type of response."

Paulison said his agency has made dramatic changes since Katrina, some of them required by a FEMA-overhaul bill Bush signed into law eight weeks ago.

"It was a wakeup call for all of us," Paulison said of Katrina. "We've all learned a lot of lessons. The biggest single failure in Katrina was communications and how we shared information."

Paulison said he doesn't agree with some lawmakers' calls to make FEMA an independent department again, saying its inclusion in Department of Homeland Security helps improve coordination with other agencies. Paulison said he has frequent and direct contact with Bush.

In a series of questions from reporters, Paulison declined to directly answer when asked whether New Orleans levees that collapsed in Katrina's aftermath should be built to withstand Category 5 hurricanes - rare but the most powerful storms.

"I support all levees (in the country) being the best they can possibly be," he said.

Paulison said people in evacuation zones need to take personal responsibility, adding that those who refuse to leave increase the burden on first responders.

In a related matter, Paulison expressed surprise over a federal judge's ruling Wednesday that the federal government must make immediate payments to 11,000 displaced Gulf Coast families.

"I was very disappointed in the judge's decision," Paulison said. "This is almost one of those things where no good deed goes unpunished. We felt we did the right thing."

District Judge Richard Leon said FEMA failed to give enough notice to the 11,000 families or to adequately explain why agency was cutting off their aid.

Paulison, though, said FEMA extended the temporary housing aid to thousands of Katrina victims for up to 60 days longer than required by law. He declined to say whether the government would appeal the court ruling.

Noting that some Florida residents still have FEMA-funded temporary housing because of 2004 storms, Paulison said, "FEMA can't house people forever."

A Miami native, Paulison ran the Miami-Dade Fire Rescue Department from 1992 to 2001. He headed the emergency-preparedness division of the newly formed Department of Homeland Security in 2003 and 2004. Congress folded FEMA into DHS in the legislation establishing the super-agency.

Jonathan Lee, who works in Washington for a management consulting firm, grew up on Hilton Head Island, S.C. He and his family were evacuated before Hurricane Hugo struck the Carolinas in 1989, though Hilton Head was spared. Lee also endured Hurricane Fran in 1996 while he was a student at Campbell University in North Carolina.

Lee agreed that people must take personal responsibility, but he said many folks grow numb to danger after repeated evacuations.

"People get sick of leaving," Lee said. "If you live in a hurricane zone, you're evacuated three times a year. After 30 years, Hilton Head in my lifetime hasn't been hit by a major storm. Yet people there have been evacuated at least once a year."

LESSONS LEARNED

DOJ_NMG_0100231

The Federal Emergency Management Agency has made great strides in the 15 months since the Hurricane Katrina debacle, director David Paulison said Thursday.

He was named the head of FEMA in September 2005, less than a month after Katrina devastated the Gulf Coast.

Here are the main changes Paulison cited, some of them mandated by a FEMA overhaul bill that President Bush signed into law Oct. 4:

Bureaucratic improvements:

-Nine of FEMA's 10 regional offices have permanent directors with extensive disaster-management experience, with candidates for the 10th being interviewed now. Only two had such leaders when Katrina hit.

-Closer ties within the Department of Homeland Security with Border Control, the Coast Guard, the Transportation Department, the National Guard and other agencies involved in disaster response.

-A new partnership with the Pentagon's Defense Logistics Agency, which is expert in moving supplies quickly from shipping goods to U.S. troops around the world.

-Clarified roles for local, state and federal agencies around the country. Regular meetings with governors and local-disaster managers. Can videoconference with representatives from all states.

-"Memos of understanding" specifying the jobs of private firms, the Red Cross and other volunteer groups.

Operational upgrades:

-New "first teams" can deploy quickly, using video cameras to shoot and distribute pictures of destruction nationwide via computer.

-Four times more emergency supplies on hand, enough to feed 1 million people for a week; some of it already sent to vulnerable areas.

-"Total Asset Visibility": 20,000 trucks and other vehicles have global positioning system devices, which enable managers to find them immediately.

-"Contingency contracts" that outside suppliers, builders and other vendors can use when disaster hits.

-Debris registry of 300 approved nationwide contractors whom people can contact immediately.

-Beefed-up customer service. Higher call capacity that can register 200,000 people a day. Mobile registration centers that go to stranded people.

-Increased home inspections, to 20,000 a day.

-Better tools to prevent and identify aid fraud and abuse.

-Outside experts hired to train FEMA staff in human resources, budgeting, procurement, data management and other areas.

FEMA Director Calls For Stepped-up Disaster Preparations, Cooperation (FEDT)

By Stephen Losey

Federal Times, November 30, 2006

More cooperation and preparation at the Federal Emergency Management Agency and all levels of government will help prevent a repeat of the Hurricane Katrina debacle, the nation's top emergency manager said Nov. 30.

FEMA Director David Paulison said in a speech in Washington that the federal government no longer can afford to wait until state and local emergency responders are overwhelmed before acting. This has been FEMA's past strategy, and it helped contribute to a sluggish response to the storm and ensuing flood that devastated the Gulf Coast region last year.

"Responding to all disasters, catastrophic or otherwise, must now be viewed from the perspective of 'all for one and one for all,' " Paulison said.

FEMA is likewise trying to build up its relationships with other federal agencies. Paulison said FEMA was isolated even from its fellow agencies in the Homeland Security Department, though one of the goals of creating the massive department was to encourage interagency cooperation.

Paulison said he now meets every week with heads of agencies such as Immigration and Customs Enforcement, and the Coast Guard to discuss ways to improve disaster preparation and response.

DOJ_NMG_0100232

Likewise, FEMA is coordinating with the Defense, Health and Human Services, and Transportation departments, U.S. Northern Command and the National Guard to clarify roles and assign responsibilities before disaster strikes.

FEMA Ordered To Resume Katrina Housing Payments (AP)

By By Matt Apuzzo

The AP, December 1, 2006

The director of the Federal Emergency Management Agency said Thursday he was disappointed that a judge, in a sharply critical ruling, ordered the agency to resume housing aid to thousands of Hurricane Katrina evacuees.

"It's almost a thing of no good deed goes unpunished," Director R. David Paulison told reporters at the National Press Club. "We felt like we did a good job."

The decision was one of two court battles won by Hurricane Katrina victims this week, but both could prove short-lived. The other ruling was against insurance companies.

U.S. District Judge Richard J. Leon's ruling Wednesday criticized FEMA for cutting housing funding and subjecting victims of the 2005 storm to a convoluted application process he called "Kafkaesque."

Leon said FEMA mishandled the transition from a short-term housing program to a longer-term program this spring and summer.

FEMA officials, already under fire for responding too slowly to the storm, said the agency sent letters outlining the program changes, explaining why some people were ineligible and describing the appeals process.

Leon, however, said those letters contained only program codes and agency jargon and did not explain anything. Some evacuees got multiple letters with conflicting information, he said, leaving families unable to understand why their aid was being cut.

Until FEMA explains itself and allows victims to appeal, Leon said the government must keep making housing payments.

"It is unfortunate, if not incredible, that FEMA and its counsel could not devise a sufficient notice system to spare these beleaguered evacuees the added burden of federal litigation to vindicate their constitutional rights," Leon wrote.

Paulison said he thought the agency handled the situation correctly. "We used the same forms that we have used for decades," he said Thursday.

In his ruling, Leon cited statements submitted by evacuees describing the ordeal.

"The reasons I have been given for the termination are not what is in the documents and/or the reasons change each time I call," said Carmen Handy, an evacuee whose statement was cited. "Every time I call back, the person answering the call knows nothing about what the previous person told me."

Leon's ruling came in a case brought in August by the Association of Community Organizations for Reform Now, which said more than 11,000 families would be affected. FEMA did not immediately have data on how much the ruling would cost and said it was considering its legal options.

ACORN Spokesman Charles D. Jackson said the advocacy group was trying to spread word about the ruling through the scattered communities of evacuees, some of whom were left homeless by FEMA's decisions.

"Because the government didn't do their job, we're suffering," said Carolyn Stevens, a Katrina evacuee living in Houston.

Other evacuees sided with FEMA and said the program has been going on long enough.

"It's really making them lazy. They need to get back to work," said Lela Logan, a New Orleans native who said she got a job and rebuilt her life in Houston.

In the other case, on Monday, a federal judge in Louisiana said that many homeowners might be entitled to more insurance money for flood damage. Insurers pledged to appeal.

U.S. District Judge Stanwood Duval Jr. sided with New Orleans homeowners who argued that the language in some insurance policies that excluded water damage was ambiguous. He said a suit against The Allstate Corp., The St. Paul Travelers Companies Inc. and other insurers could go forward.

Duval said the policies did not distinguish between floods caused by an act of God — such as excessive rainfall — and floods caused by an act of man, which would include the levee breaches following Katrina's landfall on Aug. 29, 2005.

If successful, this suit could cost insurers $1 billion in Louisiana alone, industry officials said, and could lead to similar suits elsewhere.

FEMA Chief 'disappointed' In Rental Assistance Ruling (PALMBEACHP)

By Larry Lipman

Palm Beach Post (FL), December 1, 2006

WASHINGTON — The director of the Federal Emergency Management Agency said Thursday he was "disappointed" by a federal judge's ruling that the agency must resume rental assistance to thousands of people displaced by Hurricanes Katrina and Rita last year.

The decision by U.S. District Judge Richard Leon proves that "no good deed goes unpunished," R. David Paulison said at a National Press Club luncheon.

"We thought we did the right thing. We thought we did the best job we could" to make sure residents were properly notified why their rental assistance was being cut off.

FEMA spokesman Aaron Walker said after Paulison's speech that the agency is still considering whether to appeal Leon's ruling.

In the ruling, the judge said FEMA created a "Kafkaesque" process that unconstitutionally denied residents a clear understanding of why their assistance was being terminated and made it difficult to appeal.

The ruling affected about 10,000 people in a temporary housing program known as Section 403 who were rejected when they were required to apply for another FEMA program - Section 408 - that provides cash rental assistance for three months at a time.

Paulison said FEMA's role is to provide only temporary housing, and that the agency was under pressure from its inspector general to verify that the people receiving the housing aid were eligible.

He said the agency examined each aid application and discovered that some beneficiaries were already covered by housing insurance, some were not residents of counties affected by the storms and some did not meet the statutory requirements of being a legal U.S. resident.

The agency gave residents whose aid was going to be terminated an additional 60 days' assistance, Paulison said.

Asked about FEMA's closing of a disaster housing site in Florida's Charlotte County that left about 25 residents without a place to live, Paulison, a former Miami-Dade County Fire Rescue chief, said the agency had helped thousands of Floridians affected by the hurricanes of 2004 and that FEMA's assistance is meant to be temporary. He said local governments must provide residents assistance over the long-term.

In his wide-ranging remarks, Paulison acknowledged a litany of mistakes made by FEMA in responding to Hurricane Katrina, which devastated New Orleans and much of the Gulf coast. He said significant changes have been made since he took over from former Director Michael Brown, who was pressured into resigning less than two weeks after Katrina hit.

"We are in much better shape than we were a year ago," Paulison said, adding, "we still have a long way to go."

In addition to pre-positioning emergency supplies at strategic locations around the country to be ready to respond to an emergency, Paulison said FEMA will move supplies as close as possible to affected areas ahead of such predictable disasters as hurricanes.

The largest failure revealed by Katrina was in communications, Paulison said, noting there was a lack of systems for sharing information between local and state governments, between state governments and the federal government, and within the federal government.

Since then, FEMA has established a unified command that links local, state and federal agencies in "real time" with state-of-the art communications technology. He said the system operated well during Hurricane Ernesto, which did little damage when it hit South Florida in late August and early September.

Speaking on the last official day of the 2006 hurricane season, Paulison said other changes at FEMA include:

DOJ_NMG_0100234

• Improved logistical management, such as using 20,000 satellite-based global positioning systems to track FEMA vehicles bringing supplies to an affected area.

• A registry that identifies local contractors that can be hired for debris removal after a disaster.

• Increased capabilities to register up to 200,000 victims a day online and through mobile registration vehicles being sent to disaster areas.

• Increased capabilities to inspect up to 20,000 homes a day after a disaster.

Paulison said FEMA does not intend to take over emergency response management from state and local agencies, but that all levels of government need to work together more closely and respond more quickly.

Local governments should not have to wait until they are overwhelmed before asking for state assistance, and state governments should not wait until they are overwhelmed before asking for federal assistance, he said.

He also said every person should be responsible for having enough emergency supplies - such as food, water and flashlights - to last at least three days.

10,000 Get Grant Letters On Rebuilding In Louisiana (NYT)

By Leslie Eaton

The New York Times, December 1, 2006

In a sign of painstaking progress for Louisiana's biggest rebuilding program, the state has sent letters to more than 10,000 families stating how much money they can receive to rebuild their homes under the $7.5-billion housing program Congress financed this year, state officials said yesterday.

But fewer than 50 families had actually collected the money as of Tuesday, prompting renewed concern among homeowners and some government officials about the pace of the program, which is called the Road Home and is widely considered the most important factor in rebuilding areas damaged by Hurricanes Katrina and Rita.

The spate of "award calculations," as the program calls them, represents a big increase from early last month, when fewer than 2,000 families — out of almost 79,000 applicants at the time — had been told how much they were eligible to receive.

On Nov. 6, Gov. Kathleen Babineaux Blanco ordered the private contractor managing the program for the state to reach the 10,000 mark by the end of November. Yesterday, the governor said she would require the contractor, ICF International, to send out 15,000 more award letters before the end of the year.

"The Road Home program is making progress, but I will not rest until 100 percent of our homeowners receive the money that we have made available to them," Ms. Blanco said in a statement.

The awards, which are based on the value of a house before the storm and are capped at $150,000, are reduced by the amount of money homeowners receive under their insurance policies. ICF says it has been slowed by the difficulty of getting information from insurance companies and is now sending out award letters without waiting for insurers' verification. This decision has speeded up the process but may mean that the size of the awards will be adjusted before homeowners receive them.

The number of homeowners who have actually received Road Home grants has increased by just 26 in the last month, to a total of 48. Those homeowners received an average grant of $50,715, according to the most recent statistics from the program.

Some program officials said they thought the delays in closing on the grants stemmed not from bottlenecks in the system, but from homeowners' uncertainty about rebuilding.

"I, for one, haven't decided what to do with my house," said Walter Leger, a member of the Louisiana Recovery Authority, which devised the program. Before Hurricane Katrina hit, Mr. Leger lived in St. Bernard Parish, the county just outside New Orleans where almost every building was badly damaged by water or an oil spill or both.

When they apply for the program, most people say that they intend to rebuild, said Carol Hector-Harris, a spokeswoman for the program. But when they learn how much they are eligible to receive, "that's when the reality strikes," she said. "What will it cost to insure my car? Are the schools back? Do I have a job? Is my grocery store back?"

Ms. Hector-Harris cited a recent study by the University of New Orleans that found that many residents of the city and nearby Jefferson Parish, perhaps as many as one-third, say they may leave in the next two years.

The study, which was based on interviews with 400 people now in the area, found that people were frustrated with the difficulty of making home repairs, especially in New Orleans, said Carrye Jane Shaw, a graduate assistant who worked on the study. More than 50,000 applicants have not yet had their first meeting with program counselors. Others, who have been to their appointments and had their property inspected, say they still do not know how much money they are eligible for.

"We may have gotten a letter, but our mailman doesn't deliver every day," said Alyson J. Elder, who lived near the north edge of Tulane University in New Orleans and now rents a house in the city.

"I've been out of my house for 400 nights now," Ms. Elder said. "I just want to go home."

Crime Takes Hold Of New New Orleans (USAT)

By Anne Rochell Konigsmark

USA Today, December 1, 2006

NEW ORLEANS — It's been a violent autumn around the Spotted Cat, a pleasantly divey jazz club in the Marigny neighborhood. Three people were shot Oct. 9 when a man wielding two guns opened fire in the early evening half a block away. Residents, including Spotted Cat cornet player Jack Fine, say muggings have become routine in the lively area full of restaurants and night spots.

And on Oct. 17, police reported the discovery of a dismembered and cooked body believed to be that of Adriane "Addie" Hall, a former club employee. A suicide note penned by her on-again, off-again boyfriend, Zachary Bowen, before he jumped from a hotel roof, led police to the remains — in the refrigerator, the oven and on the stove in Hall's apartment above a voodoo shop.

On a recent afternoon, musicians, barkeeps and barflies met at the Spotted Cat, mourning the loss of a friend they say committed suicide because he was overwhelmed by life after Katrina. They reflected on what feels to them like a new and more frightening brand of crime.

"Oh it's terrible, terrible — simple as that," says Marguerite Oliver, 71, who is retired and lives in the Marigny, adjacent to the French Quarter that did not flood during Hurricane Katrina. It is a neighborhood of pricey homes and trendy bars and restaurants — not the kind of area known for violent crime before Katrina. Now, Oliver says, "The sun goes down, and I go in."

Crime, that old menace of the old New Orleans, is back, and it's bedeviling a city trying to recover from Hurricane Katrina. There have been 147 people killed in New Orleans this year, police say, down from 204 by this time in 2005. But the city's population is about half what it was before Katrina flooded 80% of the city, forcing an almost-complete evacuation.

That means New Orleanians are murdering each other at a rate of 73.5 murders per 100,000 residents. That figure is above that of the nation's most murderous city — Compton, Calif., whose rate was 67 murders per 100,000 people in 2005, according to the latest FBI statistics.

Because many traditionally violent areas flooded and remain nearly empty, crime has moved to upscale, high-traffic areas such as the Marigny, the French Quarter and Uptown, leaving residents with one more reason to question their decision to remain in the city.

"This is a city out of control," says Fine, 78, who stands drinking a beer outside the Spotted Cat as a Billie Holiday song wafts out of the bar's open doors. "Something's changed here."

After a few virtually crime-free months following Katrina — when the city had just a handful of residents and was teeming with National Guard, state police and law enforcement from around the country — the usual suspects began returning, Orleans Parish Police Superintendent Warren Riley says. And while Riley reports that 70% of murders are drug-related, there's an upswing in a new kind of crime: brutal, domestic violence that he attributes to the stress of living in post-Katrina New Orleans.

"People don't realize this isn't a normal community yet," Riley says. "There are people out there on the edge."

The criminals themselves are only part of a crisis that starts on the streets and stretches all the way to the recently reopened criminal courtrooms on Tulane Avenue. Each link in the chain has a problem, says New Orleans City Councilwoman Stacy Head. "It's not like you can say, 'We fix this and everything will be OK.' "

Rafael Goyeneche of the Metropolitan Crime Commission, a local watchdog group, calls the criminal justice system's shortcomings "a model for disaster."

"Just as important as fixing the levees and the schools, crime is going to determine the rate and the extent of New Orleans's repopulation and recovery," he says.

The post-Katrina crime wave began in earnest in June, when five teenagers were found shot to death in a sport-utility vehicle. That's when the state police and the National Guard returned to the city to patrol the city's flood-ravaged and sparsely populated streets, freeing up local police to concentrate on the more populated areas. They were to remain only through December, but Riley said this week he will ask Gov. Kathleen Blanco to leave them in the city for at least another six months.

Riley estimates that 80% of the criminals that operated in New Orleans before Katrina have returned to the city. But simply policing traditional hotspots doesn't work anymore, Riley says. Violence in high-traffic areas such as the French Quarter makes residents jittery and draws national attention.

On Sunday, an 18-year-old from Mississippi was stabbed to death on Bourbon Street, police say. Early in the morning on Oct. 31, a gunman fired on patrons in a French Quarter bar, police say, wounding five. Following close after the gruesome dismemberment of Addie Hall, the incidents set the neighborhood, and those relying on tourists, on edge.

"That's what really hurts," says Cindy Richardson, 42, co-owner of New Orleans Ghost Tours. Her business is down 80%, she says. "We used to have contracts with schools that took our tours, and they won't come down here anymore. The parents don't want the kids down here."

Not only is crime in new locations, Riley says, there are new perpetrators. "Some of these shootings, under normal circumstances, wouldn't have been shootings," he says. He cites the Nov. 5 shooting deaths of a 47-year-old man and a 53-year-old woman, found in a Federal Emergency Management Agency (FEMA) trailer. The suspect, who was the woman's husband, had recently sought psychiatric help, Riley says. His doctor was unable to find a bed for him, he says. With the city's large public hospital shut down since the storm, beds for mentally ill patients have been scarce. "People's lives have been turned upside down," Riley says. "They are stressed, frustrated and anxious, he says. And, "they have nowhere to turn."

Fifteen months after Katrina, Riley continues to use a set of cramped trailers as police headquarters. He can't move back to his permanent offices, still being repaired, until next year, he says. "I feel like I am in a military outpost," he says.

His police force isn't back to normal, either. Before Katrina, 1,668 officers patrolled New Orleans. "At one point, we had 200 inquiries from other departments around the country about (our) officers who had applied for jobs," he says. Since the storm, 183 officers have either been fired or resigned, Riley says. And because 109 officers are out sick or injured, and 80 have been assigned desk jobs because of administrative layoffs, there are only 1,275 officers on the street.

That may seem adequate, considering the city's diminished population. But Riley and other city leaders dispute the federal government's official count of 187,000 residents and believe it to be 200,000. People are crowding in with friends and relatives, and they are camping out in abandoned homes, Riley says.

Besides, he adds, the geography of the city is unchanged. "We can't cover the entire city," Riley says.

Morale is low. The officers remaining on the force work under the shadow of "very, very negative reports of police actions during and after the storm," Riley says. Stories of looting and dereliction of duty abounded, and police were caught on camera beating an unarmed man in the French Quarter.

Four out of five officers lost their homes in the flooding, and many remain in trailers, separated from their families who have chosen to remain elsewhere for now, he says.

Still, officers are making plenty of arrests, about 1,500 a week, Riley says. That's down only 25% from the pre-Katrina average, further evidence the population is rebounding, Riley says. "They're taking drug dealers and murderers off the streets every day," he says.

Many suspects were released from custody in the months following the storm because there was no place to put them. The Orleans Parish Prison flooded, leaving the city with nowhere to house suspects.

For a while, Riley says, "there was literally a catch-and-release program going on. The most violent offenders, they would find a place for (them) somewhere around the state. But people charged with minor offenses were released. Well, some of those people were hardened criminals who just happened to be arrested on a minor offense."

Even now, with the recent addition of FEMA-provided tents, the Orleans Parish Prison has just 2,200 beds, down from 7,200.

DOJ_NMG_0100237

Late starts and no room for jury deliberations are the first issues Judge Terry Alarcon faces as he begins a typical post-Katrina day in the Orleans Parish Criminal District Court. “I try not to get an ulcer about it,” he says.

As a recent morning wears on, there's plenty to give Alarcon stomach trouble.

The criminal courts remained shut down for nine months after the storm, then opened partially in June to begin handling a backlog of 5,000 cases. Only as of Oct. 30 were all 12 sections of criminal court back up and running. And repairs are still being made to the building.

“You shut down the courts in any area in the U.S., and you're going to see a crime explosion,” Goyeneche says.

Defense attorney Clif Stoutz appears before Alarcon this morning, but noticeably absent is his client, arrested before Katrina on charges of marijuana possession. His client now lives in New York, Stoutz explains, and needs several weeks' advance notice of a hearing so he can buy an affordable plane ticket. Alarcon shakes his head and sets a December court date.

“Do you have any idea if the evidence still exists?” the judge asks the assistant district attorney. The answer is no. The evidence room flooded and the prosecution has not yet located the five pounds of marijuana Stoutz's client allegedly possessed.

Even with all 12 courtrooms handling cases, the wheels of justice won't turn smoothly for some time to come, Stoutz, Alarcon and Goyeneche agree. The criminal justice system was broken before Katrina: A 2005 study by the Metropolitan Crime Commission found that just 12% of people arrested for homicide in New Orleans were ultimately incarcerated.

About one-fourth of defendants with felony drug offenses wound up in prison, Goyeneche says. Nationally, more than two-thirds of those defendants are convicted and incarcerated, according to the U.S. Justice Department.

Stoutz, who was “in Florida on the beach” while the courts were closed, says repairing the damage done to the justice system by Katrina is just a start. “All that happened with Katrina is we kicked over the anthill and now we see what's underneath,” he says.

Lawyers with the district attorney's office are paid $38,000 a year, less than the $39,000 starting salary for police officers, which means it is difficult to hire anyone with experience, Goyeneche says. Post-Katrina, the D.A.'s office, which until three months ago operated out of a former barroom, complete with a disco ball, lost more than 30 of its 80 attorneys. Meanwhile, the public defender's office lost some of its most experienced attorneys because of a new rule requiring them to work full-time. “Those veteran attorneys didn't want to drop their private practices,” Goyeneche says.

The last case of the morning in Alarcon's court involves another absent defendant. This one, the prosecutor explains, is in the state penitentiary in Angola, several hours away. No one knew he was not in town until this morning.

Small steps are being taken to stave off violent crime and give the criminal justice system the tools it needs to arrest, lock up and convict criminals. A 10% salary increase for police officers went into effect in September, and there is a proposal before the City Council to raise the starting salary for lawyers with the district attorney's office to $50,000.

A Criminal Justice Task Force, which includes representatives from all sectors of the system, meets twice a month, Riley says. He has shaken up the leadership in key units such as narcotics, and he is having his officers conduct training sessions with the FBI.

Goyeneche says there is talk of creating a career criminals unit in the district attorney's office. The unit would employ a handful of veteran prosecutors who would be paid higher salaries to handle the most serious offenders, he says.

Riley says the city will feel safer “when our criminal justice system, not just the police, is up and functioning. And when our citizens have confidence in us and report crimes. Then we will have a safer city.”

For now, Fine, the cornet player, says it takes guts to remain in a city he sees as not only dangerous but wounded.

“There's a heaviness sitting on the city,” he says. There's a profound sense of coping with something that's lost and you can't quite put your finger on it.”

Fine says he was almost robbed recently. “I was walking to my car, and I see this cat walking to meet me,” he says. “And I see him start to reach in his pocket.” Fine smiles. “So I started to reach into my pocket. And he ran.”

Asked if anything was in his pocket, Fine says, “Courage.”

WAR NEWS:

Bush Sticks To Iraq Policy, Resists Drawdown Calls (WSJ)

By Yochi J. Dreazen And Cam Simpson

The Wall Street Journal, December 1, 2006

AMMAN, Jordan -- The U.S.'s next steps in Middle East diplomacy appear to include speeding the transfer of Iraqi security forces from American to local control and stepping up efforts toward renewed Israeli-Palestinian talks.

But obstacles emerged on both fronts yesterday, as President Bush, on a visit here, made clear he will resist calls to change his Iraq policy and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice appeared to leave it to Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas to determine the next move in that peace process.

Mr. Bush used a meeting with Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki to lay down a marker ahead of the official release next week of a report by a bipartisan commission, headed by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III and former Democratic Rep. Lee Hamilton, that has been exploring new U.S. strategies for stabilizing a nation badly torn by sectarian violence and for bringing home U.S. troops.

The findings will call for the U.S. to begin gradually drawing down the approximately 140,000 American combat troops now in Iraq -- though without a specific timeline -- and to engage in direct negotiations with leaders in neighboring Iran and Syria, which are believed to be helping fuel the strife, said a member of the panel. Details of the panel's recommendations were reported in the New York Times yesterday.

Asked when Mr. Bush would begin acting on the report, White House National Security Adviser Stephen Hadley told reporters on Air Force One returning from Jordan there was no timetable per se.

"It's really going to be when the president is comfortable in his own mind as to where he wants to go, and when we've been able to have the kind of discussion with the Iraqis so we can be sure that it is going to be a common plan between the Iraqi government and the United States government for success," he said.

White House officials have said the U.S. is open to considering negotiations with Tehran and Damascus if the two drop their support for Hezbollah and other militant groups. Despite a growing sense Mr. Bush might use the report from the Iraq Study Group as political cover for beginning a U.S. troop withdrawal, he said yesterday talk of an imminent drawdown "simply has no realism to it at all."

"I know there's a lot of speculation that these reports in Washington mean there's going to be some kind of a graceful exit out of Iraq," he said. "We're going to stay in Iraq to get the job done."

Meanwhile, Ms. Rice met briefly with Mr. Abbas in Jericho in the Palestinian territories before heading to Jerusalem for even shorter sessions with top Israeli officials. Though she publicly declared her desire to "accelerate our efforts and intensify our efforts" to bring about peace, little new appeared to be gained from the talks. She declined to cite concrete plans for what should come next in the Israeli-Palestinian peace process, beyond trying to sustain this week's fragile cease-fire for the Gaza Strip, which has experienced months of bloodshed.

Mr. Abbas declared as all but dead talks aimed at replacing the Palestinian Authority's current Hamas-led government with a caretaker regime. The move, pushed by the U.S. for months, is seen as a precondition for almost any Palestinian progress. Washington cannot legally deal with or financially support a government led by Hamas, which is designated as a foreign terrorist organization under U.S. law.

But Ms. Rice told reporters last night that the Gaza cease-fire deal, along with an olive branch extended by Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert during a speech Monday, was "not a bad set of events to take place," during a short timeframe. She also said gaining progress in the moribund peace process "is the kind of thing that takes time."

In Jordan, Mr. Bush said the U.S. would step up efforts to give Mr. Maliki more control over Iraq's military and security forces and work to expand U.S. military training for them. For his part, Mr. Maliki said he believed Iraqi forces would be ready to take full control of security by June.

But while Messrs. Bush and Maliki both said it was necessary to speed the handover of security responsibility, senior U.S. military officials caution that big barriers remain to achieving this. The Iraqi Army and police forces remain rife with corruption, and embedded U.S. advisers regularly complain that because the U.S. doesn't control the Iraqi ministries, they can't get corrupt Army and police officers fired or replaced.

The availability of more advisers also is uncertain. U.S. military officials say they are committed to increasing the number of advisers working with Iraqi Army and police forces, but the Army and Marine Corps are already stretched thin. Moreover, some military officials say that adding more advisers without giving them the power to remove incompetent or corrupt officers won't lead to significantly better results.

Mr. Bush again rejected calls to divide Iraq into three semi-autonomous regions and said U.S. forces would remain in Iraq indefinitely. He also offered a strong endorsement to the embattled Mr. Maliki, hailing him as the "right guy for Iraq."

U.S. officials said the meetings between the two leaders went well, but the hastily planned summit produced few results. The two met just one day after Mr. Maliki abruptly canceled a planned three-way meeting Wednesday night with Mr. Bush and King Abdullah of Jordan. The move came after the disclosure in the New York Times of a memo written by Mr. Hadley asserting that the Iraqi premier was "either ignorant of what is going on, misrepresenting his intentions or that his capabilities are not yet sufficient to turn his good intentions into actions."

Mr. Bush went out of his way to praise Mr. Maliki, a clear attempt to soothe the Iraqi leader's feelings after the leak.

Bush Rejects Troop Reductions, Endorses Maliki (WP)

By Michael Abramowitz And Sudarsan Raghavan

The Washington Post, December 1, 2006

AMMAN, Jordan, Nov. 30 -- President Bush on Thursday dismissed calls for U.S. troop withdrawals from Iraq as unrealistic, saying American forces would "stay in Iraq to get the job done, so long as the government wants us there."

Speaking after a summit here with Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, Bush also offered a strong endorsement of the embattled leader, calling him "the right guy for Iraq."

The two men met for about two hours in the Jordanian capital, discussing how to crack down on the sectarian violence ravaging Iraq and what could be done to speed the turnover of security responsibilities from U.S.-led foreign troops to Iraqi forces.

In the news conference that followed, Bush sought to preempt a growing clamor to start a phased withdrawal of U.S. troops from Iraq, a proposed policy shift that has gained traction as a result of the Nov. 7 congressional elections and that is expected to be endorsed by the Iraq Study Group, a bipartisan commission headed by former secretary of state James A. Baker III and former representative Lee H. Hamilton (D-Ind.). The United States has more than 140,000 troops in Iraq.

Although the president was not asked directly about the panel's recommendations, which will be made public next week but which were partially leaked to reporters late Wednesday, he did say that "this business about graceful exit just simply has no realism to it whatsoever."

Later, national security adviser Stephen J. Hadley told reporters aboard Air Force One that Bush would start making changes in his Iraq policy soon after receiving the study group's recommendations and the reports of other high-level review panels. "There is a real sense of urgency, but there is not a sense of panic," Hadley said, according to the [a] news agency.

Maliki, meanwhile, declared that he is moving to disarm militias in Iraq and expects government forces to assume full control of security duties by June.

"I can say that Iraqi forces will be ready, fully ready, to receive this command and to command its own forces, and I can tell you that by next June, our forces will be ready," Maliki said in an interview with ABC News after his meeting with Bush.

Asked whether he would disarm militias such as the Mahdi Army of Moqtada al-Sadr, an anti-American Shiite cleric, Maliki, himself a Shiite, said: "Definitely. And the government is doing that with all militias, with no exception. There will be only the arms for government troops."

Sadr is seen as perhaps the single most powerful political leader in Iraq. The Mahdi Army is the largest and most violent of Iraq's private Shiite militias, and Sadr's supporters make up one of the biggest blocs in the Iraqi parliament. Although the Sadr bloc played a pivotal role in making Maliki prime minister, its members walked out of parliament and the cabinet on Wednesday in protest of Maliki's meeting with Bush.

During their news conference, Bush declined to answer directly a question about whether he urged Maliki to distance himself from Sadr. Bush said that after he and Maliki discussed the "political situation" in Iraq, he came away "reassured" by the prime minister's determination to hold to account those who break the law -- "whether those people be criminals, al-Qaeda, militia, whoever."

Asked whether he would break with Sadr, Maliki did not answer directly, noting that Sadr's faction is only one part of his ruling coalition and that all those participating in the government bear responsibilities.

"I do not talk about one side or the other," he said. "I'm talking about a state; I'm talking about law; I'm talking about commitments. And this should apply to all the partners who have chosen to participate in the political process."

According to Iraqi sources familiar with the meetings, Bush did not press Maliki to take stronger action against Sadr or the Shiite militias, which U.S. commanders in Baghdad have repeatedly called the principal impediment to restoring order in Iraq.

"There was really no pressure," said Sadiq al-Rikabi, a political adviser to Maliki who was present during the meeting. "Did he say to the prime minister, 'You have to do this and do that'? I didn't hear any of that."

Rikabi said the two leaders did not "specifically discuss Sadr" but spoke in general terms about the militias, the security of the country and the political conditions.

Mahmoud Othman, a Sunni Kurd who is an influential member of Iraq's parliament, said that Bush told Maliki that U.S. forces would deal with al-Qaeda and that Iraqis were responsible for tamping down the Shiite militias and sectarian violence. But he didn't push too hard, said Othman, who said he was basing his information on conversations he had with people who were in the meeting.

Othman said that he thought Sadr's decision to launch a boycott of parliament sent a signal that Maliki was under a lot of domestic pressure and that pushing Maliki too hard on Sadr and the Mahdi Army might have put him under even more pressure.

"That's why he didn't press for that," Othman said.

A senior U.S. official told reporters that Bush and Maliki did discuss Sadr during the summit, in the context of a larger conversation about "using force to address, where necessary, elements operating outside the rule of law."

The official, who could not be named under ground rules set by the White House, said Maliki was fully aware of the need to confront militias. "He recognizes this is a big challenge for his government and one that his government must take on and succeed in if he is to be successful," the official said.

Bush and his aides said a major topic during Thursday's meeting was speeding the training of Iraqi security forces. Bush and Maliki heard from a committee of senior officials from both countries who have been looking for ways to accelerate the transfer of authority over about 140,000 Iraqi soldiers from a joint command-and-control arrangement between Maliki and Army Gen. George W. Casey Jr., the top American commander in Iraq, to complete Iraqi oversight. No timetable was set.

"One of his frustrations with me is that he believes we've been slow about giving him the tools necessary to protect the Iraqi people," Bush said before boarding Air Force One for the flight home. "Our goal is to ensure that the prime minister has more capable forces under his control so his government can fight the terrorists and the death squads, and provide security and stability in his country."

Thursday's meeting was the third face-to-face session between the two leaders. Administration officials say they have been disappointed so far by results from the Maliki government, yet Bush portrayed himself as having nothing but confidence that Maliki can ultimately get results with more help from the United States.

"He's been in power for six months, and I've been able to watch a leader emerge," Bush said, praising Maliki's courage and his desire to take more responsibility from U.S.-led forces. "I'm talking to the man face-to-face, and he says that he understands that a unified government, a pluralistic society, is important to success. And he's making hard decisions to achieve that."

Rikabi, Maliki's adviser, said the prime minister took Bush's expressions of support as a vote of confidence. "It was very positive," Rikabi added, referring to the meeting. "The prime minister and all the delegation returned back to Baghdad very satisfied."

Sunni legislators in Baghdad, however, said they were disappointed by the outcome of the meeting and had expected Bush to take a stronger stand.

"We heard more support for this government from the Bush administration," said Saleh al-Mutlak, leader of the Iraqi National Dialogue Front, the second-largest Sunni Arab party in Iraq's parliament. "It's a support for failure."

Bush, In Meeting On Iraq, Rejects A Quick Pullout (NYT)

By John M. Broder And Sheryl Gay Stolberg

The New York Times, December 1, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 30 — President Bush on Thursday rejected the idea of a quick troop withdrawal from Iraq, even as Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki of Iraq said his country's forces would be ready to take over substantial security responsibility by next June.

Mr. Bush, at a news conference with Mr. Maliki after a meeting in Jordan, directly referred to reports the day before that the bipartisan Iraq Study Group would recommend to him next week that the United States begin a substantial troop pullout in the near future. Some analysts have suggested that the report could offer a face-saving way for Mr. Bush to begin withdrawing from Iraq, but he adamantly rejected that view.

"I know there's a lot of speculation that these reports in Washington mean there's going to be some kind of graceful exit out of Iraq," the president said. "This business about a graceful exit just simply has no realism to it whatsoever."

The study group is said to be shying away from recommending a firm timetable, and it envisions a force of 70,000 or more American troops in Iraq for some time to come. And despite a Democratic election victory this month that was strongly based on antiwar sentiment, the idea of a major and rapid withdrawal seems to be fading as a viable option. [News analysis, Page A16.]

Mr. Maliki and other Iraqi leaders have given optimistic projections before about the strength of local forces and their ability to control the insurgency and the sectarian warfare. But senior Bush administration officials and American commanders continue to say that creating a competent Iraqi military from scratch will take an intensive training effort and years to accomplish.

Mr. Maliki lacks full operational control of the military, and he is menaced by numerous armed militias and insurgent cells operating with virtual impunity.

One approach expected to be put forward by the Iraq Study Group is that, as the size of the American combat force is reduced, the Pentagon would send thousands of additional trainers to assist in the building of Iraqi Army and police forces. Mr. Maliki seemed to embrace that idea on Thursday, saying that his government would be fully ready to take command by June 2007. Democrats in Congress have been demanding that the United States begin removing its troops in the next four to six months and give control of Iraq to the Iraqis.

"I can say that Iraqi forces will be ready, fully ready to receive this command and to command its own forces, and I can tell you that by next June our forces will be ready," Mr. Maliki told ABC News after meeting President Bush in Jordan.

He said that the president had assured him that he was not preparing to remove American forces any time soon and that he would provide additional training and support for the Iraqi military. He said any decision on American troop withdrawals was up to the Bush administration.

For his part, Mr. Bush insisted that American troops would stay in Iraq unless the government asked them to leave. "We're going to stay in Iraq to get the job done as long as the government wants us there," he said.

Stephen J. Hadley, the national security adviser, said that the United States was working diligently to improve the ability of the Maliki government to maintain some semblance of order in Iraq and to assume control of its own armed forces. He refused, however, to give any estimate of how long the task would take.

"Building a military, a successful and high-quality military, is something that, obviously, takes some time," Mr. Hadley said in a briefing for reporters aboard Air Force One while returning to Washington from Jordan. "We've been at it for a while. There is going to be more work to do. But you can get units to the point that they can take increasing responsibility for security. That's what we've been doing, that's what we'll continue to do."

He said the United States and Iraq were speeding up the schedule under which Iraqi forces would come under Iraqi, and not American, command.

Mr. Hadley added that the Iraqis were aware both of the security problems that they faced and of the diminishing American public support for the military mission there.

"There is a real sense of urgency, but there is not a sense of panic," Mr. Hadley said. "And that is a good thing for a government that's under — has a lot of challenges before it."

The meeting of Mr. Bush and Mr. Maliki, a two-hour session in Amman, Jordan, took place against a backdrop of rising sectarian violence in Iraq and increasing tensions between the leaders.

Earlier this week, news reports brought to a light a classified memorandum by Mr. Hadley in which he raised doubts about Mr. Maliki's leadership. And on Wednesday evening, Mr. Maliki took the unusual step of backing out of a planned three-way meeting with the president that would have included the Jordanian leader, King Abdullah II.

But in their news conference, the two men appeared to be on the same page. During his appearance with Mr. Maliki, Mr. Bush offered to speed up the transfer of command of Iraqi forces to the Iraqi government. Mr. Maliki is under pressure at home to demonstrate more independence from the United States, but Americans, as well as Sunni Arab politicians in Iraq, have been concerned that the Iraqi troops would be used by the Shiite government against the Sunni populace.

The president also rejected the idea of partitioning Iraq to create buffers between the country's main sectarian groups, an idea that Mr. Maliki has publicly opposed though some other Shiite leaders have backed it.

During his statement, Mr. Maliki issued a pointed message to its neighbors, Syria and Iran, whom the United States has accused of supporting militant groups in Iraq, not to interfere with Iraqi affairs. "Iraq is for Iraqis," Mr. Maliki said.

The much-publicized meeting — a breakfast attended by aides including Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and Gen. George W. Casey Jr., the top American commander in Iraq, followed by a 45-minute one-on-one session — took place as both leaders face intense pressure to bring the bloody sectarian violence in Iraq under control.

At the news conference afterward, Mr. Bush stood at Mr. Maliki's side and showered him with praise, saying, "He's the right guy for Iraq."

In Washington on Thursday, Senator Carl Levin, the Michigan Democrat is to become chairman of the Armed Services Committee in January, welcomed the reported recommendations of the Iraq Study Group, saying they were similar to what he and other Democrats had been proposing for months.

"It sends a message to the Iraqis that our presence there is not open-ended and that we are going to pull back, redeploy in a reasonable amount of time," Senator Levin said in an interview. "They share our premise that the Iraqis have got to feel a sense of urgency if they are going to reach a political settlement."

He said that the panel's recommendations, if they are adopted even in part by the White House, signaled an "important shift" in the debate on Iraq policy.

Senator John Cornyn, a Republican member of the Armed Services Committee from Texas, said he believed that it would be necessary to send tens of thousands more troops to Iraq in the short term to stabilize Baghdad and control the sectarian militias that were killing one another and Americans.

He said he was gratified to hear Mr. Maliki's claim that his forces would be adequate to the task by the middle of next year, but said he did not think the Iraqi prime minister was being realistic.

"I would love to believe it," Mr. Cornyn said in a telephone interview from Texas. "Perhaps it's useful for him to set goals for his own security forces. But it's pretty clear to me that, at least from a logistical standpoint, Iraqi troops will need to receive support from the United States for quite a long time."

The Only Consensus On Iraq: Nobody's Leaving Right Now (NYT)

By David E. Sanger

The New York Times, December 1, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 30 — In the cacophony of competing plans about how to deal with Iraq, one reality now appears clear: despite the Democrats' victory this month in an election viewed as a referendum on the war, the idea of a rapid American troop withdrawal is fast receding as a viable option.

DOJ_NMG_0100243

The Joint Chiefs of Staff are signaling that too rapid an American pullout would open the way to all-out civil war. The bipartisan Iraq Study Group has shied away from recommending explicit timelines in favor of a vaguely timed pullback. The report that the panel will deliver to President Bush next week would, at a minimum, leave a force of 70,000 or more troops in the country for a long time to come, to train the Iraqis and to insure against collapse of a desperately weak central government.

Even the Democrats, with an eye toward 2008, have dropped talk of a race for the exits, in favor of a brisk stroll. But that may be the only solace for Mr. Bush as he returns from a messy encounter with Iraq's prime minister, Nuri Kamal al-Maliki.

In the 23 days since the election, the debate in Washington and much of the country appears to have turned away from Mr. Bush's oft-repeated insistence that the only viable option is to stay and fight smarter. The most talked-about alternatives now include renewed efforts to prepare the Iraqi forces while preparing to pull American combat brigades back to their bases, or back home, sometime next year. The message to Iraq's warring parties would be clear: Washington's commitment to making Iraq work is not open-ended.

Yet if Mr. Bush's words are taken at face value, those are options still redolent of timetables — at best, cut-and-walk. Standing next to Mr. Maliki on Thursday in Amman, Jordan, Mr. Bush declared that Iraqis need not fear that he is looking for "some kind of graceful exit out of Iraq." But a graceful exit — or even an awkward one — appears to be just what the Iraq Study Group, led by James A. Baker III and Lee H. Hamilton, tried to design in the compromise reached by Republicans and Democrats on the panel on Wednesday.

The question now is whether Mr. Bush can be persuaded to shift course — and whether he might now be willing to define victory less expansively.

"What the Baker group appears to have done is try to change the direction of the political momentum on Iraq," said Stephen P. Cohen, a scholar at the Israel Policy Forum. "They have made clear that there isn't a scenario for a democratic Iraq, at least for a very long time. They have called into question the logic of a lengthy American presence. And once you've done that, what is the case for Americans dying in order to have this end slowly?"

In the days just after the Republican defeat on Nov. 7, Mr. Bush had suggested that he was open to new ideas about Iraq. "It's necessary to have a fresh perspective," he said in nominating Robert M. Gates to succeed the ousted Donald H. Rumsfeld as defense secretary.

But more recently, the president has, if anything, seemed to harden his position again. In Hanoi, Vietnam, nearly two weeks ago, he suggested that he would regard the recommendations from the Baker-Hamilton group as no more than a voice among many. In Riga, Latvia, two days ago he all but pounded the lectern as he declared, "There's one thing I'm not going to do: I'm not going to pull the troops off the battlefield before the mission is complete."

On the way home from Jordan, Mr. Bush's national security adviser, Stephen J. Hadley, said Mr. Maliki was told that the Baker-Hamilton report "was going to be one input" — a clear signal that no matter how senior the group's members, no matter how bipartisan the group, no matter how close Mr. Baker is to the president's father, the recommendations would not be regarded as sacrosanct.

In private, some members of the Iraq Study Group have expressed concern that they could find themselves in not-quite-open confrontation with Mr. Bush. "He's a true believer," one participant in the group's debates said. "Finessing the differences is not going to be easy."

The group never seriously considered the position that Representative John P. Murtha, the Pennsylvania Democrat who is a leading voice on national security issues, took more than a year ago, that withdrawal should begin immediately. The group did debate timetables, especially after a proposal, backed by influential Democratic members of the commission, that a robust diplomatic strategy and better training of Iraqis be matched up with a clear schedule for withdrawal. But explicit mention of such a schedule was dropped.

In statements on Thursday, Democrats from former President Bill Clinton to Senator Joseph R. Biden Jr. of Delaware, the incoming chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, seemed to agree that hard timelines could invite trouble. Nonetheless, some areas of potential conflict with Mr. Bush seem clear.

"I think that what's clearly being implied in the study group's report is what some of us have been saying for a while," said Senator Jack Reed, a hawkish Democrat from Rhode Island with a military record, which has made him a spokesman for the party on Iraq. “A phased redeployment — one that begins in six months or so — is where we need to head. And what’s different now is that redeployment has become the consensus view,” save for inside the White House. “The debate is at what pace.”

There is evidence that more and more Republicans are likely to line up with the Iraq Study Group’s conclusions, even if some find the military prescriptions vague and the group’s idea of talking directly to Iran and Syria repugnant. After all, the Republicans have little interest in facing another election, in two years, where Iraq becomes the overarching issue.

But Mr. Bush faces no more elections. And he has not been one to back down, even when offered a “graceful exit.” He has staked his presidency on remaking Iraq, and with it, the Middle East. Every day, the chances of that seem more remote. With only two years left, this may be his last moment for a real change of strategy.

Bush Endorses Maliki After Talks (MCT)

By William Douglas And Nancy A. Youssef

McClatchy Newspapers, December 1, 2006

AMMAN, Jordan — President Bush reaffirmed his support for embattled Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki Thursday, agreeing to accelerate transfer of authority of security forces to the prime minister and vowing to keep U.S. troops in Iraq until their mission is successfully completed.

"Our objective is to help the Maliki government to succeed," Bush told reporters after a meeting with the prime minister. "We talked about accelerating authority to the prime minister ... he's the right guy for Iraq, and we're going to help him."

Bush gave his endorsement at a news conference after nearly two and a half hours of talks with the embattled prime minister. Maliki is under pressure in Baghdad and Washington to do more to combat increasing sectarian violence in Iraq.

On Thanksgiving, several car bombs detonated in the impoverished Baghdad neighborhood of Sadr City, killing more than 200 people, making it the deadliest single attack since Saddam Hussein's regime fell in April 2003. Some said that attack, and the subsequent retaliatory bombings, shootings and kidnappings throughout the capital, were signs of a civil war.

The U.S. must give Maliki and his government more control over their security forces, Bush said, acknowledging that the U.S. unwillingness to do so had limited the prime minister. Maliki and his aides have complained publicly that they cannot move a brigade without U.S. approval.

"One of his frustrations with me is that he believes that we've been slow about giving him the tools necessary to protect the Iraqi people," Bush said. "And today we had a meeting that will accelerate the capacity for the prime minister to do the hard work necessary to help stop this violence."

But White House officials offered few specifics on how the acceleration would work. A senior administration official said the leaders discussed handing over control of some provinces to Iraqi security forces, but would not say which ones.

This year, the U.S. has handed several Iraqi cities to the local army and police only to see them erupt in sectarian fighting within months, forcing coalition forces to intervene in cities like Balad and Amara. Moreover, Sunnis have complained that Iraqi forces, which are mostly Shiite, are sectarian and work alongside militias.

The president and prime minister also rejected an increasingly popular idea of dividing Iraq into three regions – Shiite, Sunni and Kurdish enclaves – saying that would fuel more violence.

"The prime minister made clear that splitting his country into parts, as some have suggested, is not what the Iraqi people want, and that any partition of Iraq would only lead to an increase in sectarian violence," Bush said.

Thursday was Bush's first meeting with Maliki since Democrats regained control of the House of Representatives and the Senate in mid-term elections that were viewed as a referendum on Bush's handling of the war.

Many Democrats have called for a timetable for withdrawing troops from Iraq. The White House is awaiting recommendations from a blue-ribbon panel co-chaired by former Secretary of State James Baker III and former Rep. Lee Hamilton, D-Ind.

The president said he'll listen to the panel suggestion, but asserted Thursday that he will not withdraw U.S. forces from Iraq until their mission is complete.

"I know thre's a lot of speculation that these reports in Washington mean there's going to be some kind of graceful exit out of Iraq," Bush said. "We're going to stay in Iraq to get the job done, so long as the government wants us there."

DOJ_NMG_0100245

This third face-to-face meeting between the two occurred under uncomfortable circumstances after a classified White House memo bluntly criticizing Maliki's leadership in Iraq, written by National Security Advisor Stephen Hadley, was published in The New York Times Wednesday.

The situation grew more awkward after a scheduled Wednesday evening meeting between Bush, Maliki and Jordan's King Abdullah was abruptly canceled. White House officials struggled to explain the cancellation but insisted it wasn't a snub and had nothing to do with Hadley's candid memo.

"We returned from Iraq convinced we need to determine if Prime Minister Maliki is both willing and able to rise above the sectarian agendas being promoted by others," Hadley wrote. "Do we and Prime Minister Maliki share the same vision for Iraq? Is he able to curb those who seek Shia hegemony or the reassertion of Sunni power? These answers to these questions are the key in determining whether we have the right strategy in Iraq."

Hadley was among the White House aides who attended the Bush-Maliki breakfast. An administration official said there were jokes about the leak during the meetings, but declined to provide specifics.

After the meetings, Bush heaped praise on an uncomfortable-looking Maliki and said they were united in seeking a way forward on improving the deteriorating situation in Iraq.

"You can't lead unless you have courage," Bush said. "And he's got courage, and he's shown courage over the last six months. I'm talking to the man face-to-face, and he says that he understands that a unified government, a pluralistic society, is important to success."

Both men said they also share the same concerns about interference in Iraq's affairs by neighboring countries, particularly Iran.

"We want to emphasize that we will not allow anybody to exert their control over any part of Iraq," Maliki said. "We want good relationships with our neighbors; we want complementary relationships with our neighbors to protect the region from tensions. But the main principle underlying all of this is respect of the Iraqi borders and the internal affairs of Iraq."

Despite the appearance of unity, it was clear that the president and prime minister did not agree on approach. Bush said the violence would only end if Iraq addressed its largely Sunni terrorists and Shiite death squads. Maliki, a former hard-line Shiite, made no mention of the death squads in his remarks.

"Terrorism, extremism and sectarianism will rob human beings of happiness," Maliki said.

Maliki did address concerns that he was closely tied to Sadrists, who control Iraq's largest militia, the Mahdi Army, saying he does not only answer to them.

"Mr. Sadr and the Sadrists are just one component that participate in the parliament," the prime minister said. "And I think participating in the government is a responsibility ... and foremost upon those responsibilities is the protection of this government, the protection of the constitution, the protection of law."

Thursday's meetings have caused friction within Maliki's government. In Iraq, members of rebel cleric Mutqada al Sadr's slate boycotted the parliament because the prime minister agreed to meet with Bush.

Bush Show Of Support For Iraqi Premier (FT)

By Guy Dinmore And Sharmila Devi

Financial Times, December 1, 2006

President George W. Bush yesterday put on a strong show of support for Iraq's beleaguered prime minister, calling Nouri al-Maliki the "right guy for Iraq".

The US president assured Mr Maliki that the Bush administration would not respond to pressure for a "graceful exit".

But Mr Maliki returned to Baghdad and a crisis in his coalition government apparently with little to show from their summit in Jordan, other than rhetorical commitments and an understanding that the US would speed up the training of Iraqi security forces and the full transfer of their authority to him.

In public at least, the US side did not specify when Mr Maliki would no longer have to share control over his own forces with General George Casey, the US commander. However, the prime minister told ABC television that Iraqi forces would be fully ready by June.

The White House had cautioned against expecting any “bombshells” from the summit, which was hastily arranged in response to a surge in sectarian violence in Baghdad.

US policy remains effectively on hold until various internal reviews are completed and the bipartisan Iraq Study Group delivers its own recommendations – due on December 6.

Stephen Hadley, national security adviser, told reporters aboard Air Force One that Mr Bush would probably arrive at a decision on “the new direction in Iraq” within weeks.

Describing the mood on the Iraqi side, Mr Hadley said: “There is a real sense of urgency, but there is not a sense of panic.”

At a joint news conference in Amman, Mr Bush twice rejected calls for a “graceful exit”. He said the US would be in Iraq “until the job is complete”.

He added: “I know there’s a lot of speculation that these reports in Washington mean there’s going to be some kind of graceful exit out of Iraq. We’re going to stay in Iraq to get the job done, so long as the government wants us there.”

Media reports say the Iraq Study Group group led by James Baker, former secretary of state, and Lee Hamilton, former Democratic congressman, will recommend a gradual redeployment of US forces starting next year but with no timetable. Substantial numbers of US advisers, trainers and back-up forces would remain.

Outreach to Iran and Syria may also be proposed, but Mr Bush has ruled out direct US engagement under current circumstances.

Mr Bush’s praise for Mr Maliki followed a diplomatic brouhaha on Wednesday when their scheduled trilateral summit with King Abdullah was abruptly cancelled. US officials denied Mr Maliki had snubbed the president to show his displeasure at a leaked memo by Mr Hadley who revealed strong doubts about his abilities and intentions.

Speaking of his frustration at the leak, Mr Hadley said Mr Maliki had nonetheless greeted him warmly.

“He’s a really class act,” said Mr Hadley, describing his “vision and determination”. In the November 8 memo obtained by the New York Times, Mr Hadley said Mr Maliki was either “ignorant” of what was going on in Iraq, being deceptive or incapable of turning his good intentions into action.

The two sides discussed the role in the violence played by the radical Shia cleric, Moqtada al-Sadr, whose faction suspended participation in parliament and the cabinet on Wednesday in protest at the summit. Mr Maliki rebuked the cleric, saying he and others in the coalition had the responsibility to protect the government and the constitution and not to break the law.

Maliki Meets With Bush, Sees June Transfer (LAT)

By Peter Wallsten And Solomon Moore

The Los Angeles Times, December 1, 2006

AMMAN, Jordan — President Bush today extolled Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri Maliki's "courage" and vowed to help him secure greater authority over security forces in the struggle to quell violence.

But after about two hours of meetings, the leaders announced no new initiatives or specific plans, and Bush returned to Washington and offered no details about how and where such a transfer of authority would occur -- or how quickly it might stem civil war.

Meanwhile, in an interview on ABC News after the meetings, Maliki claimed that U.S. forces could leave Iraq by June.

"I can say that Iraqi forces will be ready -- fully ready to receive this command and to command its own forces," Maliki told Charles Gibson. "And I can tell you that by next June our forces will be ready."

But Maliki is facing a backlash within his Shiite coalition -- 36 politicians representing anti-U.S. cleric Muqtada Sadr have suspended their participation in government in protest of the prime minister's meeting with Bush.

And Sunni Arab leaders are wary of further Shiite control of Iraq's security forces, elements of which have carried out thousands of death-squad killings against Sunnis.

"We hope that this meeting can have a positive effect on Iraq," said Adnan Dulaimi, a Sunni Arab politician in Iraq. "However, the government has to find a real balance in the security forces. Be fair to the Sunnis. Stop the militias. Stop striking the Sunnis and burning and raping our mosques."

DOJ_NMG_0100247

Bush and Maliki appeared together the day after the disclosure of a classified White House memo questioning Maliki's competence and intentions. But the president sought repeatedly to show that he would stand by the prime minister and leave U.S. troops in Iraq as long as that country's government wanted them there.

"He's the right guy for Iraq, and we're going to help him," Bush said, appearing with Maliki at a luxury hotel before a backdrop of U.S. and Iraqi flags.

Bush also ridiculed critics in the U.S. who have called for U.S. troops to be pulled out of Iraq, a course that has been endorsed by Democratic leaders and is being considered by the independent commission headed by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III. "This business of a graceful exit has no realism to it at all," Bush he said.

Today's events marked the end of another grueling overseas trip for Bush -- the second this month -- in which Bush spent a great deal of time defending his foreign policy. Besides the focus on Iraq, Bush urged allies at a NATO summit in the Latvian capital to devote more resources to Afghanistan, another former tyranny invaded by the U.S. that faces a growing insurgency.

But perhaps Bush's worst moment of the week came upon his arrival to Amman, when a Wednesday evening session with Maliki and Jordan's King Abdullah II was abruptly canceled.

The cancellation sparked confusion upon Bush's arrival in the Jordanian capital and forced White House aides to insist that Maliki was not snubbing the president.

While Bush was animated at times today, Maliki appeared uneasy. Still, the Iraqi leader thanked Bush and embraced the call for speeding the transfer of power over security forces from the U.S. to provincial authorities in Iraq.

"We have agreed together, and we are very clear together, about the importance of accelerating the transfer of the security responsibility," Maliki said.

The mutual praise seemed to directly contradict the White House memo, drafted by National Security Adviser Stephen Hadley and reported Wednesday by The New York Times. In the memo, Hadley pointedly asked whether Maliki might be "ignorant" of the growing violence in his country or misrepresenting his views when he claims to support a unity government of Shiites and Sunnis -- and whether he is acting to shore up his Shiite support.

Hadley wrote the memo on Nov. 8, the day after Democrats won control with a pledge to change course in Iraq. But, far from the contrition that Bush demonstrated in the days following the Nov. 7 election, the president sounded the same defiance that he did on the campaign trail -- even arguing that pulling out U.S. troops would "embolden" terrorists.

Bush seemed to allude to the Hadley memo at one point when he offered an adamant defense of Maliki's support for ethnic coalitions. "You hear all kinds of rumors about the politics inside of Iraq," he said. "I'm talking to the man face-to-face, and he says that he understands that a unified government, a pluralistic society, is important for success."

Ghufran Saidi, an Sadr parliament member, said her fellow Sadr representatives will suspend their membership in government for an indefinite duration, leaving several of Iraq's most important ministries in the hands of deputies until their return.

"Our main problem in Iraq is the continuing occupation," she said. "When parliament spoke to the security ministers and cabinet it was evident that the military and police were not able to develop themselves or acquire new and effective weaponry," she said. "They are not even able to move a small army unit from here to there without prior approval of the occupation forces. This is not sovereignty!"

The Amman meetings took place against a backdrop of continuing violence in Iraq.

Iraqi Army soldiers discovered a grave today containing the recent remains of at least 28 apparent death-squad victims south of Baqouba, according to the U.S. military and Iraqi police.

Nine bodies were found in Baghdad, all showing signs of torture and execution-style shootings, and at least 23 people were killed in clashes and bomb attacks.

The U.S. military said an American soldier was killed in Baghdad today, and another died in the capital Wednesday.

In addition, 14 suspected insurgents were killed in Samarra by U.S. helicopters and other aircraft, according to U.S. military statements.

Iraqi Police intelligence agents clashed with Mahdi Army fighters in the militia's stronghold of Sadr City in Baghdad today in a 90-minute battle, witnesses said.

As The Summit On Iraq Ends, Arabs Wonder, Is That All? (NYT)

By Hassan M. Fattah

The New York Times, December 1, 2006

AMMAN, Jordan, Nov. 30 — For days, Arab governments lobbied against any American opening to Iran, Jordanians planned protests against President Bush and politicians braced for a possible announcement of a timetable for withdrawal from Iraq.

But as the summit meeting between President Bush and Prime Minister Nuri al-Maliki of Iraq concluded Thursday morning, the Arab world was left dumbfounded that nothing had come of it.

"I am baffled by what I saw," said Abdel Moneim Said, director of the Ahram Center for Strategic Studies in Cairo. "This was an expression of the Americans in deep trouble, but Bush's approach to dealing with the Iraqi problem also bore the signs of someone out of touch with what is going on."

Mr. Bush said American troops would remain in Iraq unless Mr. Maliki's government asked them to leave and pledged to accelerate the transfer of authority to Iraqi security forces, but without offering any details. He dismissed calls for a timed withdrawal and emphasized that he and Mr. Maliki would oppose any plan to partition the country. And he appeared to dismiss the possibility of opening relations with Iran, while insisting he is realistic about the difficulties in Iraq.

"I did not see a coherent strategy that really deals with the situation," Mr. Said said. "I did not see Bush realizing how bad it is." Mr. Bush and Mr. Maliki appeared in a joint news conference after an hourlong breakfast meeting with aides at the Four Seasons Hotel here that was followed by a one-on-one session that lasted 45 minutes.

The night before, Mr. Maliki took the unusual step of backing out of a planned meeting with the president, an embarrassment to the White House that came on the heels of the publication of a classified memo from Stephen J. Hadley, the national security adviser, that raised doubts about Mr. Maliki's leadership.

But on Thursday morning, an animated Mr. Bush stood at one lectern, while a decidedly reserved Mr. Maliki stood at another, at times looking tense, at others bemused.

"I saw someone trying to buy time for the next six months," said Turki F. al-Rasheed, director of the Saudi Voters Center in Riyadh, Saudi Arabia, speaking of Mr. Bush.

Mr. Bush sought to counter rumors of tensions with Mr. Maliki, calling him "the right guy for Iraq" while emphasizing his role as the leader of a sovereign nation. "He has shown courage in the last six months," Mr. Bush said.

Yet many Arab analysts saw Mr. Bush as managing Mr. Maliki. At one point he encouraged Mr. Maliki to call on members of the Iraqi news media and told him "good job!" as the news conference drew to a close.

"There's an inherent contradiction in the discourse," said Fares Braizat, an analyst at Jordan University's Center for Strategic Studies, who is a Fulbright fellow in Washington.

While Mr. Bush sought to emphasize that Washington was helping Mr. Maliki achieve Iraqi goals, Mr. Braizat said, he appeared to be guiding Mr. Maliki and at times twisting his arm. "Ultimately, he was dictating to him what to do," he said.

The sessions ultimately proved disappointing for Arab nations, Mr. Braizat said. "The meeting showed that Bush cared about the game, but he did not know how to make the right moves," he said. "There were no tangible results." And that, he said, was what Arab leaders were looking for.

Jordan's security services proved perhaps the biggest winner. They had set out to prove to the international news media that they could keep a tight grip on security while allowing a degree of freedom for Jordanians to express their anger at Mr. Bush and the United States.

"We kept the situation under control, and still the people were able to protest," a senior security official said Thursday evening, speaking anonymously because he is not authorized to speak with the news media. "They burnt some flags, but for us, burning flags is not a security issue, it's an environmental issue."

Bush Returns From Jordan To Face Scrutiny Over Policy (MCT)

By Ron Hutcheson, Nancy A. Youssef And Warren P. Strobel

McClatchy Newspapers, December 1, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0100249

WASHINGTON - President Bush returned Thursday from a war summit with Iraq's prime minister to face growing pressure for a new course in Iraq.

The demand for change is likely to increase next week with the release of a blue-ribbon panel's recommendations and Senate confirmation hearings for Defense Secretary-designate Robert Gates. The Pentagon, the State Department and the National Security Council all are reviewing Iraq policy at the White House's request.

So far, Bush has shown no sign that he's ready for a new approach or willing to scale back the U.S. commitment to a war that's claimed more than 2,800 American lives.

"This business about a graceful exit just simply has no realism to it at all," he said during a news conference in Jordan with Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki.

His meeting with al-Maliki underscored how limited the options are for dealing with a conflict that's threatening to spiral out of control.

The two leaders essentially agreed to do more of the same - transfer security responsibilities from U.S. troops to Iraqi forces - but quicken the pace. Bush has been telling Americans for more than a year that "as Iraqis stand up, we will stand down," with little progress evident on either side of that equation. The president also promised to give al-Maliki more authority over his forces.

In an interview with ABC News, al-Maliki predicted that Iraqis would be "fully ready" to take command of security operations by June.

Independent experts were skeptical.

"It will take years, not months, to fix this situation," Anthony Cordesman, a national security specialist at the Center for Strategic and International Studies, a center-right research center, said Wednesday.

In Iraq, reactions to Bush's pledge to give the Iraqi government more authority over security were colored by sectarian loyalties. Shiite Muslims, the dominant force in the government, welcomed the president's expressed confidence in al-Maliki. For months, they'd complained that Maliki couldn't make any major decisions about government security forces without American approval.

"Maliki got a positive and official commitment that he would handle the security file," said Abd al Kareem al Anzy, the former state minister for national security and a member of al-Maliki's Dawa Party. "I think the U.S. is serious this time about backing Maliki."

Sunni Muslims, who lost power in the U.S.-led invasion, expressed fears of government-sanctioned sectarian attacks. The Iraqi security forces are largely Shiite, and Sunnis complain that they provide cover for Shiite militias.

"We don't feel it is safe to turn over all of the security responsibilities to the current Iraqi security forces because this will be a disaster. These troops have proven that they are affiliated and infiltrated deeply by the militias," said Omar Abdul Satar, a member of parliament and Iraq's largest Sunni slate, the Iraqi Islamic Party.

Among common Iraqis, there was little interest in the Bush-al-Maliki meeting. After all, the public previously has hung its hopes on numerous committees, summits and resolutions to end the spread of sectarian violence, only to see the situation worsen.

"Frankly, the odds are that things will get worse, not better," said Cordesman, who favors a greater U.S. commitment.

Events next week will spotlight problems in Iraq and possible solutions.

Members of the Senate Armed Services Committee will get a chance to offer their ideas when Gates' confirmation hearing begins Tuesday. Bush's choice to replace Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld will face a panel that includes Sens. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., John McCain, R-Ariz., and Robert Byrd, D-W.Va.

The blue-ribbon Iraq commission, formally known as the Iraq Study Group, will issue its recommendations Wednesday. A person close to the bipartisan commission, who spoke only on condition of anonymity because the commission's chairmen insist that no one disclose information before the recommendations are released, said its report would include a grim assessment of the current situation.

The New York Times reported Thursday that the panel, headed by former Secretary of State James Baker and former Rep. Lee Hamilton, D-Ind., would call for gradually withdrawing U.S. combat troops, with no clear timetable. The goal would be to cut the number of troops in Iraq by roughly half, to about 70,000, with greater emphasis on American military advisers to train Iraq's security forces.

The commission also is expected to recommend: greater U.S. diplomatic engagement with Iraq's neighbors, including Iran and Syria; addressing problems with Iraq's reconstruction; and discussing the imperative for political reconciliation among the country's warring sects.

Bush already has rejected suggestions that he reach out to Iran and Syria to seek their cooperation on Iraq. He and his aides also have signaled that he doesn't feel bound to follow the commission's recommendations.

"Obviously, the insights of the Baker-Hamilton commission are going to be a factor as we look forward. But for one to say, `Ah-ha, there they go, there's our blueprint,' it doesn't work that way," a senior administration official told reporters traveling with Bush in Jordan. The official conducted the briefing on condition of anonymity. "The president still is responsible for shaping and conducting foreign policy."

The White House is overseeing its own review of Iraq policy, tying together studies being done by the Joint Chiefs of Staff, the State Department and the National Security Council. National Security Adviser Stephen Hadley said the White House review would be ready in "weeks rather than months," but declined to be more specific.

The president also is contemplating convening a meeting on Iraq in the Middle East that would include Iraq and its neighbors, according to a leaked memo from Hadley. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice is visiting the region now.

Former senior U.S. diplomat James Dobbins predicted that Bush will be compelled to adopt many of the Baker-Hamilton commission recommendations because support for America's military presence is waning fast in Iraq and the United States, as was evident in the Democrats' takeover of Congress in November's elections.

"At some point, one public or the other will simply pull the plug," said Dobbins, who's with the RAND Corp. research center and is among a group of outside experts who have advised the Iraq Survey Group.

By reducing the number of U.S. combat troops and increasing the contingent of military advisers to Iraq's forces, "we have a better chance of sustaining that commitment over the five to 10 years that will probably be necessary," he said.

Youssef reported from Amman, Jordan. McClatchy Newspapers special correspondents Zaineb Obeid and Mohammed al Dulaimy contributed to this report from Baghdad.

Having Pinned Little Hope On Talks, Many Iraqis Appear To Be Beyond Disappointment (NYT)

By Kirk Semple

The New York Times, December 1, 2006

BAGHDAD, Nov. 30 — Even if Sana al-Nabhani had cared about the summit meeting in Jordan on Thursday between Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki and President Bush, she would not have been able to watch the news. As usual, Iraqis went without electricity from the national grid for most of the day and she could not find any gasoline to run her personal generator.

Told by a reporter later in the day about the meeting's outcome, Ms. Nabhani, a 34-year-old homemaker, scoffed: "Is that all? Was that even worth the fuel consumed by their airplanes?"

Her dismay was common among Iraqis who managed to follow the news on Thursday. So was a range of other emotions that probably would not hearten Mr. Maliki or Mr. Bush, including disappointment, indifference and despair.

For many, the talks promised little and delivered less and reaffirmed a widespread loss of faith in the elected government's ability to turn things around.

At a news conference after the meeting, Mr. Bush said he had agreed to speed up the transfer of authority over the security forces to the Iraqi government, as Mr. Maliki has wanted, though the two leaders did not spell out a timetable. Mr. Maliki reassured Mr. Bush that his government was committed to cracking down on outlaws and stabilizing the country.

These assurances amounted to nothing more than hollow promises in the opinion of Ahmed Khalaf, a 34-year-old Shiite who works as a taxi driver in Baghdad.

"It's useless!" he roared as he inched through the traffic-clogged streets of central Baghdad after dusk. "It's wasting time!"

Mr. Khalaf had one hand on the wheel; the other he alternately jerked around in the air for emphasis and pressed against his temple in a vain attempt to soothe a raging headache.

DOJ_NMG_0100251

"Nothing will happen, and we will get no results and no solutions," he went on. "We need a strong state that can make decisions, that can beat the bad guys, can beat the militias. This meeting is just for the media, and it's not useful!"

The summit meeting in Jordan took place against a backdrop of disarray here. War-related deaths among Iraqi civilians have soared on the increasing momentum of revenge between Shiites and Sunnis. Hundreds of thousands of Iraqis have been driven from their homes. Public services remain feeble, with millions of Iraqis going into the chill of a fourth desert winter with only a few hours of electricity a day. And the political process has almost completely ground to a halt.

In a news conference here following his return from Amman, Mr. Maliki called for an end to the parliamentary boycott by 30 legislators and six cabinet members loyal to Moktada al-Sadr, the anti-American Shiite cleric. Mr. Maliki had ignored their request to cancel the meeting with Mr. Bush.

"I wish they would reconsider their decision because it doesn't represent a positive development in our political process," he said. The prime minister urged the lawmakers to express their differences from within the framework of the Parliament.

The members of Mr. Sadr's bloc said they would end their boycott on condition that Mr. Bush cede more authority over Iraqi security forces to Mr. Maliki, and that the government improve public services.

Falah Hassan Shensel, a member of the Sadr bloc, said Thursday that the Sadr loyalists were reaching across ethnic and religious lines to organize an alliance against the American military presence in Iraq. The group, he said, would demand a timetable for the withdrawal of American troops. "It's a patriotic national group, it's not sectarian or ethnic," he said. "We need to be freed from the occupation."

Mr. Sadr led his formidable Mahdi Army in two major uprisings against American forces in 2004 and, since then, has risen to become arguably the country's most powerful politician. By lending his support to Mr. Maliki in the race for prime minister earlier this year, Mr. Sadr earned political capital that has complicated the prime minister's efforts to disband the country's militias.

The American military said Iraqi security forces found 28 bodies on Wednesday in a mass grave outside Baquba, the capital of Diyala Province. In Basra, gunmen killed Naser Kedami, a deputy in the Sunni Endowment, which oversees the country's Sunni mosques, the police said.

Two American soldiers were killed during combat operations in the capital, one on Wednesday and one on Thursday, the American military command said.

Iraqis have grown frustrated with the government's inability to solve the country's worsening crises, and any good faith and optimism that greeted Mr. Maliki when he took office six months ago is quickly drying up.

"The solutions are so obvious that Maliki does not need Bush to tell him about them," said Huda, a 40-year-old graphic designer in Baghdad, who would give only her first name out of concern for her safety.

"Mr. Maliki had many chances before to show his ability, but he failed," she said. "We need a strong man and he is not like this at all."

Mohammad Ridha, a 43-year-old Shiite who is an agricultural engineer in Najaf, said that he had followed the meeting in Amman, Jordan, and that it "didn't make me feel any less depressed."

But he left open the possibility, however slight, that the summit meeting might somehow lead to positive changes. "If I feel a real improvement in the street," he said, dipping into his dwindling reserves of hope, "then I'll say that the meeting was fruitful."

Bush Agrees To Speedy Turnover In Iraq (AP)

By Deb Riechmann

AP, December 1, 2006

President Bush said Thursday the United States will speed a turnover of security responsibility to Iraqi forces but assured Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki that Washington is not looking for a "graceful exit" from a war well into its fourth violent year.

Under intensifying political pressure at home, the American and Iraqi leaders came together for a hastily arranged summit to explore how to stop escalating violence that is tearing Iraq apart and eroding support for Bush's war strategy.

With Bush hoping to strengthen his Iraqi counterpart's fragile government, the tensions that flared when their opening session was abruptly cancelled Wednesday evening were not apparent when they appeared before reporters after breakfast Thursday.

" I appreciate the courage you show during these difficult times as you lead your country," Bush told al-Maliki after nearly two and a half hours of talks. "He's the right guy for Iraq." It was their third face-to-face meeting since al-Maliki took power about six months ago.

"There is no problem," declared al-Maliki.

There were no immediate answers for mending the Shiite-Sunni divide that is fueling sectarian bloodshed in Iraq or taming the stubborn insurgency against the U.S. presence. The leaders emerged from their breakfast and formal session with few specific ideas, particularly on Bush's repeated pledge to move more quickly to transfer authority for Iraq's security to al-Maliki's government.

"One of his frustrations with me is that he believes that we've been slow about giving him the tools necessary to protect the Iraqi people," Bush said. "He doesn't have the capacity to respond. So we want to accelerate that capacity."

There was no explanation from either side of how that would happen, beyond support for the long-standing goals of speeding the U.S. military's effort to train Iraqi security forces and to give more military authority over Iraq to al-Maliki.

A senior al-Maliki aide who attended Thursday's talks said the Iraqi leader presented Bush a blueprint for the equipping and training of Iraqi security forces. The aide, who spoke anonymously because of the sensitive nature of the information, declined to give details.

The November elections that handed control of Congress to Democrats have given rise to heightened calls for the about 140,000 American soldiers in Iraq to begin coming home.

Bush acknowledged that pressure and said he wanted to start troop withdrawals as soon as possible. Still, he insisted the U.S. will stay "until the job is complete."

"I know there's a lot of speculation that these reports in Washington mean there's going to be some kind of graceful exit out of Iraq," he said. "This business about a graceful exit just simply has no realism to it at all."

The president added: "I'm a realist because I understand how tough it is inside of Iraq."

Thursday's meetings were supposed to be Bush's second set of strategy sessions in the Jordanian capital. But the first meeting between Bush and al-Maliki, scheduled for Wednesday night along with Jordan's king, was scrubbed.

Accounts varied as to why, but it followed the leak of a classified White House memo critical of al-Maliki and a boycott of the Iraqi leader's government in Baghdad. Thirty Iraqi lawmakers and five cabinet ministers loyal to anti-American cleric Muqtada al-Sadr said they were suspending participation in Parliament and the government to protest al-Maliki's decision to meet with Bush.

Bush said al-Maliki "discussed with me his political situation," but he declined to step publicly into delicate internal Iraqi matters.

Privately, Bush and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice repeatedly pressed the Iraqi prime minister to disband a heavily armed Shiite militia loyal to al-Sadr and blamed for much of the country's sectarian violence, according to the senior al-Maliki aide.

The official quoted al-Maliki as telling Bush that controlling the group "is not a big problem and we will find a solution for it." Al-Sadr is a key al-Maliki political backer and the prime minister has regularly sidestepped U.S. demands to deal with the Mahdi Army.

Before the cameras, Al-Maliki sent the protesting forces at home a message.

"Those who participate in this government need to bear responsibilities, and foremost upon those responsibilities is the protection of this government, the protection of the constitution, the protection of the law, not breaking the law," he said.

But al-Maliki's insistence on not attending the three-way meeting with Bush and Jordan's king was a troubling sign of possible U.S. difficulties ahead in the effort to calm Iraq.

The Bush administration is believed to be pushing its Sunni allies in the region — meeting host Jordan as well as Saudi Arabia — to persuade Sunni insurgent sympathizers in Iraq to reconcile with the Shiite factions that are close to the Iraqi leader.

DOJ_NMG_0100253

Al-Maliki's refusal to meet with Bush while Jordan's king was in attendance showed a level of mistrust toward his Sunni-dominated neighbors that could bode ill for the U.S. strategy.

Bush, meanwhile, continued to reject drawing Shiite-led Iran into helping Iraq in its struggle for peace.

"I appreciate the prime minister's views that the Iraqis are plenty capable of running their own business and they don't need foreign interference from neighbors that will be destabilizing the country," he said.

Al-Maliki, though, seemed open to the possibility of Tehran, as well as Damascus, getting involved.

A bipartisan commission on Iraq that will unveil recommendations next week is expected to urge direct diplomacy with Iran and Syria, America's chief rivals in the Middle East.

"We are ready to cooperate with everybody who believe that they need to communicate with the national unity government, especially our neighbors," al-Maliki said. "Our doors are open."

The two agreed that Iraq should not be partitioned along sectarian lines into semi-regions for the Kurds, Sunnis and Shiites, Bush said.

"The prime minister made clear that splitting his country into parts, as some have suggested, is not what the Iraqi people want, and that any partition of Iraq would only lead to an increase in sectarian violence," the president said. "I agree."

Iraq Sets Timetable For Transfer (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, December 1, 2006

AMMAN, Jordan -- Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki said yesterday his country's security forces will soon take responsibility for defending their country, and he and President Bush, after meeting here, said they have agreed to expand U.S. training of Iraqi forces and to transfer military control faster.

"Today, we made a step toward 'as soon as possible' by accelerating the transfer of authorities, military authorities, to the prime minister," Mr. Bush said during a joint press conference.

For his part, Mr. al-Maliki said that his armed forces "have reached a good level of competency and efficiency to protect Iraq as a country and to protect its people," according to the translation.

He told ABC News in an interview that his troops will be ready to take full command by June, laying out a timetable by which to measure his government's progress -- something the Bush administration has been reluctant to do.

The men agreed to accelerate training and equipping Iraqi troops, and moving up the timeline for turning over Iraqi divisions to the Iraqi chain of command. They also talked about expanding the Iraqi army and helping the military's intelligence and logistics capabilities, White House officials said.

Each man faces pressure at home to try to gain control of the situation in Iraq, where sectarian violence escalated last month.

Mr. al-Maliki is trying to manage a coalition government that is facing a boycott by lawmakers allied with Shi'ite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr, who are protesting yesterday's meeting with Mr. Bush.

In the U.S., Democrats, who take control of Congress next month, are trying to assert some influence over the president's Iraq policy. And the independent Iraq Study Group will release recommendations next week that will reportedly call for U.S. troops to shift away from a combat role in Iraq.

The talks took place a day after the New York Times published a classified memo written by Mr. Bush's top national security aide that questioned whether Mr. al-Maliki is cut out for his job.

The Nov. 8 memo said Mr. al-Maliki is either "ignorant" of the situation on the ground, being deceptive toward the United States about his intentions, or is incapable of turning those intentions into action.

Yesterday the aide, National Security Adviser Stephen J. Hadley, said the memo did not come up specifically and did not affect the meeting.

DOJ_NMG_0100254

"That's what I was worried about," he acknowledged. "But in terms of the body language in the meeting, the candor of the conversation, the relaxed character of the meeting between the two leaders, the great relief to me was that it did not seem to have an effect on the meeting."

Mr. al-Maliki did cancel a Wednesday night meeting with Mr. Bush and Jordanian King Abdullah II, but Iraqi officials told the Associated Press that was meant to snub the king, not the president. The sources said Mr. al-Maliki did not want to discuss Iraq's security and internal affairs with the king present.

Mr. Bush and Mr. al-Maliki met in Amman because it was a safe location in the region, but the officials said the Iraqi leader never wanted the meeting to be in Jordan.

Mr. al-Maliki brushed aside a U.S. reporter's question about the scrubbed meeting.

"There was not part of our agenda a trilateral meeting, so there is no problem," he said, contradicting the White House, which said a meeting had been scheduled but was canceled by the Iraqis and Jordanians.

It is the third time the two leaders have met in person.

Mr. Bush gave Mr. al-Maliki a vote of confidence, calling him the "right guy" to lead Iraq.

Even so, Mr. al-Maliki appeared stiff and cold toward Mr. Bush as the two men stood at podiums about a dozen feet apart in a ballroom at the Four Seasons Hotel. While the president was praising Mr. al-Maliki and looking at him during opening remarks, the prime minister stared straight ahead and didn't acknowledge the compliments.

Later, Mr. Bush asked if they should take more questions from the press and Mr. al-Maliki seemed irked -- "We said six questions, now this is the seventh, and this is the eighth. Eight questions," he said, according to the translator.

Several times during the press conference, Mr. Bush said Mr. al-Maliki told him the U.S. has been holding him back from being able to govern.

"One of the prime minister's frustrations is, is that he believes we've been slow about giving him the tools necessary to protect the Iraqi people," Mr. Bush said.

Mr. Hadley, who was in some of yesterday's meetings, said this did not mean the Iraqi leader delivered a list of demands or complaints.

Also yesterday, press reports indicated the Iraq Study Group, a bipartisan body that has been studying the situation in Iraq, will recommend U.S. troops reduce their role in day-to-day combat in Iraq.

The recommendations will be released officially Wednesday, and Mr. Hadley said he would wait to see what the report says.

The president has said the report is one voice to which he is listening as he decides how to reshape U.S. policy. Mr. Hadley said those decisions should be coming in "weeks rather than months" but could not say exactly when.

At the press conference, Mr. Bush said there are politicians in Washington looking for "some kind of graceful exit out of Iraq," but the president said that is not his focus.

"We're going to stay in Iraq to get the job done, so long as the government wants us there," he said.

One key Democrat said he was disappointed by the reported recommendations from the study group.

Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. of Delaware, who will become the next chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, said the upcoming report needs to consider some type of arrangement for devolving political power down to lower levels, rather than building a strong central government.

"It would be a fatal mistake to believe we can do that solely by building up a strong central government. That policy has been tried and it has failed because there is no trust within the government, no trust of the government by the people, and no capacity on the part of the government to deliver benefits to Iraqis," he said.

Al-Maliki Faces Revolt Within Government (AP)

By Hamza Hendawi

AP, December 1, 2006

Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki faced a widening revolt within his divided government as two senior Sunni politicians joined prominent Shiite lawmakers and Cabinet members in criticizing his policies.

DOJ_NMG_0100255

Vice President Tariq al-Hashemi said he wanted to see al-Maliki's government gone and another "understanding" for a new coalition put in place with guarantees that ensure collective decision making.

"There is a clear deterioration in security and everything is moving in the wrong direction," the Sunni leader told The Associated Press. "This situation must be redressed as soon as possible. If they continue, the country will plunge into civil war."

Al-Maliki's No. 2, Deputy Prime Minister Salam Zikam Ali al-Zubaie, also a Sunni, argued that the president's government failed to curb the spread of sectarian politics.

A boycott by 30 lawmakers and five Cabinet ministers loyal to anti-American Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr was in protest of al-Maliki's meeting with President Bush in Jordan on Thursday. The Sadrists said the meeting amounted to an affront to the Iraqi people.

Al-Maliki appealed to the Sadrists to end their boycott and admonished them for an action that he said violated the commitment expected from partners in his 6-month-old coalition government.

"I hope they reconsider their decision because it doesn't constitute a positive development in the political process," al-Maliki said at a news conference on his return to Baghdad. "Political partnership means commitment."

Meanwhile, in an interview with ABC, al-Maliki confidently claimed that his forces would be ready to take over responsibility for security in Iraq by June, a timeline that is about 12 months shorter than what has been floated by top U.S. military commanders.

"We and the President (Bush) agreed to keep the same (U.S.) forces on the ground but to train more Iraqi forces," he said, according to excerpts from the interview to be aired later Thursday.

"We did not talk about any timetables and agenda for the withdrawal but now we are focusing on training Iraqi forces and then we will talk about reducing the number of multinationals," he said, alluding to the U.S.-led, 150,000-strong multinational force in Iraq.

He said he had no objection to any timetable for a U.S. troop withdrawal, but cautioned that such action should be put off until Iraqi forces were ready to stand on their own.

On Thursday, Bush said he would speed a turnover of security responsibility to Iraqi forces and assured al-Maliki that Washington was not looking for a "graceful exit" from a war well into its fourth year.

"So, we'll be in Iraq until the job is complete," Bush said.

Saleh al-Ojeili, a Sadrist legislator, said only a timetable for the withdrawal of foreign troops from Iraq would persuade him and fellow Sadrists to resume participation in the parliament and government.

"It is the minimum we can ask for," al-Ojeili said.

A special commission on U.S. policy in Iraq will urge a pullback of some U.S. troops but will not recommend a timetable for withdrawing all U.S. forces, an official familiar with the panel's deliberations said Thursday.

The Iraq Study Group's report, to be released next Wednesday, will press for a greater shift in responsibility for the country's security from American to Iraqi forces. It will also indicate that the presence of U.S. troops is part of the problem in Iraq, said the official, who requested anonymity because the panel's recommendations have not been made public.

Bush has steadfastly refused to announce a timeline for a troop pullout, saying that such a move would play into the hands of insurgents.

In violence on Thursday, the U.S. military reported the deaths of two soldiers, and Iraqi officials said 47 people had been killed, including 37 bodies found dumped in various regions of the country.

Bush, Maliki And That Memo (NYT)

The New York Times, December 1, 2006

President Bush's news conference yesterday with Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki of Iraq had an even greater than usual sense of unreality about it, with Mr. Bush insisting that Mr. Maliki is "the right guy for Iraq" and that American troops will stay "until the job is complete," while Mr. Maliki asserted that his country is a democracy and he is not a captive of Shiite militias.

DOJ_NMG_0100256

But the disconnect seemed even more stunning once you realized that Mr. Bush's national security adviser had sent him a memorandum three weeks ago describing how Iraq was being pulled apart by sectarian hatreds and warning that Mr. Maliki was either "ignorant of what is going on" or unwilling or unable to stop it.

The memo, which was published by The Times this week, at least answers the question of whether Mr. Bush is being told what's going on in Iraq. In it, his national security adviser, Stephen Hadley, describes how Mr. Maliki's Shiite-dominated government has deprived Sunnis of basic services, blocked military actions against Shiite targets and purged Iraq's most effective military commanders to ensure Shiite dominance. The memo also warns that Mr. Maliki may not have "the political or security capabilities" to free himself from his narrow militia-dominated political base.

But the president's performance this week — his refusal to impose any deadlines on Mr. Maliki to start reconciliation talks and break with the militias, and his refusal to give the Pentagon a deadline to stand up an effective Iraqi Army — tells us once again that Mr. Bush does not listen.

That does not bode well for James Baker and the Iraq Study Group, which, according to reports, is likely to call for some pullback of American combat troops along with more aggressive regional diplomacy. Yesterday, Mr. Bush seemed eager to preempt that advice, brushing off suggestions that he talk directly to Iran and insisting that there would be no "graceful exit" from Iraq.

Mr. Bush's lack of curiosity was well known even before he became president, but as time has gone on and bad news has mounted, that disinterested quality has turned into a stubborn refusal to hear bad news. The country simply cannot afford it any longer. Three years of having Mr. Bush trust only his gut has plunged Iraq into bloody chaos and done untold damage to America. There needs to be an urgent change in policy.

Mr. Hadley's memo actually provides a clue to how Mr. Bush has managed to avoid facing hard facts. Despite the horrific situation it describes, the policy recommendations fail to convey any strong sense of urgency and seem to shrug off American responsibility for what has gone wrong. Either the president's security adviser was afraid to be as blunt as the situation requires or he, too, has managed to convince himself that the disaster is really not all that disastrous.

The president's advisers need to tell him all the harsh truths about Iraq in the vivid terms they require; they need to tell him how little time he has left to act. This administration has been orchestrating a foreign policy disaster of epic proportions, and history will remember both that the president failed to hear the warning bells and that many others failed to ring them loudly enough.

There He Goes Again (WP)

By Eugene Robinson

The Washington Post, December 1, 2006

Coherent speech is not one of George W. Bush's gifts, so it's brave of him to hang so tough in a fight over semantics. Ultimately, the latest line the president has drawn in the sands of Mesopotamia -- that there's not a civil war, no matter what anybody says -- is indefensible, like all his previous lines. But who cares?

I'm being flip; of course we should care about the terrible carnage in Iraq. But arguing whether it does or does not meet some textbook definition of civil war is a distraction and a waste of time. Whatever you call the chaos that American bumbling has allowed, it is what it is. "Stuff happens," as Donald Rumsfeld once said.

Call it civil war, call it "stuff," call it whatever you want. Historians will make the final judgment, long after American troops have come home. Assuming they ever do come home.

"We're going to stay in Iraq to get the job done," the Decider said yesterday at his news conference in Amman, Jordan, with Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki. To paraphrase a president who knew how to speak very well, there he goes again.

More than three weeks after an election in which the Republican Party lost control of both houses of Congress because of the debacle in Iraq, there has been no real indication that the president heard what voters said. Yes, he did get rid of Rumsfeld, but the basic policy in Iraq has been the Decider's. Rumsfeld just screwed up the execution, and his public statements about the war were becoming so impolitic and flat-out weird that Bush had been planning his defenestration for some time.

Having been whopped upside the head with a two-by-four, metaphorically speaking, other Republicans are now paying attention. "We certainly got the message," incoming Senate minority leader Mitch McConnell said the other day in a meeting with Post editors and reporters. U.S. policy on Iraq, he said, is "heading in some different direction. That's perfectly apparent."

One would think so. But a lot of things that are apparent to most other people seem to escape the president's notice.

Just look at what has happened this week. First, someone inside the administration leaked a memo by Stephen J. Hadley, Bush's national security adviser, that would dissuade even the most reckless gambler from betting the rent money on the Maliki government. The "reality on the streets of Baghdad suggests Maliki is either ignorant of what is going on, misrepresenting his intentions, or that his capabilities are not yet sufficient to turn his good intentions into action," the memo said.

Then, as Air Force One was nearing Amman, Bush learned that a reception he was supposed to attend with Maliki and Jordan's King Abdullah had been canceled. No snub intended or taken, the president's spokesman said. But since when does any foreign leader cancel any kind of meeting with the president of the United States? At the last minute, no less? Perhaps Maliki was a bit annoyed at that leaked memo questioning his intentions and/or his competence.

Or maybe he was thinking of his standing back home. Shiite cleric Moqtada al-Sadr, who heads the country's biggest sectarian militia and controls a crucial bloc of seats in the Iraqi parliament, was already following through on his threat to boycott participation in the government if Maliki went to Amman to see Bush.

Meanwhile, Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad -- leader of another charter member of Bush's "axis of evil" -- was releasing a letter to the American people that definitively proved only one thing: Ahmadinejad is feeling his oats. He is convinced that the United States is bogged down in Iraq and that his campaign to elevate Iran to great-power status is going better than he could have hoped in his wildest dreams.

Back in Washington, the ballyhooed Iraq Study Group -- the wise elders who were supposed to provide much-needed adult supervision -- seemed ready to call for a gradual pullout from Iraq, but not ready to say when. But whatever advice James Baker and his fellow eminences eventually offer, it will be irrelevant if the president isn't willing to listen.

And, evidently, he's not.

"I know there's a lot of speculation that these reports in Washington mean there's going to be some kind of graceful exit out of Iraq," the president said in Amman. Then he repeated his bottom line: that U.S. forces will stay until "the job" is done. Never mind the question of whether there's any worthwhile "job" that can still be accomplished there.

So don't get your hopes up, people. Sounds to me as if the Decider has already decided.

U.S. Considers Ending Outreach To Insurgents (WP)

By Robin Wright

The Washington Post, December 1, 2006

The Bush administration is deliberating whether to abandon U.S. reconciliation efforts with Sunni insurgents and instead give priority to Shiites and Kurds, who won elections and now dominate the government, according to U.S. officials.

The proposal, put forward by the State Department as part of a crash White House review of Iraq policy, follows an assessment that the ambitious U.S. outreach to Sunni dissidents has failed. U.S. officials are increasingly concerned that their reconciliation efforts may even have backfired, alienating the Shiite majority and leaving the United States vulnerable to having no allies in Iraq, according to sources familiar with the State Department proposal.

Some insiders call the proposal the "80 percent" solution, a term that makes other parties to the White House policy review cringe. Sunni Arabs make up about 20 percent of Iraq's 26 million people.

Until now, the thrust of U.S. policy has been to build a unified government and society out of Iraq's three fractious communities. U.S. officials say they would not be abandoning this goal but would instead leave leadership of the thorny task of reconciliation to the Iraqis. The officials spoke on the condition of anonymity because of the sensitive nature of the deliberations.

The proposal has met serious resistance from both U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad and military commanders in Iraq, who believe that intensive diplomatic efforts to bring Sunni insurgents into the political process are pivotal to stabilizing the war-ravaged country, the sources said.

Khalilzad, who has spearheaded U.S. outreach to the Sunni leadership, has developed a long list of steps to accommodate Sunni concerns, from a possible amnesty to changes in the hydrocarbon law that distributes oil wealth, which is located mainly in Shiite and Kurdish regions. Critics argue that he might be able to broker an agreement, but they question whether it would hold, according to sources close to the discussions.

Opponents of the proposal cite three dangers. Without reconciliation, military commanders fear that U.S. troops would be fighting the symptoms of Sunni insurgency without any prospect of getting at the causes behind it -- notably the marginalization of the once-powerful minority. U.S. troops would be left fighting in a political vacuum, not a formula for either long-term stabilization or reducing attacks on American targets.

A second danger is that the United States could appear to be taking sides in the escalating sectarian strife. The proposal would encourage Iraqis to continue reconciliation efforts. But without U.S. urging, outreach could easily stall or even atrophy, deepening sectarian tensions, U.S. sources say.

A decision to step back from reconciliation efforts would also be highly controversial among America's closest allies in the region, which are all Sunni governments. Sunni leaders in Jordan, Saudi Arabia and the Persian Gulf sheikdoms have been pressuring the United States to ensure that their brethren are included in Iraq's power structure and economy.

But over 10 days of intense discussions recently among top policymakers in the White House review, State Department officials argued that intervening in Iraqi politics is increasingly counterproductive, particularly after elections for a permanent government last December. Reconciliation, they also argued, is now exceptionally unlikely and could actually jeopardize U.S. relations with Iraq's Shiites, who make up about 60 percent of the population, according to sources familiar with the debate.

State Department counselor Philip D. Zelikow, author of the proposal, argued that the United States has compromised its prospects of success by reaching too far, according to the sources.

The State Department proposal, which was introduced at the second of 10 meetings and has dominated debate ever since, suggests that the United States would keep at arm's length diplomatic efforts to bridge the deep divide in Iraq between the two branches of Islam, the sources said.

Another point of debate in the policy review is how far to broaden a new U.S. strategy to bring in regional players to help stabilize Iraq. The White House and the State Department are still wedded to the isolation of Iran and Syria, despite the growing momentum behind the idea of regional outreach, according to sources familiar with the discussions. The idea has also been part of the discussions of the Iraq Study Group.

The policy review team briefed President Bush on Sunday evening with a 15-page slide presentation of its incomplete findings. Although differences have not yet been sorted out, the presentation coalesced heavily around a tilt to the Shiites, sources said. The White House review was then put on hold for Bush's summit with Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki.

The administration had initially hoped to pull together its review about the time the Iraq Study Group released its report, but en route home from the Bush-Maliki summit in Jordan, national security adviser Stephen J. Hadley said changes to U.S. strategy may still be weeks away.

"There is a real sense of urgency, but there is not a sense of panic," Hadley told reporters on board Air Force One. "I think probably it's going to be weeks rather than months. It's going to be when the president is comfortable."

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said in Jordan yesterday that Bush plans to receive the report of the Iraq Study Group on Wednesday, then hear more from the Joint Chiefs of Staff and his own policy review team. "Then I think he'll set out a direction that adjusts our policy to be appropriate to the circumstances that the Iraqis now face," Rice told reporters traveling with her.

Groping For The Exit (WP)

By David Ignatius

The Washington Post, December 1, 2006

"This business about graceful exit just simply has no realism to it at all," President Bush said yesterday after meeting with the Iraqi prime minister, Nouri al-Maliki. And that's probably the right headline as the administration reviews its options for Iraq: No graceful exit.

DOJ_NMG_0100259

That doesn't mean there aren't significant changes ahead in Iraq. The premise of a secret White House policy review conducted over the past two weeks is that current policy isn't working. One of the options that has emerged from this review is a redeployment of U.S. forces over the next year that would focus the American mission on training and advising Iraqi troops.

Bush said yesterday that his goal is to "accelerate" the Iraqi military's control of the country and to reduce U.S. forces there "as soon as possible." Those words should probably be taken at face value. Though administration officials recognize that increased Iraqi control is likely to be a messy process -- the opposite of a "graceful exit" -- the administration has no appetite for a big troop increase. Every senior official I've talked to recently agrees that the number of U.S. troops in Iraq must be reduced over the next year, even if sectarian violence remains high.

The administration is wary of the bold strokes, such as engaging Iran and Syria, that are likely to be proposed by the bipartisan Iraq Study Group headed by former secretary of state James Baker and former representative Lee Hamilton. Administration officials are all for engaging Iran in principle, but they think that under current conditions it's likely to be a dead end. As for Syria, there are different views within the administration, with some officials ready to test Damascus's willingness to temper its alliance with Tehran and others seeing the Syrian regime as a menace whose support could be achieved only at the price of sacrificing the pro-American government in Lebanon.

As administration officials review Iraq strategy, one failed element is the policy of "Sunni outreach" pursued by the U.S. ambassador to Baghdad, Zalmay Khalilzad. Some officials have concluded that Khalilzad's approach made Iraqi Shiites fear that America was abandoning them, without achieving any meaningful reduction of the Sunni insurgency. A few officials argue flatly that it's time for America to take the Shiite side in the Iraqi conflict. "National reconciliation is a fallacy," one senior intelligence analyst said in an interview this week, insisting that, in Iraq, "You have to pick a winner."

The administration seems to be leaning toward a more polite version of this "pick a winner" approach, which is to support the Shiite-led government and an Iraqi army that is overwhelmingly Shiite and Kurdish. Officials hope they can contain the sectarian fighting short of full-blown civil war and partition of the country. But with Khalilzad scheduled to return soon to Washington, probably to be replaced by veteran diplomat Ryan Crocker, the U.S. effort is likely to involve less "Sunni outreach" and more reliance on the Shiite majority and its elected government.

Iran has been especially frustrating for the administration. Officials believed that a breakthrough was near in mid-September, when Iranian national security adviser Ali Larijani signaled that he would be coming to New York with a compromise on the nuclear issue that would open the way for direct U.S.-Iran talks. The U.S. Embassy in Bern, Switzerland, rushed to prepare 150 visas for Larijani's team. But Larijani never made the trip, and U.S. officials concluded that he had lost an internal battle with the hard-line president, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad. Administration officials want to leave the door open for contact with Iran, as in President Bush's statement yesterday, "They know how to get us to the table." But there's little hope now that these talks will be productive.

Rather than seeking Iran's help, the administration is looking for ways to step up the pressure on Tehran, short of military confrontation. Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson has been urging banks in Europe and Japan to restrict lending to Iran, an effort that officials say has had some success. And the White House is said to be talking quietly with Saudi Arabia about a strategy for squeezing Iran's oil revenue over the next several years, through more Saudi production and lower prices, which would worsen Iran's economic predicament.

A sign of how bad things are in Iraq -- and of the administration's conviction that there aren't any silver bullets -- is that White House hopes for a strategic breakthrough now appear to be focused on the Israeli-Palestinian dispute. Senior officials think this is an area where U.S. diplomacy can pay dividends and where compromise may be possible.

That's how bad it is right now in the Middle East -- when the Palestinian morass is regarded as a bright spot.

Our Iraq Policy Must Change (WSJ)

By Jack David

The Wall Street Journal, December 1, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0100260

That our options for ending the war in Iraq are not cast in concrete is made obvious by the ongoing debates in Washington. Responsible policy makers have to consider alternative options for ending a war at all times -- before the fighting starts, and at every stage during it. By all accounts, before the invasion, U.S. policy makers carefully considered how the war would end. Their expectation was that the dénouement would come when Saddam and his cohorts were removed from power and the "people of Iraq," with considerable help from the U.S. and its coalition partners, established a democratic government to rule the country -- one that would be an example for, and contribute to, stability in the Middle East. Today we are re-evaluating whether those expectations can still be realized.

The initially envisaged ending for the war counted on the Iraqis as our partners, and was directly tied to America's overriding strategic goal -- making the Middle East more stable and secure. But if Iraqis now are unwilling to do what is necessary to end the war as we expected, isn't it time to shift the U.S. focus to policies advancing our Middle East interests in ways that place less reliance on them? The war they started with one another on the heels of the well-intentioned invasion impedes U.S. strategic goals for Iraq and the Middle East.

There is no doubt that at every stage the U.S. made decisions, expending coalition blood and treasure, to give Iraqis a chance to govern themselves effectively through an elected government that is truly capable of providing security, stability and some sort of commonly shared freedom -- goals consistent with U.S. goals. A country of that order would not use such weapons of mass destruction as Saddam had demonstrated he was willing to use on his own people and Iranian soldiers. It would not revive his WMD programs. It would not threaten neighbors with an invasion. And it would not offer succor to terrorists who could strike near or far. In short, we believed a free and democratic Iraq would make the Middle East safer and that Iraqis would want this, and could achieve it.

Do circumstances warrant President Bush and his advisers continuing to base policy choices on the belief that Iraqis are willing and able to play the central role we expected them to play in achieving common goals? Are Iraqis willing and able to create and defend a stable democracy in the Middle East?

The saying that freedom is not free is one we've all heard. It frequently is used in discussions about our own history and behavior. Our Founders, in declaring their allegiance to the cause of freedom and security, pledged to each other "our Lives, our Fortunes, and our Sacred Honor." We honor our service men and women who put their lives on the line for all of us. Isn't such a spirit necessary to establish and to sustain freedom? Isn't it necessary in Iraq?

U.S. policy ought to be informed by whether Iraqis are committed to the end result we expected them to embrace. It may be that they are, and still can be, successful with our help. If so, we should provide whatever greater or different assistance is necessary. But there is much evidence that a stable, secure and moderately free Iraq may be beyond the Iraqis' reach, and therefore beyond our own. Shiites kill Sunnis and Sunnis kill Shiites. Sunni, Shiite and Kurdish leaders cannot end the killing. If ending the killing is a priority -- and some Iraqis say it is -- wouldn't Iraqi supporters of that view take more aggressive action? And if too many oppose it, is the end we envisioned attainable? This question is urgent, and we must decide. * * *

If the Iraqis now remain unwilling to make the sacrifices necessary to have an effective democratic government -- including compromises with one another -- to forge a stable, secure future, the war cannot end as we envisioned. In that case, we must place our reliance elsewhere and pursue options for achieving our goals that do not depend on the Iraqis ending the war they have made their own. The goals that were important to the security of the region and to the West are as valid today as they were at the outset. We must pursue them as best as we can, with or without the democratic Iraq which we have worked so hard to help Iraqis build.

Mr. David was deputy assistant secretary of defense for combating weapons of mass destruction and negotiations policy from 2004 to September 2006.

Panel To Urge U.S. Pullback In Iraq In 2007 (LAT)

By Paul Richter

The Los Angeles Times, December 1, 2006

WASHINGTON — A bipartisan panel's call for a gradual U.S. troop withdrawal from Iraq on Thursday exerted new pressure on President Bush to overhaul his war strategy.

DOJ_NMG_0100261

The Iraq Study Group will recommend in its final report next week that U.S. forces begin a pullback next year, according to people close to the study panel, although the report lays out no specific schedule.

The report envisions that the U.S. force of about 140,000 troops could shrink substantially over the next several years as it shifts from a combat role to an advisory and logistical role, the sources said, speaking on condition of anonymity because the report has not formally released.

Analysts said the report could be particularly important in emboldening more elected Republican officials to call for a pullback, putting pressure on a president who must pay attention to his own party. The report's drawdown blueprint, though vague, seemed to suit the political needs of Republican candidates, who want to put Iraq behind them before the 2008 elections, analysts said.

Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki said in an interview Thursday that Iraqi forces would be ready to assume control of the security by June, enabling U.S. troops to begin to leave. But Bush sought to rebuff the study group's suggestions at a news conference with al-Maliki in Jordan.

"I know there's a lot of speculation that these reports in Washington mean there's going to be some kind of graceful exit out of Iraq," Bush said, shaking his head. "We're going to stay in Iraq to get the job done, so long as the government wants us there."

In Washington, opinions varied on whether Bush would continue to staunchly resist the plan.

"Bush will not budge. He's not retreating from Iraq," said Reuel Marc Gerecht, a former CIA intelligence official with the American Enterprise Institute.

Sen. Christopher Dodd, D-Conn., suggested that Bush could pivot quickly, despite his words.

"I'd remind you that about three days before the (Nov. 7) election, the president said he was going to stick with (Defense Secretary) Don Rumsfeld. A day afterwards, he was gone. Don't give up on the president yet," Dodd said.

Under the imprimatur of former Secretary of State James A. Baker III and former Rep. Lee H. Hamilton, D-Ind., the document could have an enduring effect on the issue, experts and congressional leaders said.

"I think history will view this as having consolidated the national debate on finding an exit strategy," said Larry Diamond, a Stanford University political scientist who was a U.S. adviser in Iraq and an adviser to the panel.

Another adviser, who was critical of the report, nevertheless said he believed it would have an important influence because Baker, a close associate of the president's father, "is such an iconic figure."

"People will say, 'Here's what adults have to say about the situation,' " said the adviser, who declined to be identified because the report has not been formally released. "It won't be thrown on the dust heap."

Panel members have considered traveling around the country to discuss the report after it is released, just as Hamilton did when he was co-chairman of the commission that investigated the Sept. 11 attacks, according to a source close to the study group.

Although the report's prescription for a troop drawdown attracted attention this week, the 10 panel members consider a recommendation for a diplomatic offensive, including talks with Iran and Syria, to be its most important.

The troop drawdown recommendation represented a compromise between Democrats, who wanted to withdraw 60,000 combat troops over the course of a year, and Republicans, who wanted to avoid pressing the Bush administration for a pullback.

Some involved in the panel's work thought that compromise, like others, went too far, producing a policy hash.

"In some ways, this is going to make things worse," said one adviser who favored a more aggressive military push. He said the compromises produced "a consensus document on which everybody can agree, but that doesn't say that much."

The troop reduction proposal resembles a proposal offered by Democratic Sens. Jack Reed of Rhode Island and Carl Levin of Michigan, who have been calling for a drawdown to begin within four to six months. Reed and Levin, who is incoming chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, have there should be no fixed timetable and that U.S. forces should shift to an advisory role.

Reed, in an interview, noted that the outlines of the Iraq Study Group's plan and the Reed-Levin plan "track very closely."

"The longer we are there, the less likely it is that the Iraqis will say, 'We can do it,' " he said.

James Dobbins, a former Bush administration envoy and an expert adviser to the study group, said he expects the report to attract support "both on the diplomatic and the military front."

DOJ_NMG_0100262

"There may be a growing bipartisan support in this country for what Jim Baker, Lee Hamilton, the other members of that commission have put together," Dobbins said, adding he expected Bush to respond "not just to political pressures but, above all, to the pressure of events."

Iraq Panel To Urge Pullout Of Combat Troops By '08 (WP)

By Peter Baker And Thomas E. Ricks

The Washington Post, December 1, 2006

The bipartisan Iraq Study Group plans to recommend withdrawing nearly all U.S. combat units from Iraq by early 2008 while leaving behind troops to train, advise and support the Iraqis, setting the first goal for a major drawdown of U.S. forces, sources familiar with the proposal said yesterday.

The commission plan would shift the U.S. mission in Iraq to a secondary role as the fragile Baghdad government and its security forces take the lead in fighting a Sunni insurgency and trying to halt sectarian violence. As part of major changes in the U.S. presence, sources said, the plan recommends embedding U.S. soldiers directly in Iraqi security units starting as early as next month to improve leadership and effectiveness.

The call to pull out combat brigades by early 2008 would be more a conditional goal than a firm timetable, predicated on the assumption that circumstances on the ground would permit it, according to the sources, who spoke on the condition of anonymity because the commission's report will not be released until next week. But panel members concluded that it is vital to set a target to put pressure on Iraqi leaders to do more to assume responsibility for the security of their country.

"It's really about transitioning from a combat to a support role, and basically making very clear that this is no longer an open-ended commitment and we're going to get this done whether the Iraqis like it or not," said one of the sources. "Everybody understands that we're at the end of the road here."

The choice of early 2008 as a goal could also, intentionally or not, change the nature of the debate over the war at the height of the U.S. presidential primary season. If the commission's plan is successful, the war might recede as an issue, as many strategists in both parties hope. But if U.S. commanders do not meet that goal, or if they do but violence only escalates, it may inflame the struggles for both parties' nominations.

Democrats, who captured control of both houses of Congress in last month's midterm elections, and some Republicans have pushed strongly for a timetable for withdrawing U.S. troops. But President Bush has firmly resisted such demands, warning that it would amount to surrender and could destabilize Iraq even further.

At a news conference yesterday after a summit with Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki in Amman, Jordan, Bush seemed to douse the idea of withdrawal in response to news reports about the Iraqi Study Group's recommendations. "This business about graceful exit just simply has no realism to it whatsoever," Bush said.

But aides later cautioned against interpreting that as opposition to any change in the U.S. troop posture. "That's not the case," said one senior official, who spoke on the condition of anonymity. "His position is he's not entering this process with defeat on his mind" for the sole purpose of getting out, the official said. Some options being discussed by the Iraqi Study Group and his own administration's internal policy review, the official said, are "things that he's very open to."

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, in an interview with CBS News, sounded more open to the concept of drawing down forces. "The whole goal here is to transfer responsibility to the Iraqis and to give them enough capability to take those responsibilities," she said. "Obviously, as those responsibilities are transferred, as the capability improves, then American forces will be less in evidence and less needed. That's a natural outcome."

The Iraq Study Group, chartered by Congress and led by former secretary of state James A. Baker III and former congressman Lee H. Hamilton (D-Ind.), concluded its deliberations this week with a draft report about 100 pages long. The report is scheduled to be released next Wednesday and will include a variety of conclusions and recommendations about the region. Among other things, the commission considered proposals to reach out to Iran and Syria and to convene a regional conference to bring all of Iraq's neighbors into the process of stabilizing the country.

The panel included a significant caveat for the 2008 goal for troop withdrawals by recommending that commanders should plan to pull out combat units by then unless "unexpected developments" make them decide that such a move would be unwise, the sources said. Still, they said, the plan would put the onus on U.S. commanders to try to meet the goal or explain why they failed to.

Pulling out combat units would not mean the end of the U.S. military involvement in Iraq, which could continue in a different form for years. The withdrawal would be partially offset by an influx of advisers, trainers and embedded troops. The number of such troops now stands at roughly 5,000 and should be quadrupled to about 20,000, the group's plan says, according to a source. The commission envisions leaving at least several thousand quick-strike U.S. combat soldiers to protect all those other American troops.

Although it was not clear how many U.S. troops would be left in Iraq by 2008, some people knowledgeable about the commission's deliberations have said that it might be possible to reduce the force of 140,000 to half by then. "There'll still be a presence there that will be significant just because of the nature of embedded forces," said one of the sources familiar with the commission's report. "It won't be what we have now, I'll tell you that."

The transition from a combat mission to a support mission would be a radical shift in the nature of the U.S. presence in Iraq, in place more than 3 1/2 years since the invasion that toppled Iraqi President Saddam Hussein from power. The commission sees this shift in emphasis as so crucial that it suggests that U.S. commanders begin by reassigning troops directly out of military units already in Iraq, rather than waiting for new advisers to deploy from the United States.

But some military specialists warned that such a transition could result in more violence or even let the country slide into a full-scale civil war. Many U.S. military commanders believe that the American presence is keeping a lid on Iraq's civil conflict. "I think as we pull down troops, the violence is going to get worse -- and that will make it harder to get the Iraqi army stood up," said Frederick W. Kagan, a defense scholar at the American Enterprise Institute.

Nor would cutting the troop presence increase pressure on Maliki and other Iraqi leaders, a senior U.S. intelligence official contended earlier this week. Rather, he said, it would likely make Iraqi officials feel more endangered and, so, less likely to take risks and make difficult decisions.

Others in Washington cautiously welcomed the emerging report. "I think that the Baker report is . . . going to change the debate in this country," Sen. John F. Kerry (D-Mass.) told CNN.

Sen. Christopher J. Dodd (D-Conn.), speaking on MSNBC's "Hardball," said that "I suspect there may be a growing bipartisan support in this country for what Jim Baker, Lee Hamilton, the other members of that commission have put together."

Sen. Carl M. Levin (D-Mich.), the incoming chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee who has called for beginning a pullout within six months, offered a careful assessment of the few details made public. "It's a welcome change in course," he said, "although it's not as specific, or it's not as pointed, or it's not as clear as I would like."

Panel To Urge Troops Pullback In Iraq (AP)

By Lolita C. Baldor

AP, December 1, 2006

A bipartisan commission on U.S. options in Iraq will recommend a gradual reduction of American forces in Iraq and a significant diplomatic shift that enlists U.S. adversaries to stabilize the increasingly chaotic country, officials familiar with the panel's deliberations said Thursday.

The report will endorse troop withdrawals beginning as soon as early next year but set no deadlines, the officials said. U.S. forces could also be slowly repositioned away from the front lines.

The much-anticipated report could provide political cover to President Bush to meaningfully shift his policies in an unpopular war. Yet advisers to the panel and others aware of its work indicated the recommendations will not be dramatically different from current policy or from ideas already under debate within the administration.

Some media reports suggested that the bipartisan commission, known as the Iraq Study Group, will recommend withdrawing nearly all U.S. combat forces from Iraq by early 2008, leaving behind only those troops needed to train and support the Iraqis. The reports described the recommendation as a goal rather than a firm timetable.

Bush has repeatedly rejected a wholesale pullout or what he calls artificial deadlines.

"This business about a graceful exit just simply has no realism to it at all," Bush said Thursday.

DOJ_NMG_0100264

A former top U.S. official consulted by the commission said he expected the recommended withdrawal would not be conditioned on the Iraqi government establishing benchmarks to improve security. Many remaining U.S. forces would be lighter support and intelligence units, said the official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because the panel's deliberations were private.

The approximately 100-page report will indicate the presence of U.S. troops is part of the problem in Iraq, said another official who also requested anonymity. The panel will demand more accountability from the Iraqi government, although it is not clear how progress would be measured or if there would be specific benchmarks, the official said.

The Washington Post, meanwhile, reported on its Web site Thursday night that the U.S. is considering whether to abandon efforts to bring Sunni insurgents into the political process to stabilize the country. The concern is that the outreach to Sunni dissidents has failed and may be alienating the country's majority Shiites, who dominate the government. The State Department proposed the shift as part of a White House review of Iraq policy, said the report, which cited unidentified sources familiar with the proposal.

The congressionally chartered Iraq Study Group, whose recommendations are not binding, will encourage Bush to engage U.S. adversaries Syria and Iran to improve regional dialogue, several officials said. That outreach could include a regional conference among all of Iraq's neighbors, or a wider gathering of Middle East nations that would also address separate Middle East peace issues.

A former senior U.S. official who participated in the deliberations said the recommendations will include resumption of Mideast peace talks. The official spoke on condition of anonymity.

The report, due Wednesday, suggests that Bush give Iraqi leaders notice that America's military commitment is not open-ended. The panel's Republican and Democratic members could not agree on bolder proposals. Options to quickly bring home a large percentage of the 140,000 U.S. forces supporting the fragile government in Baghdad or set a clear timeline for withdrawal were on the table.

The compromise strategy the panel endorsed also gives the Bush administration some political leverage to step back from red lines it has set in the Iraq conflict, such as Bush's statement this week that he will never "pull the troops off the battlefield before the mission is complete."

Without firm benchmarks for a U.S. military withdrawal, the recommendations would essentially back up Bush's basic policy of using security conditions in Iraq, not a calendar, as the guide to battlefield decisions. The administration has long said it will transfer responsibility for Iraq's security to Iraqi forces as those forces become strong enough to handle the job.

On Capitol Hill, Democrats said the report would be a good first step for their effort to push for a start to U.S. troop withdrawals.

"It's a starting point," said Sen. Carl Levin, D-Mich., incoming chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee.

Sen. John Warner, R-Va., that committee's outgoing chairman, praised the commission and said the administration and Congress have a "moral responsibility" to U.S. troops to reach a consensus policy.

In Baghdad, Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki told ABC News he thinks Iraqi forces will be ready by June to take full control of security. In making the argument that his military and police could handle security in the country, al-Maliki has routinely said the force could do the job within six months.

White House national security adviser Stephen J. Hadley noted Bush has solicited a separate in-house review of Iraq policy. Bush would probably make any changes or decisions arising from the various reports in "weeks rather than months," Hadley said.

"It's really going to be when the president is comfortable in his own mind as to where he wants to go" and has coordinated with Iraqi leaders on a "common plan," Hadley said.

The Bush administration's own crisis evaluation of Iraq could provide a different kind of political cover. With at least two sets of recommendations before him, Bush could pick some from the commission chaired by Republican former Secretary of State James A. Baker III and former Rep. Lee Hamilton, D-Ind., and some from his own advisers.

Hadley spoke as Bush returned from a hastily arranged summit with al-Maliki, who has sometimes had testy relations with his American backers. Bush and his advisers offered warm endorsements of the Shiite leader Thursday, and al-Maliki remains the administration's best hope to build a durable political framework that can govern and protect the country on its own.

DOJ_NMG_0100265

Al-Maliki heads the Shiite-led government established following the ouster of Saddam Hussein in a U.S.-led invasion more than three years ago.

The outlines of the panel's expected diplomatic recommendations are not new, but they would represent a major change away from the Bush administration policy of isolating its enemies except in rare instances.

The administration has not ruled out diplomacy with Iran on stabilizing Iraq nor with Syria with the aim of stopping its interference in Lebanon and permitting militia from Syria to go to Iraq to attack allied forces. But the administration has been reluctant to enter talks lest the gesture be seen as reward for what Washington calls bad behavior.

Separately, a former U.S. official said he had been told by the administration that the commission agreed last week to recommend dialogue with the Iranians and Syrians.

Experts: Repositioning U.S. Troops Could Be Option (USAT)

By Tom Vanden Brook And Matt Kelley

USA Today, December 1, 2006

WASHINGTON — U.S. troops pulled from Iraq as suggested by the Iraq Study Group could be based in friendly countries nearby to provide a quick reaction force in case serious violence erupts, military experts say.

The remaining troops would be stationed in Baghdad, along Iraq's borders and as trainers for the Iraqi military and police, said Michael Eisenstadt, a Middle East military expert who advised the panel but has not read the report.

The report, according to two people who have seen it, will recommend a gradual withdrawal of most of the 70,000 combat forces now in Iraq.

If the troops are withdrawn, the Bush administration would decide when, how and where to move them. Bush appeared to reject the idea of a withdrawal on Thursday after meeting in Jordan with Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki.

The United States would need to leave some of those troops in the region to prevent or respond to armed attempts to overthrow Iraq's government, says James Jay Carafano, another adviser to the study group.

“You need the capability to go in surgically, below the radar, and get the bad guys. You have to have that capacity still in the region,” says Carafano, a defense analyst at the conservative Heritage Foundation think tank. “You want to have something that has a subtle but visible reminder that the Americans haven't left town.”

The Pentagon would have several options for keeping combat troops near Iraq, including existing bases in nearby Kuwait and Qatar. Marine Corps troops and Navy aircraft could wait aboard their ships in the Persian Gulf, as well.

Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld and top military officers also have resisted calls for withdrawing U.S. troops. They have said for the past three years that American forces will begin leaving when Iraq's own police and military can control the country.

Marine Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, repeated that view in a Pentagon news conference Wednesday. Pace denied reports that the Pentagon was considering pulling most of the American troops out of Iraq's Anbar province, a majority Sunni Arab region where insurgents linked to al-Qaeda operate.

“Why would we want to forfeit any part of Iraq to the enemy? We don't,” Pace said. “We want to provide security for the Iraqi people.”

Anbar province has been the scene of violent fighting, as Marine units in the region have taken heavy casualties in October and November.

The bipartisan group's report will help Americans understand the situation in Iraq, even if the Bush administration rejects its suggestions, says Bruce Hoffman, a professor of security studies at Georgetown University in Washington.

Hoffman, another study group adviser, said the report “forces us to take a hard look at the progress to date or the lack thereof.”

Proposing a withdrawal of most combat troops from Iraq risks failing to satisfy U.S. war critics and those who support sending more troops for a stronger crackdown on violence, says military analyst Stephen Biddle.

Having fewer U.S. troops could open the door to more chaos, and focusing on training Iraqi forces could prop up one side in an eventual civil war between Sunni Arabs on one side and Shiites and Kurds on the other, he said.

DOJ_NMG_0100266

"It would be unfortunate if U.S. force structure in Iraq would be an artifact of ideological positioning in the United States," says Biddle, a former assistant professor at the U.S. Army War College. "There needs to be a military objective for them to pursue that makes sense."

Now In Control, Democrats Seek Unified War Strategy (CSM)

By Gail Russell Chaddock

The Christian Science Monitor, December 1, 2006

WASHINGTON

After winning back control of the House and Senate largely on the basis of opposition to the war in Iraq, Democrats are ramping up to find a bipartisan way out of it.

So far, the leading exit strategies on Capitol Hill - more troops, fewer troops, partition of Iraq, and timetables for phased or immediate withdrawal - are tied to individual sponsors. Disagreements cross party lines.

But leading Democrats now say that any exit strategy must be bipartisan. While eager to respect commitments to voters, Democrats don't want to own a war that many believe is already beyond winning - or to be tagged with the consequences of a botched exit.

That's why the recommendations of the bipartisan Iraq Study Group, to be released on Dec. 6, have taken such a high profile on Capitol Hill. If leaks of an agreement this week are accurate, the 10-member, bipartisan panel will call for a gradual pullback of US combat brigades, with no timetable for withdrawal, and direct engagement with Iran and Syria on a regional solution.

"People have their fingers crossed that [the Iraq Study Group] will have something to it that everyone can buy into and that also provides a way out," says Winslow Wheeler at the Center for Defense Information in Washington.

Many Democrats agree that consensus is vital. "There has to be a solid bipartisan consensus, just as there was in the cold war," said Sen. Jack Reed (D) of Rhode Island, who has been the lead spokesman on the Iraq war for the Senate Democratic caucus, in a briefing this week.

But to get to that point, lawmakers will have to grapple with facts on the ground in the war on terror in a way that they have not yet done and move beyond campaign slogans, say defense analysts.

"Congress isn't framing options. Individual members are framing options. There isn't building consensus even within the Democratic Party yet," says Anthony Cordesman, a military analyst at the Middle East with the Center for Strategic and International Studies in Washington, who recently returned from the Middle East.

"Congress has not been kept properly informed," he adds. "As a result, it believes that there is more of an ability to rush things on the part of the Iraqi government than is possible, and that setting deadlines is going to produce progress rather than civil war. The legacy of too many promises and too much spin has created congressional expectations that are unrealistic."

Before the midterm elections, Demo-crats in the House and Senate agreed to three points on Iraq strategy: ensuring a "significant transition" to full Iraqi sovereignty in 2006, including the "responsible redeployment" of US forces; regional diplomacy and more pressure on the Iraqis to "make the political compromises necessary" to defeat the insurgency; and holding the Bush administration accountable on issues ranging from "manipulated prewar intelligence" to poor planning and contracting abuses.

Last June, all but six Senate Democrats backed a nonbinding amendment by Sens. Carl Levin (D) of Michigan and Reed, calling for a phased withdrawal within six months. The amendment failed by a vote of 39 to 60.

In the first congressional hearings on Iraq since the elections, Senator Levin, the incoming chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, renewed his call for a "phased redeployment of our forces within four to six months."

"America has given the Iraqi people the opportunity to build a new nation at the cost of nearly 3,000 American lives and over 20,000 wounded. And the American people do not want our valiant troops to get caught in a crossfire between Iraqis if Iraqis insist on squandering that opportunity through civil war and sectarian strife," he said at the Nov. 15 hearings.

On Tuesday, his cosponsor, Reed, said he was "less comfortable with the timetables and deadlines," and that redeployment could also mean "redeployment of forces in Iraq."

All nine freshmen Democratic senators in the new Congress campaigned to redeploy US troops as rapidly as possible.

DOJ_NMG_0100267

In fact, critics say, it will be tough for Democrats to fulfill voter expectations for any quick change in the situation on the ground in Iraq.

"Congress wants to maintain the fiction that somehow we have control of the affairs on the ground and that we are decisive actors. We are not. We haven't had much control or influence in that country in the last two years," says retired Army Col. Douglas Macgregor, author of three recent books on the US military.

"Nothing is going to be sorted out until we get out. This is what the Democrats are failing on: They need to say this occupation is a serious mistake, and we need to get south of the Euphrates river as soon as possible," he adds.

On Nov. 14, Sen. Russ Feingold (D) of Wisconsin introduced legislation requiring US forces to redeploy from Iraq by July 1, 2007.

Meanwhile, many Republicans are shifting into defensive mode as they give up control of oversight committees. GOP Rep. Zach Wamp of Tennessee and Sen. Johnny Isakson (R) of Georgia said this week that they are backing Sen. John McCain's plan to boost troop levels by as much as 20,000 in Iraq.

Pressure Grows For Talks With Syria, Iran (WSJ)

By Neil King Jr. And Greg Jaffe

The Wall Street Journal, December 1, 2006

WASHINGTON -- From the Baker-Hamilton panel on Iraq to British Prime Minister Tony Blair to top Democrats in Congress, calls are growing for President Bush to drop his opposition to engaging with Syria and Iran about the future of Iraq.

But behind all of the clamor for a regional approach lies several tough questions: Do Syria and Iran really want to deal with the U.S. on Iraq? What price would the two countries demand for lending a hand? And even if they did agree to help, would their assistance significantly help to tilt events for the better in Iraq, with which both share a border?

The answers on all counts don't appear promising. Iran and Syria are both longtime foes of the U.S. and could demand a high price for their cooperation. As a result, enlisting their help could require the administration to sacrifice other goals for uncertain gains in stabilizing Iraq.

The call for a sustained, new outreach to Damascus and Tehran, along with Iraq's other neighbors, is an important recommendation of a lengthy report set to be released Wednesday by the Iraq Study Group. The bipartisan panel, led by former Secretary of State James Baker, a Republican, and former Democratic Rep. Lee Hamilton, will also advise the Bush administration to begin pulling back American combat troops in Iraq while significantly increasing support to the Iraqi Army, primarily by boosting the number and quality of U.S. military advisers working with its forces, said a commission member and other officials familiar with the report. Some of the contents of the report were published in the New York Times Thursday.

Currently, the U.S. has about 3,500 advisers posted there, divided into 10-man teams and embedded with Iraqi Army and police units. As late as Nov. 24, the panel was soliciting advice from military experts on how to ensure that the Army and Marine Corps select their best and brightest officers for advisory duty. In recent months, that task has fallen to less-experienced National Guard and reserve officers. The final report will likely recommend that the advisory program be increased by "several thousand officers," said one person involved in the debate.

The study group's hope is that the larger U.S. military presence within Iraqi units would help them to improve more quickly and allow U.S. forces to pull back to larger, more secure bases away from Iraqi cities. The U.S. advisers would have the ability to quickly call on American forces if their units were being challenged or overrun.

Less clear is the panel's view on how the U.S. might help to heal Iraq's deep factional divisions, distribute its oil revenue and preserve the country's unity. The report has spurned the idea, promoted by several prominent Democrats, of a "soft partition" of the country along ethnic lines, said several participants.

Those calling for the administration to engage with Syria and Iran argue that both have abetted Iraq's growing disintegration and both have sway over different portions of the country's population. So, as hard as it may be for Mr. Bush to swallow, these people argue, any lasting cure for Iraq must involve both Damascus and Tehran.

DOJ_NMG_0100268

Skepticism runs deep, within the Bush administration and in foreign-policy circles, over how useful these longtime U.S. foes could be and how sincere any offers of help would be. "It is no panacea," one senior U.S. official said, adding that Syria and Iran could make matters worse in Iraq but have limited leverage to make things better.

Patrick Clawson, an Iran expert at the Washington Institute for Near East Policy, agreed: "What they can do is stop being a problem. And while that's significant, that's about it."

Syria's ambassador to Washington, Imad Moustapha, has insisted that Damascus is both eager to talk and crucial to Iraq's future stability. Iran has been less unequivocal. Tehran's ambassador to the United Nations, Javad Zarif, spoke last month of regional "shared commonalities" between the U.S. and Iran, but he and others have signaled that Iran would demand unspecified favors to engage with the U.S. over Iraq's future. Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad demanded in a letter to the American people this week that the U.S. pull all of its troops from Iraq.

The escalating violence in Iraq and mounting calls for the U.S. to seek help from Iran and Syria have increased the prestige of both countries -- and strengthened their bargaining hand.

Tehran's list of favors in return for help would almost certainly start with a demand for greater international latitude on its nuclear program, analysts said. Other potential demands could include a promise from the U.S. to respect Iran's security and its current regime, to formally recognize Iran's influence in Iraq, and to lift some longstanding U.S. sanctions against Tehran imposed in response to its nuclear work and support for terrorist groups, analysts said.

The price for Syrian engagement could also run high. Syria, above all, would like to see a derailing of the international inquiry into the 2005 murder of former Lebanese Prime Minister Rafik Hariri. Preliminary U.N. investigations have implicated officials in Damascus, an allegation that Syrian officials have denied.

Mr. Bush and his top aides have consistently brushed aside the idea of sitting down with high-level Syrian officials on the grounds that their country's support for terrorist groups doesn't warrant discussion and Syria already knows how it could help to stem the violence in Iraq.

Washington's attitude toward Iran is more complex. The White House has said that Tehran is welcome at any time to take up an offer from this summer to negotiate over its nuclear program but that the U.S. won't talk unless Iran first suspends its uranium-enrichment program. Yet administration officials at the same time have suggested they may be willing to sit down with Iran on talks strictly focused on Iraq.

The Shiite Muslim regime in Tehran has gained influence among Iraq's majority Shiite population, particularly as a supplier of money, arms and training for major Shiite militias -- notably the one led by anti-American cleric Muqtada al-Sadr. But U.S. officials and others say they doubt Iran could quell the sectarian violence that has gripped large parts of the country unless the militias themselves agreed to put down arms, because they are becoming increasingly self-sufficient, with their own oil-fed revenue streams and outside arms suppliers, these people say.

This Is Realism? (WP)

By Charles Krauthammer

The Washington Post, December 1, 2006

Now that the "realists" have ridden into town gleefully consigning the Bush doctrine to the ash heap of history, everyone has discovered the notion of interests, as if it were some new idea thought up by James Baker and the Iraq Study Group.

What do people think we've been doing for the past five years? True, the president's rhetoric has a tendency to go soaringly Wilsonian, e.g. the banishing-tyranny stuff in his second inaugural address. But our policies of democratization in Iraq and Afghanistan and Lebanon have been deeply rooted in the most concrete of American interests.

If we really had been in the grip of "idealism," we'd be deep in Chad and Burma and Darfur. We are not. We are instead trying to sustain fragile democracies in three strategically important countries -- Afghanistan, Iraq and Lebanon -- that form the geographic parentheses around the principal threat to Western interests in the region, the Syria-Iran axis.

We are trying to bring democracy to Iraq in particular because a pro-Western government enjoying legitimacy and popular support would have been the most enduring means of securing our interests there. Deposing Saddam & Sons was essential because they posed a permanent strategic threat to the region and to U.S. interests. But their successor -- the popularly elected Maliki government -- has failed.

The cause of that failure is rooted in an Iraqi political culture that makes it as yet impossible for enough of the political leadership to act with a sense of national consciousness. We should nonetheless make a last effort to change the composition of the government and assemble a new one composed of those -- Kurds, moderate Sunnis, secular Shiites and some of the religious Shiites -- who might be capable of reaching a grand political settlement.

Everyone now says that the key to stopping the fighting in Iraq is political -- again, as if this were another great discovery. It's been clear for at least a year that a military solution to the insurgency was out of our reach. The military price would have been prohibitive and the victory ephemeral without a political compromise. And that kind of compromise -- vesting the Sunnis with proportionate political and financial (i.e. oil) power -- is something the Shiites, at least those now comprising the Maliki government, seem incapable of doing.

The United States should be giving Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki a clear ultimatum: If he does not come up with a political solution in two months or cede power to a new coalition that will, the United States will abandon the Green Zone; retire to its bases; move much of its personnel to Kurdistan, where we are welcome and safe; and let the civil war take its course. Let the current Green Zone-protected Iraqi politicians who take their cue from Moqtada al-Sadr face the insurgency alone. That might concentrate their minds on either making a generous offer to the Sunnis or stepping aside for a coalition that would.

The key to progress is political change within Iraq. The newest fashion, however, is to go "regional," engaging Iran and Syria in order to have them pull our chestnuts out of the fire. This idea rests on the notion that both Iran and Syria have an interest in stability in Iraq.

Very hardheaded realist terms: interest, stability, regional powers. But stringing them together to suggest that Iran and Syria share our interests in stability is the height of fantasy. In fact, Iran and Syria have an overriding interest in chaos in Iraq -- which is precisely why they each have been abetting the insurgency and fanning civil war.

Perhaps in some long-term future they will want a stable Iraq as a tame client state of the Syria-Iran axis. For now they want chaos. What in God's name will a negotiation with them yield?

At best they might give us a few months to withdraw. But why do we need their help to do that? We can do our withdrawing very well without them. And in return for non-help in a non-solution that is essentially a surrender, Syria would demand to be given a free hand once again in Lebanon -- just as, when the United States needed help in Iraq before the Persian Gulf War, then-Secretary of State James Baker gave Lebanon over to Syria as a quid pro quo.

And Iran will demand a free hand with its nuclear weapons project, which will turn it into the regional superpower dominating the Gulf Arabs and their oil.

If that would save Iraq for us, there might at least be an argument for such a swap. But just to cover an American retreat? This is sacrificing one interest without even securing another. It's enough to give realism a bad name.

Iraq Spending Bill To Test Democrats (AP)

By Andrew Taylor

AP, December 1, 2006

The Bush administration is hammering out its largest-ever appeal for more Iraq war funds — a record $100 billion, at least, and that figure reflects cuts from wish lists originally circulating around the Pentagon.

The measure will give Democrats, who take control of Congress next year, an early chance to try changing the conduct of the war. But they are limited and do not want to be cast as unsympathetic to U.S. troops.

"We're not going to do anything to limit funding or cut off funds," says Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid, D-Nev.

Senior Pentagon officials have trimmed initial requests from the Army and Air Force. But with $70 billion already approved for the budget year that began Oct. 1, and more money needed to replace lost or worn-out equipment, spending levels for 2007 easily will be at the highest since the Iraq war began in 2003.

DOJ_NMG_0100270

Precise figures have not been set by either the Pentagon or the White House. The requests in February for Iraq and Afghanistan probably will be about $100 billion, but could climb as high as $128 billion if the services get their way, said Jim McAleese, a Virginia lawyer who specializes in national security law.

In addition to the money already approved, the cost of the total military spending for Iraq and Afghanistan could come close to $200 billion in 2007. About $120 billion was spent in the 2006 budget year, according to the Congressional Budget Office.

Despite widespread discontent over the Iraq war and President Bush's handling of it, Democrats are expected to grant the vast majority of the request. Yet evidence is accumulating that the figure the White House sends to Capitol Hill will not be limited to dollars critically needed for troops and war-fighting.

There is much sentiment among Democrats to protect troops and fear about being portrayed as unsympathetic to men and women in uniform. These factors probably would overwhelm any efforts by anti-war Democrats to use the debate over the Iraq money to take on Bush's conduct of the war.

"Although the Democrats are very uncomfortable with the way the Iraq policy is being executed, they are at pains not to appear that they are shortchanging troops in the field," said Loren Thompson, chief operating officer of the Lexington Institute, a Washington-area think tank.

"This is their opportunity to show that they, too, are pro-defense," Thompson said.

Democrats are promising to give the upcoming request greater scrutiny than Republicans did when considering Bush's previous requests.

"It won't just be a rubber stamp on what they give us," said Kirsten Brost, spokeswoman for the incoming chairman of the House Appropriations Committee, Rep. David Obey, D-Wis.

There is increasing concern about the cost of the war and the fact that Iraq spending is kept on a set of ledgers separate from the rest of government operations.

It is possible that the recommendations of the Iraq Study Group could affect the spending request.

Since the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, Congress has approved about $500 billion for Iraq, Afghanistan and other terrorism-fighting efforts.

The Vietnam War cost an inflation-adjusted $121 billion at its height in 1968, according to the Congressional Research Service. The overall tally for Vietnam is $663 billion, adjusted for inflation, while Iraq so far come to about $350 billion.

The cost of the war has risen dramatically as the security situation has deteriorated and more equipment is destroyed or worn out in harsh conditions.

The Pentagon increasingly is using war spending bills for costs not directly related to Iraq and Afghanistan. Last month, Deputy Defense Secretary Gordon England said the four military services could add projects connected to the broader fight against terrorism, which critics said could be interpreted to cover almost anything.

"He was telling the services to put any damn thing they wanted into the supplemental," said Winslow Wheeler of the Center for Defense Information, a think tank policy group, in Washington. Such costs include buying cargo plans and restructuring Army outfits into smaller, more nimble fighting units.

England's memo led to inflated requests that are now being "scrubbed" by higher-ups at the Pentagon. While that could lower the price for the February request, Wheeler said, the services are likely to try again in future bills.

Pentagon spokesman Bryan Whitman had no comment on the upcoming request for money.

Democrats have not been shy about adding money not sought by the president to war bills. Most notably, the Senate in August included $13 billion for Army and Marine Corps combat readiness in a Pentagon budget measure that had $70 billion in Iraq.

Farm-state lawmakers such as Sen. Kent Conrad, D-N.D., may try to use the Iraq debate to push billions of dollars in agricultural disaster aid.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Corporate Fraud Crackdown Gone Too Far? (AP)

DOJ_NMG_0100271

By Lara Jakes Jordan, ASSOCIATED PRESS

AP, December 1, 2006

WASHINGTON (AP) - A former top Justice Department official who wrote the government's policy to crack down on corporate lawbreaking said Thursday that prosecutors appear to have overreached when targeting some businesses.

Former Deputy Attorney General Larry Thompson defended the policy's overall goal, which was crafted in the aftermath of widespread fraud and illegal scheming at corporate giants such as Enron and WorldCom. But prosecutors now may be too aggressive when pressuring businesses to cooperate with investigations of wrongdoing by company executives or employees, he said.

The legal tactics outlined in the "Thompson Memo" in 2003 were intended for very limited use, Thompson said.

"There seems to be a sort of a disconnect," Thompson told an audience at the Heritage Foundation, a conservative think tank in Washington.

He said his former Justice Department colleagues claim they rarely pressure businesses to disclose confidential attorney-client information in exchange for more lenient prosecutions, but defense lawyers say such demands happen in many cases.

The Justice Department is discussing whether to roll back some of the harsher guidelines in the Thompson Memo, which suggests that companies failing to cooperate with prosecutors will be more readily indicted - a death knell in an ethics-sensitive business era. Those changes could come as early as next week.

"We may be entering an era where the department should consider perhaps making appropriate revisions to the memo," said Thompson, now general counsel at PepsiCo.

Changes sought by defense attorneys, business lobbyists and other critics include:

-Ending the prospect of tougher prosecution of corporations that refuse to turn over, or waive, confidential discussions and information between attorneys and clients. The Justice Department is considering requiring prosecutors to get the Attorney General or his top deputy to approve waiver requests.

-Eliminate penalties for firms that continue to pay legal fees for their employees. In June, a federal judge in New York ruled the policy violates employees' rights to fair trials.

-Stop criminal prosecutions of businesses with standards similar to those used against company executives and other individuals.

The call to ease the legal crackdown on corporate fraud mirrors a similar push by the financial community to relax rules for business financial controls that area a key part of the 2002 Sarbanes-Oxley anti-fraud law.

The movement has gained traction with Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson, who has questioned whether the costly regulations are hurting the competitiveness of U.S. financial markets by driving some companies away from them.

Outgoing Senate Judiciary Chairman Arlen Specter, R-Pa., said he plans to propose legislation next week that would bar the Justice Department from putting undue pressure on companies to cooperate. He described the current policy as "coercive."

Former Deputy At Justice Dept. Would Limit Legal Disclosure (NYT)

By Lynnley Browning

The New York Times, December 1, 2006

A former Justice Department official who drafted the guidelines used after the Enron collapse to combat corporate wrongdoing said yesterday that prosecutors should only rarely use one of the guidelines: asking companies to disclose legal communications.

The comments by the official, Larry D. Thompson, a former deputy attorney general, were his first public remarks on how the 2003 guidelines, known as the Thompson memorandum, should be interpreted, amid mounting criticism that the tactics are coercive and unconstitutional.

Speaking at a Washington conference at the Heritage Foundation, the conservative research group, Mr. Thompson, now general counsel of PepsiCo, said that requests by federal prosecutors that companies, executives and lawyers disclose legal communications among themselves and other parties should be “extremely limited.“

The Justice Department is in the early stages of drafting a revision of the Thompson memorandum that would clarify under what circumstances, if any, legal communications should be disclosed to investigators.

Department lawyers can have a revised document ready for signing by Deputy Attorney General Paul J. McNulty as early as next week, according to people who have been briefed on the issue. The revised guidelines may require prosecutors to obtain approval from the highest levels of the Justice Department before disclosures are requested.

A department spokesman, Brian Roehrkasse, said yesterday that "no decisions have been made to amend our current guidance."

The guidelines as they are now lay out nine factors that prosecutors should consider when deciding whether to seek the indictment of a company or an individual. Among them are whether the suspect has demonstrated cooperation with prosecutors by disclosing legal communications to them. Such disclosure is known as a waiver of attorney-client privilege.

Under the existing guidelines, companies that do not demonstrate such cooperation face a greater risk of indictment — a potential death knell, as it was for the accounting firm Arthur Andersen in 2002.

But the guidelines have come under criticism. The federal judge in Manhattan overseeing the trial of former employees of the accounting firm KPMG in a criminal tax-shelter case has assailed them as unconstitutional.

And in recent months, former top officials of the Justice Department and prominent white-collar defense lawyers have complained to the department that prosecutors now uniformly request the disclosure of legal communications as part of their investigations.

Senator Arlen Specter, Republican of Pennsylvania, the departing chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, threatened yesterday to introduce legislation next week if the Justice Department did not amend the guidelines by then. Mr. Specter is demanding that the department eliminate the guideline on the disclosure of communications, but it is unclear if Mr. McNulty will agree to that.

Prosecutor Pursues Backdating Violators (AP)

By Vinnee Tong, Ap Business Writer

U.S. Attorney: Company Reaction to Options Inquiries Crucial to Whether Prosecutors Indict

NEW YORK (AP) -- The federal prosecutor overseeing Silicon Valley said Thursday the way a company responds to stock option backdating allegations is crucial to whether or not it will be indicted.

Kevin Ryan, the U.S. attorney for the Northern District of California, in July created a task force to pursue criminal charges related to stock option backdating. The group includes investigators from the U.S. attorney's office, the Internal Revenue Service and the Federal Bureau of Investigation.

"How a corporation chooses to react is crucial to whether the corporation is indicted or not," Ryan told a securities litigation conference sponsored by the International Quality & Productivity Center on Thursday.

The Securities and Exchange Commission and U.S. Department of Justice are pursuing civil investigations related to backdating of stock options. Ryan's task force is focused on seeking targets for potential criminal charges in Silicon Valley, where many companies used stock options to compensate employees in the 1990s.

He said prosecutors would "look at whether the corporation has impeded the investigation while purporting to cooperate." Ryan said his office would use as a guiding principle the Thompson memo, which directs prosecutors to look at the authenticity of a company's effort to cooperate with an investigation. The memo was written by former Deputy Attorney General Larry Thompson.

On Wednesday, though, the Justice Department said it would review the guidelines in the Thompson memo, which have been criticized as unfairly pressuring companies to cooperate.

The memo was written after scandals involving Enron Corp. and WorldCom Corp., and was designed to aid coordination among the country's 94 U.S. attorneys.

The policy allows prosecutors to show leniency to companies that cooperate by refusing to pay employees legal fees and disclosing confidential discussions between company lawyers and executives targeted by the government.

DOJ_NMG_0100273

Ryan said he formed the task force to ensure investor confidence and address a particular need to examine options dating practices in Silicon Valley, where companies were heavily dependent on using stock options as compensation.

"We believe there's a strong nexus to the technology sector," Ryan said, adding that these were companies that emphasized innovation and creativity but were undercapitalized while offering the potential for big payouts later.

Technology companies in Ryan's district that are being investigated include Cnet Networks Inc., KLA-Tencor Corp., and Mercury Interactive Corp., which are being examined by either the SEC or the Justice Department.

Ryan's office has issued one of the only criminal indictments over options backdating, against two executives of San Jose, Calif.-based Brocade Communications System Inc. Among other charges, the executives face accusations that they knowingly tried to hide backdating by advising an employee not to discuss options grant practices by e-mail and advising the CEO to not always pick the lowest grant price, in order to avoid the appearance of suspicious activity.

With regard to ongoing investigations, Ryan also said legal time limits on filing of criminal charges could be an issue as the task force does its work.

"It's an issue, we're not denying it's an issue, but we still think there's a lot of activity out there," Ryan said. "If it's criminal, we still have the statute and the venue on our side."

Stock options give employees the right to buy shares at a set price at a future date and can be lucrative if the stock price rises. Companies that backdated options put the grant date of the options at a low point in their share price, raising the recipient's profit.

Backdating is not necessarily illegal. Companies break the law when they don't disclose the practice and fail to report the costs in their earnings reports. Investigations have forced some companies to restate earnings by as much as hundreds of millions of dollars.

Judge Puts On Hold McGuire's Exit Pay From UnitedHealth (WSJ)

By Vanessa Fuhrmans And Joann S. Lublin

The Wall Street Journal, December 1, 2006

In an unusual move, a federal judge has temporarily barred ousted UnitedHealth Group Inc. Chief Executive William McGuire from exercising stock options or receiving any retirement pay or other exit benefits while an external, board-appointed committee establishes whether the health insurer has claims against him.

The order, which backs a joint motion by attorneys for several shareholder lawsuits and Dr. McGuire himself, puts on hold any agreement between UnitedHealth and its longtime chief executive over the terms of his departure until those legal questions have been answered. Dr. McGuire agreed to resign in October after an internal report concluded millions of stock options were likely backdated on his watch. He left the company yesterday with negotiations over his retirement package still unresolved.

The injunction is unusual in the annals of executive pay. U.S. District Judge James Rosenbaum of Minnesota handed it down late Wednesday partly at the request of attorneys representing a group of shareholder plaintiffs who have filed lawsuits against UnitedHealth. The complaints argue that the option backdating lined the pockets of Dr. McGuire and other top executives at the expense of the company. "If he were able to reap what we see as ill-begotten gains, we'd be asserting a claim without a remedy," said Karl Cambronne, lead attorney for the group.

Several compensation and governance experts say they believe the ruling may encourage aggrieved shareholders elsewhere to try to block unjustified exit packages before directors dole them out. It "could have a snowball effect," said Steven Friedman, head of the executive-compensation practice at law firm Littler Mendelsohn in New York. To the extent investors vigorously pursue these court orders, "boards will feel like they have to go along with them just so they don't seem like they're in collusion with the [exiting] executive," he added.

The injunction also gives UnitedHealth and Dr. McGuire breathing room in what have become protracted negotiations over the terms of his departure.

UnitedHealth's board faces considerable pressure not to let Dr. McGuire walk away with an excessive retirement package, especially before it determines whether it has claims against him. But his employment contract provides him with a strong hand in negotiations, taking a very limited view of what constitutes grounds for firing. Short of that, just about any other kind of departure would allow nearly all of his options to immediately vest and let him draw on a pension of more than $5 million a year.

Now, however, the board will have to wait until a "special litigation committee" determines what sort of claims it may have against Dr. McGuire, protecting it from negotiating a too-generous retirement package in the interim. The committee, appointed by the board in June to advise on the numerous shareholder lawsuits filed against UnitedHealth, comprises two former Minnesota Supreme Court justices, Kathleen Blatz and Edward Stringer. The court order, the company said in a statement, "preserves the SLC process."

Dr. McGuire also supported the plaintiffs' push for an injunction, and his attorneys even drafted the proposed court order, according to one person familiar with the situation said. The departing CEO believes the special litigation committee will vindicate him once "all the evidence is in," this individual said.

The special court-appointed panel will decide whether UnitedHealth should sue any officers or directors "for breach of fiduciary duty," the knowledgeable person explains. The injunction can be extended beyond July 30 if the special committee hasn't completed its investigation by then.

Without the injunction, Dr. McGuire would have been free to exercise his remaining stock options once UnitedHealth issued its restated financial statements.

In early November, Dr. McGuire agreed to forfeit roughly $200 million in gains from options that had carried dates prior to the dates on which they had been actually granted, making them more valuable than they would have been.

Finisar Begins Review Into Stock Option Grant Practices, Delays 2nd-Quarter Filing

SUNNYVALE, Calif. (AP) -- Shares of network components maker Finisar Corp. sank Thursday in after-hours trading the company said it launched a voluntary investigation into its historical stock option grants and that restatements will likely follow.

The company's stock plunged 20 cents, or 5.2 percent, to $3.63 in after-market trading on the INET electronic exchange, after adding 8 cents to close at $3.83 on the Nasdaq. The shares have ranged between $1.73 and $5.49 over the past year.

Finisar joins a list of at least 187 companies that have disclosed Securities and Exchange Commission, Justice Department or internal probes into possible stock options backdating, according to an AP review.

The company said it reviewed grants made since its initial public offering in 1999 and concluded that it is likely that measurement dates for certain stock option grants differed from the recorded grant dates, and that it will probably need to restate past historical statements to correct the accounting. The company said it does not yet know the financial impact of the restatements, and that the investigation is ongoing.

Finisar also said it will delay filing full fiscal second-quarter results until the probe is complete.

Revenue for the three months ended Oct. 29 rose 25 percent to $108.2 million, from $86.6 million a year ago. While sales fell in the middle of the company's own guidance to $106 million to $112 million, they missed Wall Street's view. Analysts polled by Thomson Financial were looking for revenue of $110 million.

Finisar said optical subsystems and components revenue rose 27.8 percent to $99 million in the quarter. Network test and monitoring systems revenue were flat at $9.2 million.

On Wednesday, the company said its board of directors had approved a medical leave of absence for Chief Financial Officer Stephen K. Workman.

Judge Approves Delphi's SEC Settlement (AP)

By Bree Fowler, The Associated Press

AP, December 1, 2006

NEW YORK -- A federal bankruptcy judge on Thursday approved the settlement of accounting fraud charges against Delphi Corp. and six people, including the auto-parts supplier's former chief financial officer.

DOJ_NMG_0100275

Judge Robert Drain of the Southern District of New York called the settlement with the Securities and Exchange Commission "fair and equitable" and said it was in Delphi's best interest.

The SEC, in a filing in federal court in Detroit, had charged former Delphi Chief Executive J.T. Battenberg and others with participating in or aiding and abetting the company's fraud. It said on Oct. 30 that it had reached a settlement with Delphi and the six people.

Delphi, the nation's largest auto-parts supplier, filed for bankruptcy protection in October 2005. Resolving the SEC probe could help it move closer to emerging from bankruptcy next year.

Under the settlement, the Troy, Mich.-based company will not face penalties because of its cooperation with investigators. Delphi settled the charges "without admitting or denying the Commission's allegations," the SEC said at the time.

Under the settlement, former Chief Financial Officer Alan Dawes agreed to pay $687,000 in fines and restitution, and five others agreed to pay penalties.

The SEC investigation found that Delphi manipulated its earnings from 2000 to 2004, using several illegal schemes to boost its earnings, including the concealment of a $237 million transaction in 2000 with its former parent company, General Motors Corp., involving warranty costs.

The Justice Department has also been conducting a criminal investigation of the company related to the accounting practices.

Battenberg, Delphi's founding chairman after it was spun off from GM in 1999, announced his retirement in February 2005, shortly before the SEC probe was announced.

In addition to Battenberg and Dawes, the SEC complaint also named Paul Free, Delphi's former controller and chief accounting officer; John Blahnik, Delphi's former treasurer and senior vice president; Milan Belans, Delphi's former director of capital planning and pension analysis; Catherine Rozanski, Delphi's former director of financial accounting and reporting; and Judith Kudla, former director of finance in Delphi's information technology department.

Others charged include: Scot McDonald, who works for a Texas-based information technology company and formerly served as manager of U.S. GAAP Consulting and Reporting; B.N. Bahadur, who led a Michigan-based private management consulting company.

In addition, the complaint charged four other people with aiding and abetting Delphi's reporting and books-and-records violations: Atul Pasricha, Delphi's former assistant treasurer; Laura Marion, Delphi's former director of financial accounting and reporting; Stuart Doyle, a former client executive supporting the Texas IT company's relationship with Delphi; and Kevin Curry, a former client executive supporting the Texas IT company's relationship with Delphi.

In addition to Dawes, the SEC reached settlements with Pasricha, Bahadur, Marion, Doyle and Curry. Bahadur agreed to pay back nearly $490,000 in ill-gotten gains and interest and pay an $80,000 penalty; Pasricha agreed to a $55,000 penalty; Marion and Doyle agreed to pay penalties of $40,000 apiece and Curry agreed to pay a $25,000 penalty.

Street Sleuth Financial-Rule Overhaul Hits A Nerve (WSJ)

By Deborah Solomon And Kara Scannell

The Wall Street Journal, December 1, 2006

A blue-ribbon report calling for relaxation of some financial regulation and less-aggressive civil and criminal investigations drew a rebuke from state prosecutors, who called some of the recommendations "absurd."

At the same time, business groups and former regulators urged the Securities and Exchange Commission and Congress to move forward with several of the suggestions, saying existing rules and laws are handicapping U.S. financial markets. The report, details of which were previously reported, was released publicly yesterday.

The criticisms suggest that the attempt to trim rules adopted in the wake of recent corporate scandals such as at Enron Corp. and WorldCom Inc. will prompt a politically charged debate and slow possible action.

The Committee on Capital Markets Regulation report, assembled by a group of academics and executives, contains many recommendations that are either already under way or under discussion in Washington, including plans to relax a rule requiring that companies have strong internal controls over their financial reporting. But it also included some controversial ideas to strengthen shareholder rights, limit the liability of auditors and curtail the role of state authorities -- proposals that are unlikely to be adopted without prolonged debate.

The committee was financed with about $500,000 from the Starr Foundation, a wealthy nonprofit chaired by Maurice R. "Hank" Greenberg, former chairman of American International Group Inc. Mr. Greenberg resigned from AIG amid a state and federal investigation into improper accounting at the insurance giant. Lawyers for Mr. Greenberg have denied that he did anything wrong.

Another initial contribution of about $500,000 came from Wilbur Ross, a private investor who is also a committee member, and Kenneth Griffin, who heads Citadel Investment Group LLC, a large hedge-fund group. Mr. Ross, who has made a fortune buying distressed businesses on the cheap, restructuring them and then selling the companies off at a premium, said he decided to back the committee because he believes some regulation has gone too far and he wanted to help spark debate.

"The report has some very affirmative things about shareholder rights, which is certainly an area Ken and I are interested in, since we're often outsiders," Mr. Ross said in an interview.

Hal Scott, the committee's director and a Harvard law professor, said the money in no way influenced the report's recommendations and said no member of the committee was paid. "The amounts of money here are very modest, simply for drafting publication and so on," he said. "The committee is entirely independent of any donor."

The report is the first of several papers and roundtables expected to address rising concern by business that regulation and enforcement are driving up costs and hampering the ability to compete. Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson recently called for a re-examination of financial regulation, saying rules and laws were handicapping U.S. business, and he is assembling a conference on the topic early next year.

"Some of the specific suggestions are valuable, but the approach goes wrong in focusing so heavily on competitiveness when there is also much that needs to be done to better protect investors and assure the integrity of those who oversee and manage America's largest corporations," said former Treasury Secretary Lawrence Summers. "I hope the Bush administration will focus as intensely on helping the American manufacturing, American agriculture and American health-care industries as it is on this particular aspect of financial services."

While many of the recommendations would require regulatory adjustments, some would require legislation and some lawmakers were skeptical yesterday about the need for broad changes.

Sen. Christopher Dodd (D., Conn.), who is expected to be chairman of the Senate Banking Committee next year, didn't stake out a position on any of the recommendations but suggested he might not support sweeping change. "While we have an obligation to ensure that our legal and regulatory system helps to foster growth and promotes innovation, we must not damage the fundamental rights and protections that underpin the investor confidence critical to the success of our capital markets," he said in a written statement.

New York state's attorney general, Eliot Spitzer, who has taken the lead on several financial service investigations -- often outpacing the SEC -- lambasted the committee's recommendation to limit how and when state law-enforcement can pursue cases against financial institutions as "absurd."

Under the proposal, states could pursue actions if the SEC chose not to, but would be required to notify the SEC of its actions and permit the SEC to have a final say on any settlements that include a structural remedy of national importance. The committee also suggests the Justice Department have the ability to sign off on all state indictments of auditing or financial firms with national clienteles.

"To eviscerate the power of the one set of regulators who did anything is absurd," said Mr. Spitzer, who will become New York's governor in January.

Report On Corporate Rules Is Assailed (WP)

By Carrie Johnson

The Washington Post, December 1, 2006

Investor groups sounded alarms yesterday after it emerged that a foundation with ties to a pair of well-heeled business donors and an executive battling civil charges had funded a controversial new report seeking to slash corporate regulation.

The Committee on Capital Markets Regulation, which argues that U.S. markets are suffering under overzealous enforcement and unwieldy rules, said it received $500,000 in financial support from the C.V. Starr Foundation. The charity has longstanding ties to Maurice R. "Hank" Greenberg, the former American International Group chief who was ousted from his post last year and is contesting civil charges filed by the New York attorney general.

Two committee members, Wilbur L. Ross Jr., a private investor, and Citadel Investment Group manager Kenneth C. Griffin, contributed "a few hundred thousand dollars" more, Ross said in an interview. The panel was formed this year with support from Treasury Secretary Henry M. Paulson Jr., a former chairman of the Wall Street firm Goldman Sachs.

The lengthy report released yesterday recommended that businesses and boards of directors get increased protection from private lawsuits. Panel members also urged Congress to curtail the power of state officials to charge financial and audit firms with crimes. Businesses should face criminal charges only as a "last resort," the study says.

Consumer advocates seized on the issue to question the study's conclusions and the motives of the panel's members, who include top executives from some of the nation's largest accounting and investment firms as well as people with close ties to the Bush administration.

The report marks the first push in a powerful lobbying drive by business interests that had been silenced after frauds at Enron and WorldCom ignited investor outrage and prompted Congress to pass stringent corporate accountability legislation four years ago.

The group's 32 recommendations include rethinking the mission of the Securities and Exchange Commission to make it less antagonistic to business to adopt a more cooperative regulatory approach favored by British authorities. SEC commissioner Roel Campos, a Democrat, warned yesterday that rolling back a system of regulation that has protected U.S. investors for decades could have profound and costly consequences if it went too far.

"We can't be guilty of throwing the baby out with the bathwater," Campos said in an interview. "It's a dangerous thing to start talking about dismantling something that has worked so well for our country for so long and has produced great benefits in our capital markets."

Leaders at the nonprofit pension fund group Council of Institutional Investors said the proposals would "undermine the effectiveness of market watchdogs and weaken critical investor protections."

Barbara Roper, director of investor protection at the Consumer Federation of America, went even further, asserting that the capital markets group had preordained its conclusions and carefully selected statistics to make its case that more companies were listing their stocks on foreign markets because of burdensome U.S. rules.

"You could take every single step on their list, and when you were done, you would have done nothing to reverse recent trends, and in the meantime you would have made it significantly more difficult to hold corporate criminals accountable for their crimes," Roper said.

R. Glenn Hubbard, the former leader of President Bush's Council of Economic Advisers who co-chaired the capital markets panel, told reporters that "this commission was entirely independent of any donor."

Hubbard said the group has had little contact with Paulson since it was formed in September. Jennifer Zuccarelli, a spokeswoman for Paulson, said the Treasury secretary was not involved in the committee's work , but "we are always open to hearing new ideas from respected leaders."

In a speech last week, Paulson called for pruning nettlesome class-action lawsuits and rethinking duplicative regulations. He also promised to hold a separate conference early next year to address market competitiveness. That meeting would take place in a roundtable format and include industry and investor advocates. The members of the capital markets committee were tilted more toward industry rather than investor advocates.

"Where are the people who represent institutional and individual investors?" said Duke University securities law professor James D. Cox. "I see this as a very pro-executive position, well intentioned but misguided."

The group's recommendations do not uniformly give comfort to business. Executives at the U.S. Chamber of Commerce and elsewhere raised questions about the report's advocacy of increased shareholder democracy, including moves to give investors the right to vote on "poison pill" takeover defenses in certain cases and perhaps a better chance to propose candidates for corporate boards, a hotly contested area.

Three weeks after Democrats regained control of both chambers of Congress, Hubbard, the group's co-chairman, took pains to say that many of its proposals could be enacted by securities regulators and the President's Working Group on Financial Markets, made up of the leaders of the SEC, Treasury Department and Commodity Futures Trading Commission.

Sen. Christopher J. Dodd (D-Conn.), soon to be chairman of the Senate Banking Committee, said in a statement that he would read the report as a "valuable contribution." But, Dodd added, "We must not damage the fundamental rights and protections that underpin the investor confidence critical to the success of our capital markets." Dodd said the country already has "the most effective system of laws and regulations ever designed and implemented."

A spokesman for the incoming House Financial Services chairman, Barney Frank (D-Mass.), said the lawmaker had yet to read the report.

Ross said he became alarmed after leaders of foreign firms in which he invests balked at issuing stock in the United States because of costs and regulatory uncertainty. "If it does nothing else than become the lightning rod for both sides of the discussion, that'd be good," he said.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Milton Street Pleads Not Guilty (PHI)

By John Shiffman

The Philadelphia Inquirer, December 1, 2006

Mayor Street's unpredictable brother somberly entered the U.S. Courthouse yesterday and pleaded not guilty to tax and corruption charges.

T. Milton Street Sr., who defended himself in extensive and emphatic media interviews after Tuesday's indictment, took a different approach yesterday. He declined to answer reporters' questions, as did his attorney, Jeanne K. Damirgian.

Prosecutors allege that Street, a former state lawmaker and hot-dog vendor, used his family name to win a $30,000-a-month contract with a firm that held a maintenance contract at Philadelphia International Airport. Street performed little or no work as a consultant on the deal, prosecutors said.

If convicted, Street faces about three years in prison, according to the advisory federal sentencing guidelines.

During the brief arraignment, U.S. Magistrate Judge Louis Felipe Restrepo set routine bail conditions for Street, 67, of Moorestown.

While awaiting trial, Street may not travel beyond eastern Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Delaware and Maryland. Restrepo told Street that he would not have to post bail, but that if he fled, he would have to forfeit $25,000.

Afterward, Street was fingerprinted and photographed by FBI agents and U.S. marshals.

A grand jury indictment alleges that Philadelphia Airport Services hired Street in 2002 as a consultant for $30,000 a month, hoping that his link as Mayor Street's brother would help PAS hold onto the lucrative airport contract.

Two PAS employees - Matthias A. Schwabe and John H. Velardi Sr. - are also charged in the case.

Schwabe intends to plead guilty, according to his lawyer, Harvey A. Sernovitz. Velardi pleaded not guilty yesterday.

Milton Street also faces tax charges. He is accused of underpaying his 2000 taxes by more than $55,000 and his 2001 taxes by more than $120,000. In 2002 and 2003, the grand jury alleged, Milton Street grossed $500,000 and $1.5 million, respectively, but did not file tax returns for those years.

The prosecutors in the case, Anthony Wzorek and Jennifer Arbittier Williams, declined to comment after yesterday's hearings. Their boss, U.S. Attorney Patrick Meehan, said Tuesday that Mayor Street is not suspected of any wrongdoing in the case.

No Joking Now: Street Pleads Not Guilty (PHI)

By Michael Hinkelman

The Philadelphia Inquirer, December 1, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0100279

T. Milton Street Sr., the mayor's older brother, wasn't yukking it up with the news media yesterday as he did the day before when he spoke with reporters outside his Moorestown, N.J., home.

In fact, about the only thing Street uttered within earshot of reporters yesterday were the words "not guilty" in response to a question about how he wanted to plead to fraud and tax charges before U.S. Magistrate Judge L. Felipe Restrepo.

Street, 67, nattily dressed in a double-breasted, dark blue suit, white shirt and patterned tie, was released after a brief hearing and ordered not to travel outside of eastern Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Delaware and Maryland while awaiting trial.

He also was ordered to surrender his passport and to have no contact with other defendants or potential witnesses.

Street didn't have to post any bail but Restrepo said that if he fled he would have to forfeit $25,000.

No trial date was set. Street could face up to three years behind bars if convicted on all charges.

Street's court-appointed attorney, Jeanne K. Damirgian, declined to comment after the hearing.

Street was indicted by a federal grand jury on Nov. 28 on charges he defrauded a prospective airport subcontractor and failed to pay income taxes on more than $2 million of consulting and nonvending income.

Mayor Street was not charged with any wrongdoing in connection with his brother's alleged crimes.

The feds allege Milton Street traded off his name to get a $30,000-a-month consulting contract in 2002 with Philadelphia Airport Services and later parlayed that into a maintenance facilities subcontract even though he had no experience in the field.

Two former PAS employees - Matthias A. Schwabe and John H. Velardi Sr. - also were charged in the case.

Schwabe's lawyer, Harvey A. Sernovitz, said Schwabe intends to plead guilty to fraud and tax charges and cooperate with prosecutors if asked.

Velardi pleaded not guilty to fraud charges yesterday. He also was released under conditions similar to Street's.

Velardi, a former airport facilities director for PAS, and Street are charged in connection with a scheme to defraud a prospective airport subcontractor in the fall of 2003.

The feds say Street pocketed $80,000 in connection with the alleged fraud of V-Tech.

Velardi's attorney, Guy R. Sciolla, said he was skeptical of the feds' case against Velardi.

"The government is going to have to prove [Velardi] was involved in a fraud on the operatives of V-Tech at the behest of Street," Sciolla said. "I'm very interested to see how they're going to do that."

Phila. Mayor's Brother Pleads Not Guilty To Corruption Charges (AP)

By Kathy Matheson, The Associated Press

AP, December 1, 2006

PHILADELPHIA (AP) — A brother of Mayor John F. Street pleaded not guilty Thursday to accusations that he used his last name to get consulting work with companies that wanted lucrative city contracts and that he failed to pay taxes on $2 million in income.

T. Milton Street Sr., 67, appeared very briefly in federal court in Philadelphia to enter the plea. He was released on his own recognizance.

Prosecutors said that soon after his brother took office in 2000, Street began hiring himself out as a high-priced consultant to companies that wanted to do business with the city. One firm paid Street, who is a longtime hot dog vendor, a $30,000-a.m.onth consulting fee and required him to do no work, authorities said.

He and two other businessmen face charges of mail and wire fraud, filing false tax returns and related counts.

One of those businessmen, Matthias A. Schwabe, 38, of Malvern, plans to plead guilty to mail fraud and filing a false tax return, and intends to testify against Street, his lawyer told The Philadelphia Inquirer for a story Thursday.

"If the government wants him to be a witness, he will," said the lawyer, Harvey A. Sernovitz.

Sernovitz did not return messages left Thursday by The Associated Press. A spokesman for federal prosecutors, Richard Manieri, declined to say whether Schwabe would plead guilty.

Schwabe had worked as facilities maintenance manager for Philadelphia Airport Services, one of the companies that hired Street as a consultant.

The other man who was indicted, John H. Velardi Sr., 53, of Drexel Hill, was the company's airport facilities director.

In a separate arraignment Thursday, Velardi pleaded not guilty to mail and wire fraud counts. He was also released on his own recognizance.

Neither of the attorneys representing Street and Velardi would comment on Schwabe's planned plea.

The charges against Street also include an accusation that he defrauded a prospective airport contractor. The company gave Street $80,000 and he promised that he could get them a $3.2 million contract, but the contract didn't exist, prosecutors said.

U.S. Authorities Probe How Smartmatic Won Venezuela Election Pact (WSJ)

By BOB DAVIS And GLENN SIMPSON

Wall Street Journal, December 1, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Federal investigators are looking into whether Smartmatic Corp., a voting-machine company whose equipment is used widely in the U.S. and abroad, paid bribes to win a Venezuela election contract in 2004.

Smartmatic's actions already are under a separate investigation by the Committee on Foreign Investment in the U.S., which reviews foreign acquisitions to see if they pose national-security concerns. In 2005, Smartmatic, which is owned by Venezuelan investors who split their time between Caracas and Boca Raton, Fla., purchased a U.S. voting-machine company, Sequoia Voting Systems Inc. Cfius is looking at whether that acquisition should be reversed on national-security grounds.

At the same time, the Justice Department has been conducting a probe of Smartmatic for possible violations of the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act and recently started looking at possible tax evasion as well, said two individuals familiar with the case. The Justice Department has informed Cfius representatives from U.S. agencies about their inquiry, these people said.

Jeffrey Bialos, an attorney for Smartmatic, said yesterday the Justice Department told the company it was looking into its actions, but that Smartmatic wasn't a target of an investigation. Smartmatic employees haven't been subpoenaed in the inquiry, Mr. Bialos added. That suggests that the probe is at an early stage.

"The company believes it conducted itself properly and within the law," Mr. Bialos said. A Justice Department spokeswoman declined to comment.

Smartmatic has drawn attention because of concerns that the government of Venezuelan President Hugo Chávez, an opponent of U.S. policies, has a stake in the company. That is a focus of the Cfius review. In 2004, Smartmatic's machines were used in an election to recall President Chávez, which Mr. Chávez won handily -- and which members of the Venezuelan opposition say was riddled with fraud. Smartmatic machines will be used Sunday in Venezuela's presidential election.

The company said it is the victim of false allegations made by two former executives, whom the company declined to name. Smartmatic said it would shortly send the two former employees a letter to "cease and desist their activities," which Smartmatic said violated agreements they made with the company. News of the Justice Department probe was reported earlier by el Nuevo Herald, a Spanish-language newspaper in Miami.

Essentially, the Justice Department is looking into whether Smartmatic got its start in Venezuela by bribing officials and then improperly avoiding its tax liability in the U.S. The company says it paid $1.5 million to a Venezuelan consultant who is close to the Chávez government and helped to win Smartmatic business.

The allegation being investigated is that Smartmatic actually paid as much as $4 million to the consultant, then deleted a substantial portion of those payments from its corporate records to hide the extent of its payments to a friend of the Chávez regime. Antonio Mugica, Smartmatic's chief executive, said the company had budgeted a larger amount for the consultant than it ended up paying him, thus explaining the difference between the two amounts.

The tax question dates to late 2004 when Smartmatic scrapped a simple corporate structure, under which it was based in the U.S. with a Venezuelan subsidiary. It adopted a complex offshore structure, with headquarters in the Netherlands Antilles; a main subsidiary in the Netherlands; and a variety of subsidiaries in the U.S., Barbados, Venezuela and Mexico.

That raised the question of where to pay taxes on $25 million in revenue from a contract to supply voting machines for Venezuelan regional elections: the U.S. or a lower-tax jurisdiction. Smartmatic paid taxes in Barbados, which the company said was proper because one of its international companies signed the deal. "The taxes due and owed are to Barbados authorities," said Mr. Mugica, who added that the company had consulted legal counsel and accounting firms on the issue.

Mr. Mugica said the company hasn't thus far been harmed by publicity about the probes. Customers "welcome the fact" that the company is trying to clear up allegations concerning its actions, he said.

U.S. Prison Population Sets Record (WP/AP)

The Washington Post, December 1, 2006

A record 7 million people -- one in every 32 U.S. adults -- were behind bars, on probation or on parole by the end of last year, a Justice Department report released yesterday shows.

Of those, 2.2 million were in prison or jail, an increase of 2.7 percent over the previous year, according to the report.

More than 4.1 million people were on probation and 784,208 were on parole at the end of 2005. Prison releases are increasing, but admissions are increasing more.

Men still far outnumber women in prisons and jails, but the female population is growing faster. Over the past year, the female population in state or federal prison increased 2.6 percent and the number of male inmates rose 1.9 percent. By year's end, 7 percent of inmates were women. The gender figures do not include inmates in local jails.

"Misguided policies that create harsher sentences for nonviolent drug offenses are disproportionately responsible for the increasing rates of women in prisons and jails," Marc Mauer, executive director of the Sentencing Project, a Washington-based group that supports criminal justice reform, said in a statement.

From 1995 to 2003, inmates incarcerated in federal prisons for drug offenses have accounted for 49 percent of total prison population growth.

The statistics are from the annual report by the Justice Department's Bureau of Justice Statistics. The report breaks down inmate populations for state and federal prisons and for local jails.

The study found that racial disparities among prisoners persist. In the 25-29 age group, 8.1 percent of black men -- about one in 13 -- are incarcerated, compared with 2.6 percent of Hispanic men and 1.1 percent of white men. The figures are not much different among women. By the end of 2005, black women were more than twice as likely as Hispanics and more than three times as likely as white women to be in prison.

There were significant changes in some states' prison populations. In South Dakota, the number of inmates increased 11 percent over the past year, more than in any other state. Montana and Kentucky were next, with increases of 10.4 and 7.9 percent, respectively. Georgia had the biggest decrease, losing 4.6 percent of its prison population, followed by Maryland (2.4 percent decrease) and Louisiana (2.3 percent).

Analysis: High Bar Set In AIPAC Case (UPI)

By Shaun Waterman, Upi Homeland And National Security Editor

United Press International, December 1, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 30 (UPI) -- The government has been set a high bar for conviction in the AIPAC secrets case -- prosecutors must show the two lobbyists charged under espionage laws knew that the disclosure of the material they allegedly passed to reporters and Israeli officials would hurt the United States.

The defendants, Steven Rosen and Keith Weissman, lobbyists for the American-Israel Public Affairs Committee, or AIPAC, are charged with conspiring with Department of Defense intelligence analyst Larry Franklin to leak U.S. secrets in an apparent effort to influence U.S. policy towards Iran.

In a transcript of a recent pre-trial hearing, made available Tuesday, the judge in the case made it clear that prosecutors must prove intention, or what lawyers call "mens rea" -- Latin for "a guilty mind" -- for every element of the conspiracy.

"The Court imposed the requirement that the government prove that the defendant knew the information ... would harm the United States," Judge Thomas Ellis told the Nov. 16 hearing, though prosecutors had asked that this requirement be lifted.

That is important, explains government transparency advocate Steven Aftergood of the Federation of American Scientists, because it means the defendants, if found guilty, will have been proved to have "the intention of hurting the United States."

DOJ_NMG_0100282

"That distinguishes the activities with which they are charged from the routine activities of reporters and advocates," Aftergood told United Press International, "who may made trade in classified information," but don't so with the intention of harming U.S. security.

He called the bar set by the ruling "a considerable, possibly insurmountable obstacle" to the government.

In a statement announcing the indictment, prosecutors alleged that since at least April 1999, Rosen and Weissman had "use[d] their contacts within the U.S. government ... to gather sensitive U.S. government information, including classified information ... for subsequent unlawful communication, delivery, and transmission to persons not entitled to receive it."

The case has raised the hackles of civil liberties advocates who charge that zealous prosecutors are abusing an over-broad statute designed to punish spies to criminalize the everyday behavior of reporters, lobbyists, and researchers, all of whom occasionally trade in secrets, the stock-in-trade of Washington's back-room policy process.

Jonathan Turley, professor of law at George Washington University, told UPI that the prosecution had "radically expanded the practical scope of national security law." He said it had always been understood that government employees who leaked were in criminal jeopardy, but not the reporters -- or in this case lobbyists -- to whom they were leaking.

He said the case was an effort to "criminalize the act of simply receiving classified information."

Judge Ellis fueled those fears when told a hearing earlier this year that the law on its face applies to everyone: "academics, lawyers, journalists, professors, whatever."

The Department of Justice routinely declines comment on ongoing cases, but prosecutors have said in court filings that they "recognize that a prosecution under the espionage laws of an actual member of the press ... would raise legitimate and serious issues and would not be undertaken lightly.

Indeed," they conclude, "the fact that there has never been such a prosecution speaks for itself."

Rosen and Weissman's supporters say there is no difference between what they are charged with doing and what reporters and other members of what their lawyers call "the Washington policy community," do every day.

But the reality is more complex, according to former counter-intelligence officials who have followed the case.

They make a distinction between reporters -- who seek information about U.S. policy in order to publish it to illuminate public debate -- and the defendants, who are accused of using the information they obtained in a covert effort to influence U.S. foreign policy, including by passing it on to foreign government officials.

"This was a counter-espionage investigation," said one retired veteran, pointing out that it had been conducted by the counter-intelligence unit at the FBI's Washington Field Office.

"They were looking for spies. Those guys don't do leaks," he told UPI earlier this year.

The case was originally expected to come to trial this year, but due to its complexity, the date has been repeatedly deferred, according to Aftergood.

Judge Ellis now says he will reserve time in May and June 2007 for a possible trial.

He also said that a Justice Department investigation into who leaked word of the investigation to CBS News in August 2004 -- a full year before indictments were filed -- is "ongoing."

But defense lawyers said they had been told by "senior officials at CBS News" that no one there had been contacted about the investigation.

Nonetheless, the existence of that probe, and others confirmed by officials, including into the leaks about the existence of the National Security Agency's program of warrantless wiretaps aimed at suspected terrorists, raises concerns.

Critics like Turley accuse the administration of launching a "scorched earth campaign against whistleblowers."

He said the AIPAC case, the leak probes, and another investigation in which federal prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald had sought to review the phone records of New York Times reporters, were all "part of a mosaic that threatens vital First Amendment institutions, like the press."

Federal Case May Redefine Child Porn (CNET)

By Declan McCullagh, Staff Writer, CNET News.com

CNET News, December 1, 2006

Justice Department indicts a photographer over a site that posted photos of clothed minors--a case that has raised First Amendment issues.

Jeff Pierson is a photographer whose action shots of hopped-up American autos laying waste to the asphalt at Alabama dragways have appeared in racing magazines and commercial advertisements.

Pierson's Web site boasted he has the "most wonderful wife in the world and two fantastic daughters." And until recently, he ran a business called Beautiful Super Models that charged $175 for portraits of aspiring models under 18.

In a federal indictment announced this week, the U.S. Department of Justice accused Pierson, 43, of being a child pornographer--even though even prosecutors acknowledge there's no evidence he has ever taken a single photograph of an unclothed minor.

Rather, they argue, his models struck poses that were illegally provocative. "The images charged are not legitimate child modeling, but rather lascivious poses one would expect to see in an adult magazine," Alice Martin, U.S. attorney for the northern district of Alabama, said in a statement.

Pierson's child pornography indictment arises out of an FBI and U.S. Postal Inspection Service investigation of so-called child modeling sites, which have been the subject of a series of critical congressional hearings and news reports in the last few years. An August article in The New York Times, for instance, called the modeling Web sites "the latest trend in child exploitation."

In addition to Pierson, the U.S. attorney also announced indictments against Marc Greenberg, 42, Jeffrey Libman, 39, partners in a Fort Lauderdale, Fla., business called Webe Web, which in turn ran the now-defunct ChildSuperModels.com site. It was one of the larger sites that featured photographs of child models, allegedly from Pierson, and became the target of a report on Florida's NBC6 affiliate suggesting that it was a magnet for pedophiles.

First Amendment scholars interviewed Wednesday raised questions about the Justice Department's attack on Internet child modeling. They warned that any legal precedent might endanger the mainstream use of child models in advertising and suggested that prosecutors' budgets might be better spent investigating actual cases of child molestation.

"I don't know what the DOJ's trying," said Lee Tien, an attorney at the Electronic Frontier Foundation, a civil liberties group. "The best I can say is that it's puzzling that they would devote investigative and law enforcement resources to something (like this). This is a far cry from what folks normally think of as child pornography."

The Web sites that prompted the indictments are now offline. But copies saved in Google's cache and through Archive.org show the photographs in question depicted girls wearing everything from sweaters to, more frequently, swimsuits and midriff-baring attire. Parents appear to have given their consent.

Richard Jaffe, Pierson's attorney, said he could not immediately comment because he was in court on Wednesday. Jill Ellis, a spokeswoman for the U.S. Attorney's Office in the northern district of Alabama, confirmed to CNET News.com that no nudity was involved. An arraignment for Pierson has been scheduled for December 14 before U.S. Magistrate Judge Robert Armstrong.

No sex, no nudity

Because no sex or nudity is involved, the prosecutions raise unusual First Amendment concerns that stretch beyond mere modeling-related Web sites: children and teens in various degrees of undress appear in everything from newspaper underwear advertisements to the covers of Seventeen and Vogue.

When actress and model Brooke Shields was 15 years old, for instance, she appeared in a racy Calvin Klein jean advertisement featuring the memorable line, "Nothing comes between me and my Calvins." Shields also appeared nude at 12 years old in an Oscar-nominated movie called Pretty Baby that was set in a New Orleans brothel. Similarly, 14-year-old Jodie Foster, wearing revealing clothing, played a pre-teen prostitute in Martin Scorsese's Taxi Driver.

Sally Mann, named Time magazine's "photographer of the year" in 2001, was attacked by critics for featuring nude images of her own children in a book called Immediate Family. Famed photographer Jock Sturges' photos often feature nude boys and girls on the beaches of California and France--images that are far more revealing than those of swimsuit-clad youths.

DOJ_NMG_0100284

All of that makes the distinction between legal child photography and illegal child pornography a particularly subjective one. It may come down to, as the Justice Department's Alice Martin put it, seemingly ephemeral factors such as the poses the model strikes and the camera angles the photographer chooses.

"Prosecuting cases on this borderline presents difficult First Amendment problems," said Amy Adler, a New York University law professor who has written about pornography, culture and the law. "The sexy teenager is sort of a mainstream trope. It's very different from babies being molested, and child pornography law doesn't make a distinction."

That's no exaggeration: The same section of federal law punishes a pedophile who makes a video recording of a baby being molested, as well as someone who possesses an image of a 17-year-old striking an unlawfully racy pose.

The explanation for that lies in a criminal statute called 18 USC 2252A, which Pierson is accused of violating. Child pornography is defined as the "lascivious exhibition of the genitals or pubic area of any person" under 18 years old.

Until a 1994 case called U.S. v. Knox, judges interpreted that language to mean either images of nude minors or of minors having sex. In that case, however, the 3rd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals extended that definition to include videotapes of girls in leotards, and upheld Stephen Knox's conviction on child pornography charges.

"The genitals and pubic area of the young girls...were certainly 'on display' as the camera focused for prolonged time intervals on close-up views of these body parts through their thin but opaque clothing. Additionally, the obvious purpose and inevitable effect of the videotape was to 'attract notice' specifically to the genitalia and pubic area. Applying the plain meaning of the term 'lascivious exhibition' leads to the conclusion that nudity or discernibility are not prerequisites for the occurrence of an exhibition within the meaning of the federal child pornography statute," the 3rd Circuit wrote.

Courts have also looked to a 1986 case called U.S. v. Dost for guidance on what's "lascivious" and what's not. Among the factors they evaluate: whether the focus is on the child's genitalia or pubic area; whether the image suggests sexual coyness; and whether the visual depiction is intended or designed to elicit a sexual response in the viewer.

A crackdown's mixed results

Prosecutors have tried to target child modeling Web sites before, with mixed results.

In 2002, Colorado prosecutors charged James Grady with more than 719 felony charges--ranging from sexual exploitation of children to contributing to the delinquency of minors--for operating TrueTeenBabes.com. The Web site bills itself as "America's premier teen glamour publication" and sells subscriptions for access to nonnude shots of models between 13 and 17 years old.

TrueTeenBabes.com drew the attention of local television reporters, whose reporting sparked a police investigation. But a jury acquitted Grady, and he subsequently filed a lawsuit asking for $10 million in damages for wrongful arrest, according to the Rocky Mountain News. TrueTeenBabes.com is back online today.

In an unrelated prosecution of two Utah men, Matthew Duhamel and Charles Granere currently are facing federal criminal charges of child pornography. They're accused (click for PDF) of running a child modeling site--again, no nudity is alleged--that featured minors in lingerie.

They filed a joint motion in July, which was rejected, asking that the case be dismissed in part on First Amendment grounds. "It seems clear," the motion said, "that the genitals or pubic area of the person must be actually exposed or visible to fall within the proscription against exhibition."

The U.S. Congress tried to clear up some of the ambiguity around what is and what isn't legal but never actually enacted legislation.

In 2002, Rep. Mark Foley announced a bill called the Child Modeling Exploitation Prevention Act that would effectively ban the sale of photographs of minors. But under opposition from civil libertarians and commercial stock photo houses like Corbis, it never left committee. (Foley, of course, is the same politician who resigned in September after disclosures of inappropriate conversations with a teenage page.)

That leaves judges and juries faced with the difficult task of making distinctions between lawful and unlawful camera angles and facial expressions--an exercise that proves to be impossible to do without running afoul of the First Amendment.

DOJ_NMG_0100285

"How do we distinguish pictures like these (on child modeling sites) from the everyday photos that our culture tolerates and even prizes?" said Adler, the NYU law professor. "For instance, who's modeling in Vogue? A lot of those people are 15 and in scantily clad or suggestive photos."

Judge Sentences US Attorney Who Challenged Common Police Internet Sex Sting (FINDLAW/AP)

AP, December 1, 2006

(AP) - KANSAS CITY, Missouri-A lawyer convicted in an Internet sex sting was sentenced to five years in prison, capping a legal battle that challenged a common tool police use to catch sexual predators online.

Moments after a federal jury convicted Jan P. Helder Jr. in August 2005, the judge set aside the verdict and ordered him acquitted.

U.S. District Judge Dean Whipple said Helder could not be guilty because the person he communicated with online was actually an undercover detective in Platte County, Missouri, not a 14-year-old girl as he had believed.

Defense attorneys in similar cases around the country had raised the same argument as such stings became a common tool for trapping Internet sexual predators. Whipple's ruling was believed to be the first in which the argument succeeded.

The 8th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in St. Louis on Wednesday reinstated the jury's verdict against Helder and sent the case back to Whipple for sentencing. The appeals court said the critical issue was that Helder thought he was seducing a minor, not whether the minor truly existed.

Helder, 43, will not be eligible for parole.

Immigration Official Pleads Guilty To Falsifying Documents (WP)

By Jerry Markon

The Washington Post, December 1, 2006

A Department of Homeland Security supervisor pleaded guilty yesterday to pocketing more than $600,000 in bribes in exchange for falsifying immigration documents to help Asian immigrants obtain U.S. citizenship.

Prosecutors said Robert T. Schofield issued fake documentation for hundreds of immigrants during an eight-year scheme he ran out of his Fairfax County office. Schofield, 57, was a supervisor for U.S. Citizenship and Immigration Services, which processes immigration applications, until he resigned in the past two weeks .

Court documents said Schofield employed a network of brokers who brought him immigrants needing citizenship, a green card or entry into the United States. Earning up to $10,000 per immigrant, he used some of the money to buy his $387,000 Fairfax home and to pay down the mortgage, the documents said. When Schofield was arrested in June, federal agents found $3,900 cash in his jacket pocket in his office.

When he was arrested, Schofield supervised a staff of nine at the agency's Washington District Office. He had been the acting assistant director for examinations from 1998 to 2004, supervising 50 employees.

Schofield was not asked by the judge to explain his actions yesterday in U.S. District Court in Alexandria when he pleaded guilty to bribery and unlawful procurement of citizenship or naturalization. His lawyers declined to comment. He faces up to 25 years in prison when he is sentenced Feb. 23.

"The breadth and scope of Mr. Schofield's fraud and corruption are truly stunning," said U.S. Attorney Chuck Rosenberg. He said Schofield had "undermined our efforts to secure our borders."

Court documents indicate that accusations against the 30-year federal employee were not new. Over the past decade, federal officials investigated numerous bribery allegations involving Schofield and Asian immigration applicants when he worked at the former Immigration and Naturalization Service, according to court documents unsealed when Schofield was charged in June.

Schofield was demoted at one point for "conduct unbecoming a government employee," the documents say, and had an "inappropriate relationship" with a woman connected to an INS criminal probe. When confronted about that relationship by INS officials, Schofield fled to East Asia, where he made $36,000 worth of unauthorized purchases on his government-issued credit card, according to court documents.

It remains unclear when Schofield returned to the United States, how the previous investigations ended and how Schofield became a supervisor when the Department of Homeland Security took over INS's functions in 2003.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Ronald L. Walutes said that the evidence against Schofield in the current case was overwhelming and that the government "very strongly opposes" an effort by defense lawyers to get him released on bond before his sentencing. Court documents said the government has identified 184 illegal immigrants who falsely received U.S. citizenship from Schofield, but Walutes said the government believes the actual number is in the hundreds. "We have to go out and arrest these people," Walutes said. "It's a huge endeavor."

Defense lawyer Alan Yamamoto said that Schofield plans to help his old office examine files he handled to show how many false documents were issued and that it would be easier if he was free.

U.S. District Judge James C. Cacheris disagreed and ordered Schofield back to jail after the hearing.

Ex-official Admits Immigration Fraud (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, December 1, 2006

A former U.S. Citizenship and Immigration Services (USCIS) official pleaded guilty yesterday in federal court in Virginia to charges of accepting more than $600,000 in bribes from the brokers and immigrants in a scheme to award citizenship and naturalization documents.

Robert T. Schofield, a supervisory district adjudications officer at the Washington district office at USCIS, entered the plea before U.S. District Judge James C. Cacheris.

U.S. Attorney Chuck Rosenberg in Virginia said Schofield's co-conspirator, Qiming Ye of Washington, previously pleaded guilty to immigration fraud and is scheduled for sentencing on Dec. 21. The charges to which Schofield pleaded carry a maximum of 25 years in prison.

According to court documents, Schofield was responsible for providing supervisory oversight of USCIS adjudicators and for researching the eligibility of people seeking immigration benefits, employment and legal status under the Immigration and Nationality Act.

Mr. Rosenberg said an immigration officer at USCIS provided Homeland Security's Office of Inspector General with a list of aliens who received from Schofield naturalization certificates to which they were not entitled. He said the officer reported numerous aliens appearing at naturalization ceremonies asking for or carrying paperwork with Schofield's name.

The records show that Schofield used brokers to bring aliens to him who were willing to pay for U.S. immigration documents, each of whom had other brokers who located aliens interested in paying $30,000 or more for immigration documents they could not obtain legally.

Mr. Rosenberg said one broker was Ye, who, as part of his written plea agreement, will surrender his U.S. citizenship, which he received from Schofield. Mr. Rosenberg said the brokers together received from the aliens more than $2.5 million, from which they paid Schofield for the immigration documents he supplied.

The prosecutor said the government identified 184 aliens who received U.S. citizenship papers from Schofield over the past 10 years without the legitimate right to them. As part of a plea agreement, Schofield agreed to forfeit his residence in Fairfax County, his bank accounts and his government Thrift Savings Plan investments.

"The breadth and scope of Mr. Schofield's fraud and corruption are truly stunning," Mr. Rosenberg said. "Mr. Schofield undermined our efforts to secure our borders and undermined the good work of the many men and women engaged in that critical endeavor."

Immigration Fraud Case Nets Guilty Plea (AP)

By Matthew Barakat

The AP, December 1, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0100287

ALEXANDRIA, Va. - A former supervisor at the Department of Homeland Security pleaded guilty Thursday to accepting at least $600,000 in bribes to provide fraudulent citizenship documents to hundreds of Asian immigrants.

Robert T. Schofield, 57, who once supervised as many as 50 employees in the Citizenship and Immigration Services office in Fairfax, Va., pleaded guilty in U.S. District Court to bribery and to aiding and abetting the illegal procurement of citizenship.

He faces as many as 25 years in prison when he is sentenced in February. Prosecutors said they will seek the maximum sentence.

"We have to go out and arrest these people" who fraudulently obtained immigration and citizenship documents, said Assistant U.S. Attorney Ron Walutes. "It's a huge disruption."

Court records indicate that the government identified hundreds of people who in the past 10 years paid for and fraudulently received from Schofield authentic documents, including naturalization papers and temporary green cards establishing legal residence.

They paid money to immigration brokers, who cut Schofield in for a share of the profits. Court records indicate people paid as much as $30,000 apiece to the brokers for immigration documents. Brokers received at least $3.1 million cumulatively, of which Schofield received at least $600,000.

"The breadth and scope of Mr. Schofield's fraud and corruption are truly stunning," U.S. Attorney Chuck Rosenberg said in a statement.

A broker who paid Schofield, Qiming Ye of Washington, D.C., has pleaded guilty to visa fraud and awaits sentencing.

Another Ford Faces Corruption Charges (HC/AP)

By Woody Baird Associated Press Writer, The Associated Press

Houston Chronicle, December 1, 2006

MEMPHIS, Tenn. — Two city councilmen, including the uncle of U.S. Rep. Harold Ford Jr., were charged Thursday with taking thousands of dollars of bribes in exchange for their votes to allow new billboards in the city.

Memphis council members Edmund Ford and Rickey Peete face federal charges that they took nearly $7,000 and $12,000, respectively, from an informant.

Edmund Ford comes from a prominent political family in Memphis: His brother is former U.S. Rep. Harold Ford Sr., the first black congressman in Tennessee, and his nephew is Ford Jr., the unsuccessful Democratic nominee for U.S. Senate in November.

The informant paid the council members between Aug. 30 and Oct. 27 in exchange for their votes on a real estate proposal and the repeal of a moratorium on putting up billboards in the city, the FBI said. The informant, whose identity wasn't released, made audio and video recordings of cash payments to the men, the charges said.

The informant began working with federal agents after he was indicted on criminal charges in an unrelated investigation, the charges against the councilmen said.

Peete and Ford each made initial court appearances Thursday and were released on their own recognizance. Neither Peete nor Ford returned phone calls seeking comment.

The charges carry a maximum punishment of 20 years in prison and $250,000 in fines.

Peete was convicted on a separate federal bribery charge in 1989 while on the Memphis City Council and was sentenced to 2 1/2 years in prison.

After serving his time, Peete's voting rights were restored and he was re-elected to the City Council.

The charges are unrelated to the 2005 public corruption sting that ensnared five former and current Tennessee lawmakers, including Edmund Ford's brother, state Sen. John Ford.

Councilmen Ford, Peete Arrested; Businessman Cooper Also Charged (MCA)

By Michael Erskine And Lawrence Buser

Memphis Commercial Appeal, December 1, 2006

Memphis City Council members Edmund Ford and Rickey Peete were arrested today on federal bribery charges in connection with a public corruption investigation dubbed "Main Street Sweeper."

The pair allegedly received cash payments — a total of $12,000 for Peete and $6,900 for Ford — for their support of a real estate development, including a billboard, along I-240 and for securing votes of other council members. Ford also helped in the ultimate repeal of a moratorium on billboards.

In addition, perennial political candidate and businessman Joe Cooper was charged with money laundering in a separate investigation called "Clean Sweep."

Peete had an initial court appearance today and was released on his own recognizance. Ford is expected to have his tonight. Cooper will make a court appearance Friday.

According to the affidavit concerning Peete, an informant who represented clients before the City Council had an ongoing relationship with Peete in which he made cash payments for Peete's influence.

The unnamed informant, who was facing federal criminal charges, agreed to cooperate with FBI and DEA agents.

The informant allegedly paid Peete a total of $12,000 over three occasions in his Beale Street office in September and October of this year. Peete serves as executive director of the Beale Street Merchants Association.

According to the affidavit, Peete repeatedly expressed concerns about law enforcement investigations, once asking if he had to worry about "those folks ... alphabet boys." On a sheet of paper, Peete wrote down "FBI."

The informant allegedly also paid Ford a total of $6,900 on three occasions at Ford's business, E.H. Ford Mortuary.

At one point, the indictment said Ford put the money from the informant in his pocket and said, "I'll drum up seven (votes) or make somebody walk out."

Cooper's money laundering charges are based on his receipt of $3,500 in cash and a money order as partial payment toward the purchases of automobiles by drug dealers. The indictment said the charges arose from a long-running narcotics investigation that has already resulted in indictments charging 26 defendants.

The indictments were announced in a news conference Downtown at 4 p.m. by U.S. Atty. David Kustoff; My Harrison, Special Agent in Charge of the Federal Bureau of Investigation; Andy Dimond, Resident Agent in Charge of the Drug Enforcement Administration; and Shelby County Sheriff Mark Luttrell.

Officials said "Main Street Sweeper" remains an active investigation.

Harrison had a warning for public officials on the take: "Tap, tap, tap. You never know where we're going to be."

Peete is serving is second stint on the council. In 1989, he resigned less than halfway through his first term after being convicted of extorting $1,000 from a developer in exchange for a favorable vote on a land-use case.

He served about two years of a 30-month sentence.

Cooper served on the Shelby County Quarterly Court, the predecessor to the County Commission, from 1972 to 1977.

Cooper resigned after being convicted of conspiracy to misapply bank funds. He served four months in prison.

Evidence Points To Cooper As FBI's Informant (MCA)

By Marc Perrusquia And Trevor Aaronson

Memphis Commercial Appeal, December 1, 2006

December 1, 2006 Politician-turned-car salesman Joe Cooper has been many things over the years -- County Squire, convict, lobbyist -- and now FBI informant.

Federal prosecutors declined to name the confidential informant who wore a wire to help bring corruption charges Thursday against City Councilmen Rickey Peete and Edmund Ford.

Advertisement

Yet sources close to the probe say it was Cooper, who also was charged Thursday, and prosecutors' documents all but out him.

Pieced together, a pair of FBI affidavits solve the puzzle.

One says an unnamed informant -- facing a criminal charge in a drug case -- began cooperating this summer, telling of favors he'd done for the councilmen, "including assisting in Ford's acquisition of a Cadillac with financing in the name of third person."

The second affidavit also describes the Cadillac acquisition, but this time provides a name for the person arranging the deal -- Cooper, who until January worked as a salesman at Bud Davis Cadillac.

According to the affidavit of FBI agent Daniel A. Netemeyer, Cooper told the FBI he sold Cadillacs to Ford and former County Commissioner Michael Hooks Sr. "and that because these purchasers had bad credit he found a co-signer for the financing of each purchase."

Those purchases, first reported in The Commercial Appeal last year, involved leases co-signed by controversial developer Rusty Hyneman.

Cooper, 61, could not be reached Thursday. U.S. Attorney's spokesman Leigh Anne Jordan said she couldn't comment on the identity of a confidential informant.

For Cooper, an ex-convict, charges of laundering money for drug dealers could land him back in prison unless his role as an informant buys leniency.

Cooper, the former right-hand man for the late millionaire businessman William B. Tanner, has been a fixture in Shelby County politics since serving on the Shelby County Quarterly Court -- a predecessor to the County Commission -- from 1972 to 1977, when he was forced to resign after being convicted on bank fraud charges and sentenced to one year in prison.

Upon his release, he helped Tanner build an empire around billboards, banking and car dealerships and served as a member of the Beale Street Merchants Association, whose president is Peete.

At the same time, Cooper became a perennial political candidate, running unsuccessfully for such offices as Shelby County Register and County Commission.

Cooper's job as a salesman gave him the opportunity to land in court once again.

In a criminal complaint released Thursday, DEA Task Force Officer Kevin Helms said Cooper used Cadillacs to help alleged drug dealer Korreco Green launder illegal proceeds.

Cooper registered a $37,875 Cadillac Escalade under a friend's name, then allowed Green to use the car after he made a $7,500 cash down payment and agreed to make monthly payments of $1,300.

Cooper allegedly served as a middleman for money laundering as well as drug shipments. Cooper knew he was playing a dangerous game, telling Green at one point that he needed to change his phone to prevent a wiretap, according to the criminal complaint.

Conviction Overturned In 1997 Rape, Slaying (WP)

By Tom Jackman, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, December 1, 2006

Judge Cites Failure to Contest Confession

A Norfolk judge has ruled that a sailor convicted in a 1997 rape and murder should be retried or released because his attorney did not attempt to have the sailor's confession thrown out.

Derek E. Tice, 36, is one of the convicted "Norfolk 4" sailors, who have launched a campaign to establish their innocence in the attack on Navy wife Michelle Moore-Bosko. Three of the four -- Tice, Danial Williams, 34, and Joseph Dick, 30 -- received life sentences for murder. Williams and Dick pleaded guilty. A fourth sailor, Eric Wilson, 29, was acquitted of murder but convicted of rape, served eight years, and has been released.

At one point, Norfolk authorities charged seven sailors in Moore-Bosko's rape and death, which occurred July 8, 1997, while her husband was at sea. But the defendants' DNA did not match DNA from the scene; their statements contained inaccuracies; and the Norfolk apartment yielded no evidence of a gang rape.

Then, an eighth man, Omar Ballard, confessed and said he had acted alone. And his DNA did match. Prosecutors dismissed charges against three of the sailors and went to trial against Tice and Wilson.

Last year, lawyers agreed to take on the cases of Tice, Williams and Dick at the request of the Innocence Project, which works on behalf of inmates the group believes were wrongly convicted. The group filed clemency petitions with the governor late last year, contending in part that the men were coerced into falsely confessing. The petitions are pending.

But Deborah L. Boardman, a Washington attorney for Tice, also filed a civil habeas corpus suit alleging that Tice was being illegally imprisoned. In particular, she asked how Norfolk homicide detectives obtained Tice's incriminating statement and whether Tice's attorney did enough to suppress it. Such suits rarely succeed.

After being warned against self-incrimination, Tice agreed to talk to two detectives. Then he was turned over to another detective, Randy Crank. According to Crank's notes, Tice told Crank that he had decided "not to say any more; that he might decide to after he talks with a lawyer or spends some time alone thinking about it."

Crank did not question Tice again. But the first two detectives resumed questioning, and Crank apparently did not tell them of Tice's comment, according to Norfolk Circuit Court Judge Everett A. Martin Jr.'s ruling.

Tice's "right to silence was not scrupulously honored," Martin wrote.

Tice was represented at trial by James O. Broccoletti and Jeffrey R. Russell of Norfolk, experienced criminal defense lawyers. Broccoletti testified at a hearing in September that "there must have been some reason I didn't file" a suppression motion, but he couldn't remember why.

"I find," Martin wrote, "there is a reasonable probability the jury would have acquitted [Tice] if his confession had not been admitted into evidence." He concluded that Tice's right to competent, reasonable assistance of counsel had been violated.

Tice's father, Larry Tice of Clayton, N.C., said the ruling "just goes to prove what I've known for years, that these men are innocent."

Assistant Attorney General Stephen R. McCullough said the state would appeal to the state Supreme Court. If the state loses on appeal, the Norfolk commonwealth's attorney would have to decide whether to retry the case.

Moore-Bosko's parents, Carol and John Moore of Pittsburgh, said they were "profoundly disappointed" by the ruling and believe that the evidence is clear that Tice raped and murdered their daughter.

Attention: Tim Kaine (WP)

The Washington Post, December 1, 2006

THIS WEEK, a judge in Norfolk threw out the conviction of Derek E. Tice, who is serving a life term in Virginia for rape and murder. The decision by Judge Everett A. Martin Jr. should move Gov. Timothy M. Kaine (D) to examine one of the most disturbing potential miscarriages of justice the commonwealth has seen in a long time.

Mr. Tice is one of four Navy sailors prosecuted for the 1997 rape and murder of a Navy wife, Michelle Moore-Bosko. All four confessed but now say their confessions were coerced with aggressive interrogation and threats of the death penalty. All have asked Mr. Kaine to free them, and they have made what seems a powerful case for their innocence. Yet for technical reasons, Mr. Tice is the only one who still has recourse to the courts -- which have now declared his conviction unconstitutional. Mr. Kaine is the only possible source of justice for the others.

The case of the "Norfolk 4" puts the governor in a difficult position. Almost all the evidence that collectively casts doubt on the convictions was available at the time police accused Mr. Tice, Joseph J. Dick Jr., Danial J. Williams and Eric C. Wilson of gang-raping and killing Ms. Moore-Bosko. What's more, in addition to confessing, two of the sailors pleaded guilty. Governors should not lightly overturn convictions under such circumstances.

But this case is extraordinary. Aside from the confessions, no evidence implicated anyone except a man named Omar Ballard, whose DNA was found at the scene. No physical evidence suggested more than one attacker. No DNA evidence linked any of the four sailors to the crime. The evidence was so weak that three other sailors initially charged had to be let go when they did not confess. For his part, Mr. Ballard made clear, even as police were focused on the sailors, that he had acted alone. He wrote in a letter: "Guess who did that Me. HA HA." And he told police as much when they asked him. He later changed his story and was spared the death penalty after pleading guilty to rape and murder. More recently, however, he has returned to his original version: "None of the other individuals who were charged with raping or killing Michelle were there or involved in any way," he said in an affidavit.

Judge Martin's opinion does not address Mr. Tice's guilt or innocence. It does, however, make clear that police interrogated him with improper aggressiveness -- continuing after he had unambiguously asserted his right to stop answering questions.

DOJ_NMG_0100291

The attorney general's office has announced that it will appeal the decision. And Mr. Kaine's office says the governor will not move on the clemency requests until all judicial proceedings are finished. That's wrong. Messrs. Dick, Williams and Wilson -- Mr. Wilson was convicted only of the rape and has been released -- have no judicial process available to them. Their petitions for clemency have been pending for more than a year. Given the magnitude of the injustice they claim, it's time Mr. Kaine gave them an answer.

Ryan Gets Bail While Appealing Fraud Case (AP)

By Mike Robinson

AP, December 1, 2006

CHICAGO - In a stunning decision, a federal appeals court has ruled that former Gov. George Ryan does not have to start his 61/2-year prison sentence as scheduled and may remain free on bond pending appeal.

But the appeals court said in its ruling Tuesday that if it upholds the racketeering and fraud conviction handed down by a federal court jury last April, the 72-year-old Ryan must go immediately to prison.

The appeals court's decision represented a setback for federal prosecutors who had argued that Ryan should start serving his sentence Jan. 4, as ordered by U.S. District Judge Rebecca Pallmeyer.

Prosecutors said there was little chance the guilty verdict reached after a six-month trial before Pallmeyer would be overturned on appeal, so Ryan should start his sentence as scheduled.

But Ryan's lawyers argued that the tumultuous jury deliberations at the conclusion of the case - in which two jurors were dismissed and replaced with alternates because of police records - were badly flawed. They said the likelihood the conviction eventually will be thrown out due to jury problems justified granting bond to Ryan.

A spokesman for the U.S. attorney's office, Randall Samborn, said Wednesday that the government would have no comment on the U.S. 7th Circuit Court of Appeals decision.

Reporters did not realize the ruling had been issued Tuesday until Wednesday morning.

Dan K. Webb, chairman of Chicago's Winston & Strawn law firm and leader of the Ryan defense team, issued a statement saying that "Gov. Ryan is grateful that the United States Court of Appeals for the 7th Circuit entered an order allowing him to remain free on bond pending appeal."

Webb noted that such decisions by the court are very unusual.

Longtime Ryan friend and businessman Larry Warner also was convicted in the trial. The appeals court's decision did not involve Warner or his 31/2-year prison sentence.

The four-page decision contained no explanation of the order.

"Appellant Ryan is granted bail pending the disposition of his appeal in this court," the order said. "If the judgment is affirmed the grant of bail will end automatically, without waiting for this court to issue its mandate." It said Ryan's legal team would get no extension to file briefs, signaling that the court wants no long delays.

The order was issued by a three-judge panel consisting of Chief Judge Frank H. Easterbrook and Judges Terence T. Evans and Diane S. Sykes.

Attorneys said there was no way to predict how long the appeals court would take to uphold Ryan's conviction or grant him a new trial. But the order suggested that Ryan will remain free pending that decision.

There was nothing in the order itself to hint at how the court might rule on Ryan's appeal. But prominent Chicago defense attorney Rick Halprin, who had predicted Ryan would get the unusual appeal bond, said the decision was guaranteed to rekindle hope within the Ryan camp.

"If you're George Ryan you have to be very encouraged by this," said Halprin, who does not represent anyone involved in the case. But he said the decision to grant bond was not "a sure predictor of what will happen."

Ryan was accused of steering lucrative state contracts, leases and other benefits to lobbyists and business friends who in turn provided him with gifts ranging from vacations in Jamaica to a free golf bag.

The former governor, known nationally for declaring a moratorium on the death penalty in Illinois, also was accused of using state employees and taxpayer dollars to run his political campaigns and other offenses.

DOJ_NMG_0100292

On Wednesday, state officials stripped him of a $197,000 annual pension, ruling that the conviction wiped out benefits built up from a 35-year career in public office.

Much of the evidence in the case involved actions taken by Ryan when he was secretary of state for eight years in the 1990s before his 1998 election as governor. The husky-voiced, snowy-haired Republican maintained to the end that nothing he did while in office violated the law.

Appeal bonds are unusual. Most criminal defendants in federal cases who are sentenced to prison must start serving their sentences soon afterward while their lawyers fight their appeals. Ryan's lawyers argued that the problems involving the Ryan jury made his case "a close call."

Pallmeyer suggested to lawyers in the case that her decision to replace jurors after eight deliberation sessions might well be considered an error by the 7th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals.

Besides the jurors who were replaced, Ryan's lawyers cited a juror who brought legal papers she found on the Internet into the jury room.

In a 102-page September ruling in which she denied bail to Ryan, Pallmeyer said the jury problems were not serious enough to suggest that an appeals court was likely to overturn the conviction.

"When the alternates were initially excused the court directed that they not consider media attention until they learned that the verdict was returned," Pallmeyer said. Thus they were not biased by publicity surrounding the case after the verdict.

She said questioning of the alternates who were brought in showed that they "had not in fact been unduly exposed to trial publicity or the comments of third parties." She said the legal papers brought in by one of the jurors did not amount to enough to fatally prejudice the other jurors.

Ruling Gives Ryan Hope (CHIT)

Video: Ryan granted appeal bond

A ruling that former Gov. George Ryan can remain free on bail during the appeal of his corruption conviction gives him a measure of hope that he ultimately may be vindicated.

The decision made public Wednesday by a three-judge panel of the 7th Circuit U.S. Court of Appeals spares Ryan from having to surrender to prison early next year as scheduled.

"It's a Christmas blessing," former First Lady Lura Lynn Ryan said from the doorway of the family's Kankakee home.

But several jurors who convicted Ryan in April considered the news a slap in the face.

"If you wanted me to speak of my emotions, you couldn't print it," said James Cwick, 23, of Glen Ellyn. "The proof of his guilt is there. He should be going to jail on Jan. 4."

The news wasn't all good for Ryan Wednesday. In Springfield, the seven-member General Assembly Retirement System voted unanimously to permanently cancel Ryan's $197,000-a-year pension because of his conviction.

The appellate court panel's ruling was short--a few legalistic sentences--and offered no explanation of the reasoning behind the decision. It overturned a ruling by U.S. District Judge Rebecca Pallmeyer denying Ryan freedom on appeal. But Ryan's lawyers had argued tumultuous jury deliberations raised significant legal questions that could result in a reversal of his conviction and a new trial.

The ruling gives Ryan reason to take heart, according to veteran criminal-defense lawyers who have regularly argued before the 7th Circuit.

The panel "decided that there's a realistic possibility or probability of appellate vindication," said attorney Allan Ackerman.

But Ryan has a long way to go to see the verdict against him overturned, the attorneys said.

The panel that granted Ryan a bond pending his appeal likely will not be the same group of judges that ultimately hears his appeal.

That panel will consider more thorough written arguments from prosecutors and Ryan's attorneys and likely will hear oral arguments as well. The appeals process typically takes months, if not longer.

`Completely new look'

"The judges who will hear his appeal ultimately will take a completely new look at it," said Joel Bertocchi, an attorney who specializes in appellate law.

And if Ryan's conviction is ultimately upheld, his bond will immediately be revoked, the appellate court ruled.

The ruling was the latest twist in a trial marked by extraordinary events.

Ryan was convicted in April on sweeping corruption charges that, as secretary of state and governor, he doled out sweetheart deals to friends and used state resources and employees for political gain. He was to begin serving a 6 1/2 year sentence on Jan. 4.

While the jury was deliberating, the Tribune reported that two jurors, Evelyn Ezell and Robert Pavlick, had concealed a history of run-ins with the law--information they should have revealed to the court months earlier, during jury selection.

After conducting her own investigation, Pallmeyer removed the jurors and replaced them, starting deliberations anew.

Before she was removed, Ezell was holding out against convicting Ryan.

After Ryan was convicted, his lawyers argued that he should remain free because of Pallmeyer's decision to replace the jurors.

They also argued that juror Denise Peterson did independent legal research.

In October, Pallmeyer denied appeal bonds for Ryan and his co-defendant, Lawrence Warner. She ruled that her decision to replace two jurors during deliberations likely would hold up on appeal.

The appellate court overruled Pallmeyer on Ryan's bond but did not consider bond for Warner because he has not requested it.

Warner, who was sentenced to 3 1/2 years, said Wednesday that he didn't ask for the bond because, unlike Ryan, he felt defeated.

Ryan "always thought it would come through, but he was the only one," Warner said.

Several jurors who convicted Ryan are eager to see the appeals court uphold their verdict--in part because turmoil in the jury room led to Ryan's receiving the appeal bond.

Peterson was incensed that Ryan received bond based in part on arguments that she acted improperly.

"I don't know how he can sleep at night," Peterson said of Ryan. "His guilt is absolutely clear cut. It's ridiculous that this man is being allowed to stay free."

Ezell thrilled by ruling

Ezell said she was thrilled by the ruling.

"I think that's great news," she said. "I am so happy for him. The verdict was a miscarriage of justice."

At Ryan's Kankakee home, meanwhile, there was jubilation.

"We're very, very happy," Lura Lynn Ryan said, declaring her husband's innocence. Ryan, who was in the house, did not speak to reporters.

Later, as the sun set, she came outside to turn on the family's Christmas lights, illuminating a manger set up in the front yard.

Her comments came less than hour before the General Assembly Pension System board decided to revoke Ryan's pension.

Former Gov. James Thompson argued unsuccessfully before the board two weeks ago that Ryan should be allowed to keep the portion of his pension he earned before he became secretary of state in 1995.

Since leaving the governor's office in 2003, Ryan has collected $630,000 from the state pension fund, said Timothy Blair, acting executive director of the pension system.

Ryan will not be required to return that money and "is eligible to be refunded the $235,508 he paid into the system."

After the meeting, Rep. Kurt Granberg (D-Carlyle), the board's chairman, said voting to deny Ryan's benefits was the "only legal recourse" the board had, saying members had the responsibility to take action.

"The whole policy was to serve as a deterrent" to other public officials from breaking the law, Granberg said.

Rep. Lee Daniels (R-Elmhurst), another board member, said the board "followed the law." But he added he had "tremendous" feelings for Ryan.

"This is a very good friend of mine," Daniels said. "It's a difficult time right now. I send my feelings and compassion to the governor and his family. It's a very sad time."

Lobbyist Tony Leone, a longtime friend of Ryan's who served as his clerk of the House, monitored the hearing for Ryan and said the former governor expected the decision.

`Only source of income'

"It's devastating because that's his only source of income other than Social Security," Leone said.

Though Ryan lost his pension, his legal representation won't suffer as he continues to receive the free services of star defense lawyer Dan Webb and a team of attorneys at Winston and Strawn.

Warner, his longtime friend who was convicted alongside him, said Wednesday that heavy legal bills were among the reasons he decided not to seek an appeal bond.

He added that he now might seek an appeal bond for himself.

"I'm starting to get encouraged about the appeal," Warner said. "I was so beaten after the sentencing I would have walked right into jail to get it over with."

Bertocchi cautioned that Ryan's victory doesn't mean the appeal will succeed.

"It is certainly good news for Ryan, but he is not out of the woods," he said.

The 7th Circuit reverses only a small percentage of the cases it hears, veteran defense attorneys said.

How long Ryan will have to wait before he learns his ultimate fate is unclear.

The appeals court appeared to send a strong message that it won't let Ryan's appeal drag on inordinately despite the marathon, six-month trial and its potential issues.

No additional time

In its order, the court noted that Ryan's lawyers wouldn't be able to seek delays by asking for additional time to file their legal brief.

As part of the schedule set weeks ago, the defense must file its papers by Dec. 14, little more than two weeks away.

Briefing would be completed by the end of January. That could open the way for the court to hold oral arguments on the appeal by as early as mid-March.

But other recent high-profile criminal cases have taken two years or more to be decided on appeal.

The 7th Circuit upheld former Cicero Town President Betty Loren-Maltese's fraud conviction in September 2005, more than two years after she filed her appeal in January 2003.

The court took 22 months to decide the appeal of former Chicago police Deputy Supt. William Hanhardt, convicted of heading a jewelry-theft ring.

Chanos Asks FBI To Take Over Walters Land Deal Investigation (KLAS)

KLAS-TV, December 1, 2006

This week on Face to Face with Jon Ralston, Attorney General Goerge Chanos said the matter might go to a Grand Jury because the investigation found a pattern of favoritism over the deal.

Billy Walters told the I-Team's George Knapp Thursday that Chanos may have had a stake in the deal to turn Royal Links Golf Course into a housing development.

A day after the I-Team's George Knapp interviewed land developer Billy Walters, the FBI is now involved in the case.

Eyewitness News political analyst Jon Ralston reported that Attorney General George Chanos met Thursday morning with FBI agents and asked them to take over the investigation of Walters' dealings with the city of Las Vegas.

This is the latest round in what's becoming an increasingly nasty fight between A.G. George Chanos and Billy Walters. It all stems back to a proposal to turn Royal Links Golf Club into a housing development.

Chanos is asking the FBI to take over because he believes Walters has made him a potential witness in the case. He denies any wrongdoing.

During an exclusive interview with the I-Team's George Knapp, Walters claimed Chanos was potentially involved in the Royal Links deal. Walters says it was a Chanos' business partner who originally came up with the idea to turn the golf course into housing development.

Chanos says that's not true, but Walters' comments have created a conflict of interest. He also wants the feds to look into the possibiliity of bid rigging.

The city originally signed off on the deal and agreed to have Walters pay $7 million to remove a restriction, which would allow home construction. But the decision was reversed after Chanos launched an independent investigation amid allegations Walters' deal with the city was too good.

No criminal charges have been filed, but an investigation by a California law firm found a pattern of favoritism by the city. Walters did not participate in that investigation.

"What was told to me was that Chanos, the attorney general, has been Brett Torino's business partner, his attorney for many years, and that Torino raised $180,000 for him for his re-election campaign and they're married at the hip. Once I heard that, it was obvious to me it was part of his motivation for him and Torino to get even with me because I wouldn't sell my property to Torino," Walters told the I-Team's George Knapp.

Chanos says he's willing to take a lie detector test to answer Walters' claims.

The FBI will have to look into the case before deciding whether to investigate. If they don't, Chanos says he hopes his successor, Catherine Cortez Masto, will.

Walters said Thursday that he is willing to cooperate with her if she conducts the investigation.

This week on Face to Face with Jon Ralston, Chanos said the matter might go to a Grand Jury because the investigation found a pattern of favoritism over the deal.

Nevada Attorney General Wants FBI Probe (AP)

By Brendan Riley, ASSOCIATED PRESS

AP, December 1, 2006

CARSON CITY, Nev. (AP) - Attorney General George Chanos says he met Thursday with a top Nevada FBI agent to seek a federal probe of developer Billy Walters' efforts to build up to 1,200 homes on land in Las Vegas that was supposed to be left open.

Chanos said that in his meeting with Steve Martinez, special agent in charge of the FBI's Las Vegas office, he also asked for a review of Walters' allegations that Chanos may have been involved in a deal with developer Brett Torino to get the same land.

"I told Mr. Martinez that I would be happy to take a polygraph, and testify under oath before a grand jury that what Walters said about me is absolutely false," Chanos said.

The attorney general said that in his private law practice he had represented Torino but had no business dealings with him and was unaware of any interest that Torino had in getting the Royal Links golf course land until Walters made his allegations.

Chanos said Martinez told him that the FBI will go through a review process before deciding whether to investigate the matter. He added that if the FBI doesn't move ahead, he'd encourage Catherine Cortez Masto, the state's incoming attorney general, to investigate.

Walters on Wednesday told KLAS-TV in Las Vegas that he had refused to sell the Royal Links property to Torino and as a result both Torino and Chanos wanted to "get even with me." He added that Chanos should be investigated.

Local government decisions favoring Walters were condemned in a 157-page report released in October - and Chanos, who sought the report, warned at the time that he could take legal action in the case.

Chanos said the report demonstrated "years of irregularities and failures by certain (Las Vegas) city employees in negotiating the lease of land, the transfer of water rights and the eventual sale of the land to Mr. Walters."

Chanos also said the November 2005 lifting of a deed restriction to let Walters build up to 1,200 homes on land that was supposed to be left open violated Nevada's Public Purpose Doctrine. The Las Vegas City Council later rescinded the decision.

The report, produced by the San Francisco-based Senn Meulemans law firm at a cost of $265,000 to the state, noted that investigators lacked subpoena powers and Walters and Richard Goecke, the city's former public works director, refused to fully cooperate.

Las Vegas police determined that Goecke may have committed felonies with decisions that benefited Walters, although Goecke denied trading favors with Walters. No charges were filed against him after prosecutors determined that statutory limitations had expired.

The 160-acre land parcel that Walters acquired for his golf course in 1999 was supposed to be a buffer between the city's water pollution control facility and any residential development.

Walters paid $854,000 for the land, and recently agreed to pay another $7.2 million in exchange for erasing the deed restriction prohibiting the homes. The land now has a value of at least $35.6 million, according to appraisals done for the city.

2 Wall Street Chiropractors Charged With Fraud (AP)

By Larry Neumeister, The Associated Press

AP, December 1, 2006

NEW YORK (AP) — Two Wall Street chiropractors were arrested Thursday on charges that they defrauded health care programs for the last six years by charging for services that were never provided.

Christopher Green, of Wantagh, and Michael Horowitz, of Marlboro, N.J., even submitted forms to insurance companies for services they claimed to have provided when they were out of town, according to a complaint in U.S. District Court in Manhattan signed by FBI Special Agent Shawn R. Mullen.

The probe into Green, 39, and Horowitz, 38, began after an FBI representative was told at a summer 2005 meeting of the National Health Care Antifraud Association that Green had billed Oxford Health Plans about $172,000 for treating Horowitz and Horowitz's wife, Mullen said.

"This amount was unusually high, and I was assigned to investigate for possible fraud," he said.

Mullen said he learned that Horowitz visited Green 230 times in 2002 while Horowitz's wife visited Green 229 times at Wall Street Chiropractic the same year even though she lived far away in Monmouth County, N.J. The business, located on Wall Street, had opened in February 2002.

"Monmouth County is over 50 miles from Wall Street Chiropractic, which would mean that Mrs. Horowitz traveled over 100 miles a day, several days a week, to see a chiropractor," Mullen said.

The agent said Green was licensed as a chiropractor in August 1992 while Horowitz was licensed in 1995.

The men were charged with fraud and mail fraud. Each was released on $150,000 bail after an initial court appearance Thursday.

Maurice Sieradzki, a lawyer for Horowitz, said he had no immediate comment. Bruce S. Rosenberg, a lawyer for Green, did not immediately return a telephone message for comment. The phone at Wall Street Chiropractic rang unanswered Thursday afternoon.

The chiropractors were accused of submitting false claims for reimbursement to health plan providers including Oxford Health Plans, Empire Blue Cross Blue Shield, Aetna and Cigna.

Mullen said he studied records of health care insurance providers who reimbursed them for claims submitted from January 2000 to the present, discovering that some patients visited Green an abnormally high number of times.

The agent said some patient data had been falsified, with information copied from one to another about items such as medical history, surgical history and allergies.

DOJ_NMG_0100297

Mullen said two members of the state Board of Chiropractic Examiners who authored the handbook for chiropractic practice in New York confirmed his belief that the number of visits of some patients, including Horowitz and his wife, was highly excessive.

Bust 2 Docs In Fraud Scam (NYDN)

By Thomas Zambito, Daily News Staff Writer

New York Daily News, December 1, 2006

Two Wall Street chiropractors were nabbed in a massive fraud scheme yesterday, accused of billing for 460 bogus visits by one of the defendants and his wife in the same year, Manhattan federal prosecutors said.

Christopher Green, 39, of Wantagh, L.I., and Michael Horowitz, 38, of Marlboro, N.J., were arrested early yesterday after an investigation by the FBI found they had duped private insurance companies out of hundreds of thousands of dollars.

The feds say Green submitted claims for an undercover FBI agent on two days the agent hadn't even visited his offices at 80 Wall St.

The partners were accused of using the identical diagnosis for different patients and suggesting one treatment that would have caused debilitating injuries had it been tried. Agents said the doctors recommended that a patient with a metal rod implanted in the spine receive electric stimulation.

Experts consulted by the FBI said such a procedure was a bad idea.

Agents became suspicious last year when they discovered that Green had billed $172,000 to treat Horowitz and his wife. Green billed for 230 visits by Horowitz in 2002 and another 229 for Horowitz's wife, Cecilia, the same year, the indictment claims.

FBI special agent Shawn Mullen said that "would mean that Mrs. Horowitz traveled over 100 miles a day, several days a week, to see a chiropractor."

Priest Pleads Guilty In Child Porn Case (NSDY)

By John Moreno Gonzales, Newsday Staff Writer

Long Island Newsday, December 1, 2006

A Catholic priest based in Roosevelt pleaded guilty Thursday to possession of child pornography and acknowledged grappling with sexually compulsive behavior years before his arrest.

Thomas G. Saloy admitted in a steady voice to Judge Joseph F. Bianco that he kept at least three sexually explicit images of minors in his rectory computer. The felony plea could cost Saloy, 45, up to 10 years in prison or a psychological treatment facility. He was suspended by the church after his Nov. 17 arrest and has been confined to a psychological ward at Mercy Medical Center in Rockville Centre since then.

"After the FBI investigation began, I took an overdose of pills and slit my wrists," the slightly built cleric said, looking straight at the judge who asked him several questions about his mental state in preparation for sentencing on March 23.

Saloy served for nearly a decade at Our Lady of Grace Roman Catholic Church in West Babylon before transferring to Queen of the Most Holy Rosary Church in Roosevelt earlier this year. He told the judge in the same matter of fact voice that he sought counseling for sexual impulses as early as 2000, when he joined Sexual Compulsives Anonymous.

"What you see is a person who is accepting responsibility," Saloy's lawyer, Peter Rubin of Rockville Centre, said after the plea in U.S. District Court in Central Islip.

But Barbara Dorris, outreach director of SNAP, the Survivors Network of those Abused by Priests, wondered if that were true.

"We're glad that Father Saloy has admitted his sex crimes and compulsions, and hope he is telling the full truth," she said. "We also hope that his parishioners and colleagues ask others, especially children, if Father Saloy ever hurt them."

Sean Dolan, a spokesman for the Diocese of Rockville Centre, said "nothing indicated Father Saloy had any such compulsion" before his arrest.

"We've been transparent with all the parishes that Father Saloy has served in and raised awareness of sexual abuse," Dolan said.

Saloy was ordained in 1988 and has also served at St. Mary's Roman Catholic Church in East Islip and the Parish of St. Raphael in East Meadow.

At the time of his arrest, prosecutors said Saloy stored 1,300 sexually explicit images of minors on his rectory computer. But in court Thursday, prosecutor Allen L. Bode acknowledged that many of the images were duplicates or items that Saloy had not actively solicited.

But Bode emphasized that he could prove Saloy downloaded at least three items and had viewed one video of child pornography just days before his arrest.

Bianco ordered that Saloy be held for now at St. Luke Institute in Silver Spring, Md., a facility that has treated clerics for sexual disorders. Bianco ordered that he have no access to children, the Internet or the outside world while there.

Long Island Priest Pleads Guilty To Possessing Child Porn (NSDY/AP)

Long Island Newsday, December 1, 2006

CENTRAL ISLIP, N.Y. (AP) _ A priest who collected hundreds of child pornography images off the Internet for 2 1/2 years pleaded guilty Thursday in federal court to possessing them.

Thomas G. Saloy, 45, an administrator of the Queen of the Most Holy Rosary Church in Roosevelt, entered his plea in U.S. District Court after originally pleading not guilty on Nov. 17.

"It was a very good plea offer, allowing immediate access to psychiatric therapy and other required treatments," said Saloy's lawyer, Peter M. Rubin.

Rubin said the good deal reflected Saloy's "limited activity."

During the hearing, the Roman Catholic priest admitted having more than 600 illegal images on his computer.

Saloy was scheduled to be sentenced March 23; he faces a maximum of 10 years imprisonment, a life term of supervised release and a $250,000 fine.

Saloy was arrested Nov. 17 after he was snagged in a federal probe looking into the trading of child porn via the AOL Internet service.

FBI agents seized computer equipment near Milwaukee last year and found an e-mail from Saloy depicting sexually explicit images of boys. That prompted authorities to open an investigation into Saloy, who was assigned to a church in West Babylon at the time.

In September and October of this year, authorities said, Saloy contacted an undercover detective who was posing as a 16-year-old boy in an AOL chat room.

The two had sexually explicit conversations, prosecutors said, and Saloy asked the detective to send him child porn.

On Nov. 6, the FBI and the Suffolk County Police Department raided Saloy's rectory residence and confiscated his computer, which contained images and videos of children engaged in sexually explicit conduct.

Saloy was ordered to remain at a secure hospital psychiatric ward. The judge said he can obtain psychiatric treatment at a program for sex offenders in Silver Spring, Md., while subject to electronic monitoring.

Guilty Plea In Theft Of Roosevelt's Gun (NSDY/AP)

By Dino Hazell, Associated Press Writer

Long Island Newsday, December 1, 2006

NEW YORK -- A man who stole the gun Theodore Roosevelt used in the Spanish-American War's most famous battle has pleaded guilty to violating a law designed to protect cherished U.S. antiquities, prosecutors said.

"Today's guilty plea effectively ends a 16-year-old mystery, and a treasured piece of American history has been returned to the public," U.S. Attorney Roslynn Mauskopf said Thursday in a statement.

Roosevelt carried the 1892 double-action six-shot revolver when he was serving as the regimental commander of the Rough Riders during the charge up Cuba's San Juan Hill in 1898.

The gun, which was valued at up to $500,000, was stolen in April 1990 from the Sagamore Hill National Historical Site, Roosevelt's former home in Oyster Bay, N.Y. The revolver had been in a display case that had no alarm.

The FBI recovered the gun this year. It was returned to Sagamore Hill, which was Roosevelt's home from 1885 until his death in 1919.

Anthony Joseph Tulino, a postal worker from DeLand, Fla., who was living in New York, pleaded guilty to a violation of the American Antiquities Act of 1906, which Roosevelt signed into law. It prohibits the theft of relics from U.S. government property.

Tulino, 55, faces up to 90 days in jail and a $500 fine.

A telephone at the office of Tulino's attorney, Thomas Sommerville, rang unanswered Thursday night, and Sommerville didn't immediately return an e-mail seeking comment. He had declined to comment when his client was charged earlier this month.

Police were tipped off after Tulino's best friend saw the gun, which was kept in a closet at his Florida home.

The .38-caliber Colt revolver originally was acquired by the U.S. government for the Navy in 1895. It was in the armory of the USS Maine when the battleship mysteriously sank in Havana Harbor on Feb. 15, 1898, leading to the war. It was recovered during a salvage mission by one of Roosevelt's relatives, who gave it to him.

An inscription on the revolver reads, "July 1st, 1898, San Juan, Carried and Used by Colonel Theodore Roosevelt, From the Sunken Battle Ship Maine."

A man pleaded guilty yesterday to the theft of a revolver believed to have been used by Theodore Roosevelt during his charge up San Juan Hill in the Spanish-American War, federal prosecutors said. They said the man, Anthony Joseph Tulino, 55, stole the revolver from a display case at the Sagamore Hill National Historical Site in Oyster Bay in April 1990. It was recovered this year by the F.B.I. Mr. Tulino pleaded guilty in Federal District Court to violating the American Antiquities Act of 1906, which Roosevelt himself signed into law. The value of the firearm, an 1892 Colt .38-caliber revolver, is estimated at $250,000 to $500,000.

Violent Crimes Leap In City (MJS)

By John Diedrich

Milwaukee Journal Sentinel, December 1, 2006

Robbery, assault wave is among worst in U.S.

New York - Milwaukee is among the leaders in a spike in violent crime being reported this year in numerous cities across the country, according to figures presented at a conference here this week.

In the first six months of 2006, robberies were up 36% and aggravated assaults were up 31.6% compared with the same period in 2005, according to a survey published by the Police Executive Research Forum. Of the 55 U.S. police departments in the survey, only Minneapolis had a higher combined increase in those categories.

Certain cities, especially the largest, have not had a similar rise in violence, prompting some experts to caution that more data is needed before concluding that the nation as a whole is seeing a new wave of crime.

Others, however, are convinced that crime is on an upward trend.

"I think there is something important going on out there," David Kennedy, director of the Center for Crime Prevention and Control at the John Jay College of Criminal Justice, which hosted the conference, said Thursday. "My bones tell me that something is changing."

Several police chiefs have concluded that the jump in violent crime is not a blip but the start of a troubling trend that must be tackled, said Dean Esserman, chief in Providence, R.I.

Violent crime nationally in 2005 showed the largest single-year increase in 14 years, and many cities report that the trend is continuing this year.

Esserman noted that chiefs and mayors from 50 cities attended a conference in August, and most reported violent crime is on the rise. At the time, Los Angeles Chief William Bratton called it a "gathering storm," though it has not hit his city yet.

"The reality is overwhelming," said Esserman, of the Police Executive Research Forum, which hosted that August conference. "Everyone told the same story with desperation and anger."

DOJ_NMG_0100300

In Milwaukee, police reported a leap in violent crime in 2005 compared with the previous year. Officials acknowledge an increase but cautioned that their 2004 figures might have been faulty because of computer problems. But whatever the increase in 2005, the key categories of robbery and aggravated assault are up significantly this year. Homicides down, shootings up

So far, homicides in Milwaukee are down - almost 16% compared with this time last year, with 97 killings to date and 115 at this time in 2005. But officials say non-fatal shootings are rising. Froedtert Hospital in Wauwatosa expects to treat 34% more gunshot victims this year than last, and Children's Hospital of Wisconsin is up 38%.

Experts say that the total number of shootings - not just the fatal ones - is a better measurement of gun violence.

The Journal Sentinel reported last month that about 600 people a year are struck by gunfire in Milwaukee and survive. Shootings cost taxpayers, hospitals and people with insurance tens of millions of dollars a year, the newspaper found. They also consume police officers' time, leading to slow response for less urgent calls. For months, residents have complained about response times not only for low-level calls but also for more serious crimes.

Police Chief Nannette Hegerty has formed a group in her department to study police responses and consider changes, as it struggles with the surge in violence. One option being considered is whether to continue sending officers to certain lower-priority calls, perhaps handling the calls over the phone or by computer.

Hegerty and other chiefs report seeing more shootings and homicides resulting from arguments that earlier might have been settled with fights. They also are reporting more robberies, with the victims sometimes getting shot even after giving up cash. Boston less of a 'miracle'

Milwaukee and many other cities have looked to Boston to see why homicides there dropped from 152 in the early 1990s to 31 a decade later. The so-called Boston Miracle formed a coalition of ministers, social workers and others to reach at-risk youth, but with success, the plan drifted.

Last year, there were 75 homicides in Boston, a 10-year high, and about 300 non-fatal shootings. This year, there have been 69 killings so far, and non-fatal shootings were up 80% in the first half of the year, said Larry Mayes, chief of human services in Boston. That shooting pace has slowed in the second half of the year, as the city returned to the plan.

Boston is making up for a shortage of police officers, but Mayes said crime suppression isn't the ultimate answer. "You really need to drill down to the root of the problem," he said.

Looking for reasons behind the current jump in crime, experts say it's helpful to look at the last jump in crime, between the mid-1980s and early 1990s.

Crack cocaine was blamed for that spasm of violence across the country, including in Milwaukee; it was fueled by the availability of handguns, with many more young males, who were particularly reckless, perpetrating crimes. Milwaukee had 168 homicides in 1991. 'Where is the moral outrage?'

The drop that began in 1993 is attributed to several factors, including police crackdowns on illegal guns, a drop in demand for crack, a strong economy and perhaps high incarceration rates, said Alfred Blumstein, a criminal justice professor at Carnegie Mellon University. But Blumstein said incarceration increased in the 1970s before the explosion of violent crime, challenging the notion that lockup rates reduce crime.

Experts suggest that possible factors behind the recent increase include easier access to guns, a slow economy, parole of prisoners and less federal money for social services and officers as resources go to homeland defense.

Esserman and other chiefs fault the U.S. Justice Department for forgetting crime as it focuses on terrorism. After the meeting in August, federal officials promised to study the issue, which Esserman called absurd. He said action is needed.

Esserman said another ingredient is getting everyone to care about the violence. He said that too often, the public gives a collective shrug over rampant violence because it affects poor people, usually in the African-American community.

"It has become tolerated. It has become acceptable," he said of the roughly 16,000 homicides every year. "Where is the moral outrage?" On the Web

Govt. Fights Morning-after Pill Subpoena (AP)

AP, December 1, 2006

A reproductive rights group is on a "fishing expedition" and should be denied access to White House e-mails and other documents it seek as part of a lawsuit promoting unfettered access to the morning-after pill, the Justice Department said Thursday.

The Center for Reproductive Rights subpoenaed the White House in mid-November as part of its lawsuit against the Food and Drug Administration. The group sued seeking to lift all age restrictions on nonprescription sales of the Plan B emergency contraceptive pills. It wants the White House documents to determine whether it interfered with the FDA's handling of a request by manufacturer Barr Pharmaceuticals Inc. to allow unrestricted, over-the-counter sales of the pills.

In a Thursday letter, Justice Department attorney John R. Tyler told the Center it hadn't demonstrated the adequate need required to gain access to White House documents.

"Plaintiffs have not met this heightened standard, and the subpoena is a fishing expedition to probe the internal processes of the White House," Tyler wrote.

The Center will continue to pursue the lawsuit and compel the White House to provide the documents it wants, spokeswoman Dionne Scott said.

The Center's lawsuit hit a snag Nov. 21 when a judge issued a stay that keeps the FDA from having to turn over further agency documents. Scott said the stay doesn't apply to the White House subpoena; Tyler said the stay, until lifted, made it "inappropriate" for Center lawyers to pursue the subpoena.

In August, the FDA said it would let women 18 and older buy Plan B without a prescription, but younger women would still need a doctor's note. The restricted over-the-counter sales began in November.

The morning-after pill is a high dose of the most common ingredient in regular birth control pills. When taken within 72 hours of unprotected sex, the two-pill series can lower the risk of pregnancy by up to 89 percent.

Larkin, Individuals Pay $15.4M To Settle Kickback Allegations (SOFLABIZ)

South Florida Business Journal, December 1, 2006

Larkin Community Hospital in Miami and its current and former owners have paid $15.4 million to settle federal and Florida civil health care fraud claims against them.

The Justice Department said the individuals involved are Dr. Jack Michel, Dr. James Desnick, Morris Esformes and Philip Esformes.

Also involved in the settlement: 34 related companies owned by the Esformes used to operate nine assisted living facilities; Claudia Pace, an employee of one of the Esformes-owned companies; and Frank Palacios, a longtime employee of the hospital.

The settlement resolves the civil case United States v. Jack Jacobo Michel, M.D., et al., which the government filed in 2004, alleging violations of the False Claims Act.

The state of Florida joined the suit later that year.

The government alleged that, in 1997, Larkin, then owned by Desnick, paid kickbacks to physicians in return for patient admissions.

The United States contended the primary recipient of the kickbacks was Jack Michel, whom it said was paid for patient admissions to Larkin by himself and his brother, Dr. George Michel.

Jack Michel purchased Larkin in 1998.

In 2000, Desnick was a party to a $14 million settlement with the United States for a similar kickback scheme from 1992 to 2000 at another facility he owned, Doctors Hospital of Hyde Park in Chicago.

DOJ_NMG_0100302

The United States also alleged in the Michel suit that, from 1998 to 1999, Jack Michel, George Michel, Morris Esformes, Philip Esformes, Frank Palacios and Claudia Pace conspired to admit patients to Larkin for medically unnecessary treatment.

The government asserted that some of these patients came from assisted living facilities owned and operated by Jack Michel, Morris Esformes and Philip Esformes.

"The Department of Justice is committed to vigorously litigating cases about conduct that undermines the integrity of the Medicare and Medicaid programs," said Peter D. Keisler, assistant attorney general for the department's civil division. "We will not tolerate health care providers who pay kickbacks or perform medically unnecessary treatments on elderly beneficiaries in order to generate Medicare and Medicaid payments."

High Court Vets False Claims Act (LAW)

By Marcia Coyle, The National Law Journal

National Law Journal, December 1, 2006

A 17-year-old whistleblower suit by a now 81-year-old former engineer at the Rocky Flats nuclear weapons plant has triggered U.S. Supreme Court review of a crucial issue under the fastest growing area of federal civil litigation today, the False Claims Act.

In Rockwell International Corp. v. U.S. and ex rel. Stone, No. 05-1272, the justices on Dec. 5 will examine a critical restriction on who can bring so-called qui tam lawsuits under the act.

Was Principal Engineer James S. Stone "an original source of the information" that served as the basis for a jury's finding that Rockwell, starting in 1987, violated the act by hiding from the government environmental, safety and health problems related to its processing of nuclear waste?

The high court's interpretation of a statute that Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr. as a lower court judge criticized as unclear will affect not only who qualifies as a qui tam "relator" but also the ability of defendants, often large corporations, to dismiss early these complex and expensive suits.

The False Claims Act is becoming the principal tool by which the federal government combats fraud, said FCA practitioner Peter B. Hutt II, a partner at Miller & Chevalier, who filed an amicus brief supporting Rockwell on behalf of the Washington Legal Foundation.

The FCA provides for treble damages and penalties and a lesser burden of proof than criminal statutes that require proof beyond a reasonable doubt and do not necessarily allow the government to recover as much money, he explained.

"Anyone who does business with the federal government and takes federal money in any way is a potential target of an FCA lawsuit either by the federal government directly or by a qui tam plaintiff," said Hutt. "There has been a constant, slow increase in the number of cases, constantly changing theories of liability and new classes of industries as defendants."

And where there is alleged fraud by large companies, such as by the most recent target -- pharmaceutical companies -- Hutt said, "The dollars get very large, very quickly."

From fiscal years 1987 through 2005, settlements and judgments for the federal government in FCA cases have exceeded $15 billion, of which $9.6 billion, or 64 percent, was for cases filed by whistleblowers under the FCA's qui tam provisions, according to a report last January by the U.S. Government Accountability Office. The whistleblowers' share of the qui tam settlements and judgments was more than $1.6 billion during this period.

QUI TAM HURDLES

The FCA provides that any person who knowingly submits, or causes the submission of, false claims for government funds or property is liable for damages and penalties.

Under the FCA, the government can prosecute an action on its own, or a private person may bring a qui tam action. The FCA calls a qui tam plaintiff a "relator," also known popularly as a whistleblower.

The government has the right to intervene in the relator's lawsuit. If the government declines intervention, the relator has the right to go forward alone.

To prevent so-called parasitic lawsuits by relators who try to capitalize on information about fraud already made public, the FCA prohibits qui tam suits "based upon the public disclosure of allegations or transactions in a criminal, civil, or administrative hearing, in a congressional, administrative, or [Government Accountability Office] report, hearing, audit, or investigation, or from the news media."

This "public disclosure" bar has one exception. A qui tam suit that triggers the public-disclosure bar may proceed only if the relator is "an original source of the information." An original source must have "direct and independent knowledge of the information on which the allegations are based," and have "voluntarily provided the information to the Government before filing [a suit] which is based on the information."

The original-source exception is at the heart of Rockwell's case in the Supreme Court. It has argued unsuccessfully before a district court and an appeals court that Stone was not an original source because he had no first-hand knowledge of the fraud at issue.

"The public-disclosure bar with its original-source exception is the single most litigated issue in the entire False Claims Act jurisprudence," said John T. Boese, partner in the Washington office of New York's Fried, Frank, Harris, Shriver & Jacobson and author of the leading FCA treatise, Civil False Claims and Qui Tam Actions.

The government, he said, intervenes in about 20 percent of all qui tam cases. In the 80 percent proceeding without the government, the original-source issue arises in much more than half, he said, adding, "It also can arise, as in Rockwell, where the government intervenes, and that is more and more true because of the legal fees issue."

If a relator can be dismissed on the original-source issue, the defendant doesn't have to pay legal fees and costs if it loses, explained Boese.

"You can imagine the amount in a case litigated as actively and vigorously as the Rockwell case," he said, estimating legal fees at up to four times the $4.2 million jury award. "And the government doesn't have to pay the relator a share of what it recovers."

Over the years, the courts have expanded what is a public disclosure, and therefore the original-source exception has become more important, said James Moorman, president of Taxpayers Against Fraud Education Fund, which operates a False Claims Act Legal Center and will file an amicus brief supporting Stone.

"None other than then Judge Alito ruled in a FCA case that when the government gave a document to a relator who had filed a [Freedom of Information Act] request, it had, in effect, issued a public report triggering the public-disclosure bar," Moorman said. "This astounded everybody, but there it is.

"So the original-source rule, which protects you from being bumped out by the public-disclosure bar, is crucial."

ORIGINAL SOURCE?

Rockwell operated the Rocky Flats nuclear weapons facility in Colorado under a contract with the U.S. Department of Energy from 1975 through 1989. Stone worked as principal engineer there from November 1980 until March 1986.

After Stone was laid off, he informed an FBI agent that environmental crimes had allegedly been committed at Rocky Flats during his period of employment. The FBI agent prepared an affidavit, obtained a search warrant and conducted a search. About a month after the search, Stone filed his qui tam action alleging that in an effort to maximize its receipt of award fees and other payments under its government contract, Rockwell had violated the FCA by falsely representing to DOE that it had complied with applicable environmental, safety and health requirements in its operation of the facility.

In the meantime, the government conducted a criminal investigation into Rockwell's management of Rocky Flats. In March 1992, Rockwell pleaded guilty to 10 environmental violations.

In 1995, the government intervened in Stone's qui tam action and both filed an amended complaint restating Stone's initial allegations and asserting additional claims.

At trial, the primary issue was whether Rockwell had concealed from DOE environmental, safety and health problems related to the processing and storage of saltcrete and pondcrete, two forms of processed toxic waste.

Rockwell's counsel, veteran high court litigator Maureen Mahoney, head of the appellate practice at Latham & Watkins from the firm's Washington office, argues that Stone had no direct and independent knowledge that the pondcrete leaked toxic waste or that Rockwell had represented otherwise to DOE because he left Rocky Flats before either the pondcrete or the toxic waste statements were made.

DOJ_NMG_0100304

The 10th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, Mahoney contends, incorrectly interpreted the statute's requirement of "direct and independent knowledge" of the later fraud to require only limited knowledge "underlying or supporting" the fraud allegation.

"The 10th Circuit expanded that narrow exception so broadly that it effectively swallows the jurisdictional bar," she wrote in court papers regarding the original-source exception.

Noting that the federal circuits have adopted varying standards, Mahoney argues, "The best reading is that the relator must have direct and independent knowledge of information sufficient to permit the trier of fact to conclude that a false statement was made to the Government in support of a fraudulent claim for payment."

NO PARASITE

In its opposition to Supreme Court review and in lower court proceedings, the government argued that Rockwell had understated substantially the significance of Stone's knowledge. He had been instructed in his job not to divulge environmental and other problems to DOE, and he had uncovered through his own efforts design problems for the pondcrete blocks that would result in toxic-waste releases.

"Stone's role in this case was therefore very different from that of the 'parasitic' relators at whom the 'public disclosure' bar is directed," the government argued in its opposition brief.

Stone's high court counsel, Maria T. Vullo, a partner in New York's Paul, Weiss, Rifkind, Wharton & Garrison, said there is no confusion in the circuits on how to interpret the original-source exception.

"I think the way the circuits have approached the issue is really a function of how they describe particular facts of the case," she said.

"The plain language of the statute is what it is and to the extent Rockwell has a gripe, that's a gripe for the Congress to add some standard that's not existing in the statutory language right now. We will argue that we meet all of Rockwell's new tests."

Fried Frank's Boese noted that defendants and the government can question whether someone is an original source at any stage of the litigation because it is a jurisdictional issue.

"What Rockwell is arguing very effectively is that Stone's theory of liability was abandoned both by Stone and the government and never presented to the jury," he said. "What was presented was a whole new theory that the government developed in course of its criminal investigation. They argue he was not the original source of the theory of fraud that was eventually successful."

But Rockwell is "throwing all kinds of smoke" in front of the Supreme Court, countered Moorman of Taxpayers Against Fraud. The case, he said, is part of a continuing campaign by business and industry "to hobble and undermine" whistleblower lawsuits.

"They struck out on their constitutional attacks on the statute and now they're trying to get an interpretation that would do the same thing," said Moorman.

4th Circuit Ruling Trims Reach Of State Anti-Spam Laws (LAW)

By Pamela A. Maclean, The National Law Journal

National Law Journal, December 1, 2006

An Oklahoma-based anti-spam crusader who sued over repeated cruise vacation e-mail ads has put wind in the sails of spammers with the first federal appellate court ruling limiting the reach of state laws that restrict unwanted e-mail.

The 4th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals held that a 2003 federal law, known as the CAN-SPAM Act, pre-empts state laws that allow suits for false information in junk e-mails if the misrepresentation is "immaterial."

Spam is a "serious and pervasive problem" but the federal law "does not impose liability at the mere drop of a hat," wrote Judge J. Harvie Wilkenson. "Congress did not intend 'falsity' to encompass bare error because such a reading would upset the Act's careful balance between preserving a potentially useful commercial tool and preventing its abuse," he wrote.

The decision is significant for companies that use mass e-mail to get their products in front of likely customers but face potentially costly legal judgments if they conceal the source of transmission or contain false information.

AN APPELLATE FIRST

DOJ_NMG_0100305

Most states have laws restricting mass junk e-mail, known as spam, and allow suits for damages for violations. The 4th Circuit held that the federal act partially pre-empts Oklahoma's laws allowing damages if e-mail misrepresents who transmits it, omits the point of origin or contains false information "insofar as [state laws] applied to immaterial misrepresentations."

The court has sent "an important signal to commercial e-mailers: If they comply with the federal act then they have nothing to worry about from crusaders who pursue these lawsuits," said James Hodges, a Reston, Va., solo practitioner who represented Omega World Travel Inc., which sent the cruise line ads.

Hodges said that the decision "is the first from an appellate court that has construed the scope of pre-emption language in the CAN-SPAM Act."

CAN-SPAM Act stands for Controlling the Assault on Non-Solicited Pornography and Marketing Act of 2003.

Kelly O. Wallace, attorney for Mark Mumma of Mummagraphics Inc., agreed that this is a significant ruling, but added that the appeals court "dropped the ball."

"I do think they expanded what is permissible for mass e-mail, especially routing information," said Wallace of Wellborn & Wallace in Atlanta.

Mumma provides online services from Oklahoma City, registering domain names, hosting Web pages and designing Web sites and logos. He also operates Web sites devoted to fighting spam messages, such as SueASpammer.

Mumma sued Virginia-based Omega World Travel and owners Gloria and Daniel Bohan after receiving 11 e-mails for cruise vacations. He threatened to sue for $150,000 in damages unless the Bohans settled for $6,250, according to the opinion Omega World Travel v. Mummagraphics Inc., No. 05-2080. The potential penalty under Oklahoma law is $25,000 per violation.

When the Bohans failed to pay, Mumma accused them of being spammers on his Web site and posted their photos, the opinion states. The couple sued for defamation, copyright and trademark infringement. Mumma raised counterclaims alleging violations of the Oklahoma spam law.

Wallace said that the ruling runs counter to a district court decision last year denying a motion to dismiss in Washington state, Gordon v. Impulse Marketing Group, Inc., No. C04-5125FVS. That ruling states that the CAN-SPAM Act does not pre-empt state spam laws to the extent that they "prohibit falsity or deception." That case is awaiting a decision on a summary judgment motion.

Hodges said the 4th Circuit ruling "impliedly rejects that case."

Litigation and threats of suits have made the issue hot around the country. In October, Verizon Wireless Inc. said that it would continue to press legal efforts to block spam to its wireless customers. It has filed several lawsuits over unwanted text messages selling prescription drugs, vacations and stock information.

Cingular Wireless Inc. has filed several suits under Georgia and Florida state law to protect customers from unsolicited text-messaging operators. It alleged that operators of webuyresorts.com and resortsellers.com sent deceptive and unsolicited commercial text messages to its wireless phone customers.

"I think this decision can be used by lawyers representing responsible businesses that use the e-mail advertising tool, but nonetheless get sued by people who don't like getting e-mail and see the chance for a windfall in some state statutes," Hodges said.

All but 10 states have some anti-spam legislation, according to Mumma.

Schumer Seeks Investigation Of Misleading Md. GOP Fliers (AP)

AP, December 1, 2006

ANNAPOLIS, Md. - Unhappy that the Justice Department denied his request to investigate campaign fliers handed out by Maryland Republicans on Election Day, New York Sen. Charles E. Schumer, fired-off a letter to Attorney General Alberto Gonzales asking him to justify the decision.

DOJ_NMG_0100306

"Unfortunately, the midterm elections held on Nov. 7, 2006, were tarnished by countless dirty trick and ugly tactics. The ploy used in Maryland stands out for its sheer cynicism and brazenness," said Schumer, chairman of the Senate Democratic campaign committee, in a letter sent on Wednesday.

Schumer's letter refers to fliers distributed on Election Day by homeless people bused in from Philadelphia by campaign committees for Gov. Robert Ehrlich's re-election bid and Lt. Gov. Michael Steele's race for Senate.

Fliers handed out in Prince George's County gave the impression they were a Democratic sample ballot, but listed Ehrlich and Steele along with Democratic candidates for county and legislative offices. The fliers also made it appear that two prominent black Democrats - Prince George's County Executive Jack Johnson and former Rep. Kweisi Mfume - were supporting Ehrlich and Steele. Both supported Democratic candidates - Baltimore Mayor Martin O'Malley for governor and Rep. Ben Cardin for the Senate.

The Department of Justice notified Schumer in a Nov. 16 letter that it had looked into the complaint and concluded "that there is an insufficient legal basis to initiate a formal investigation."

Schumer's letter to Gonzales requested answers to eight questions, including whether the department undertook any preliminary factual investigation before reaching its conclusion not to conduct a formal investigation.

Kansas Court Rejects Clinics' Request In Abortion Records Dispute (FINDLAW/AP)

AP, December 1, 2006

(AP) - TOPEKA, Kansas-The Kansas Supreme Court refused Thursday to intervene on behalf of two abortion clinics who wanted it to investigate the state attorney general and a popular conservative talk show host over the host's statements that he had information from Kansas abortion records.

The clinics asked the court to seize records that Attorney General Phill Kline, an outspoken abortion opponent, obtained on 90 of the clinics' patients. Kline received edited versions of the records in October after arguing he wanted to review the records for evidence of possible crimes, including rape and illegal abortions.

The clinics wanted a special prosecutor to determine if Fox television talk show host Bill O'Reilly's information came from Kline's records. A show spokesman has said he did not know how O'Reilly, who also interviewed Kline, obtained the information.

The clinics also accused Kline of violating patients' privacy and not being objective.

The court offered no explanation for its decision Thursday. The ruling means Kline can continue his investigation, refer potential cases to county prosecutors or file charges himself before leaving office.

The issue grew dramatically last month when the clinics filed their court request a day before the Nov. 7 election, in which the Republican Kline lost his bid for a second term.

Days before, in a Nov. 3 broadcast of "The O'Reilly Factor," the conservative host said a "source inside" told the show the director of one of the clinics, Dr. George Tiller, performs late-term abortions and had broken state law by failing to report potential rapes of victims ages 10 to 15.

Tiller, one of the few U.S. doctors to perform late-term abortions, has been targeted by protesters for years. His clinic was bombed in 1985, and he was shot by a protester in 1993.

Kline's office was not immediately available for comment Thursday, and an attorney for the clinics declined to comment, saying he had not had time to examine the ruling.

The clinics' request criticized O'Reilly, but he was not a named defendant.

Lauderdale Residents Demand Answers For Killing By Police (MH)

By Wanda J. Demarzo And Darran Simon

The Miami Herald, December 1, 2006

More than 200 people packed a Fort Lauderdale community center Thursday night, demanding to know why city police shot two 21-year-old men Tuesday, killing one and wounding the other.

Some -- including family members of one of the men -- cried and shouted at the meeting in the city's predominantly black northwest district, where Troy Eddines and Travis Jackson were shot. A gun was not found at the scene, said police chief Bruce Roberts.

DOJ_NMG_0100307

It was the fourth time Fort Lauderdale police had killed someone in the past six months.

Marsha Ellison, president of the Fort Lauderdale NAACP, who helped organize Thursday's meeting, told the crowd that she will meet with the FBI on Wednesday to discuss the shootings. The NAACP has also filed a complaint with the Department of Justice asking them to investigate the shootings, police procedures and use of deadly force.

"We are concerned that the Fort Lauderdale police cannot police themselves," said Ellison who added that NAACP national office is behind the local organization.

On Tuesday, officers pulled over a 2006 Mitsubishi Endeavor Eddines was driving because the SUV had been reported stolen in a carjacking in Coconut Creek a few days earlier. Eddines died at the scene, while Jackson, who was shot in the back, was taken to the hospital, where he was released Wednesday.

Jackson was arrested Thursday, and the Broward Sheriff's office charged him with an armed robbery committed around 2 p.m. Saturday in Tamarac.

Meanwhile, Coconut Creek police on Thursday identified Eddines as one of three people who committed the carjacking of the SUV on Friday. His mother, Ivy, declined to comment.

At Thursday's meeting, at the Mizell Center on Sistrunk Boulevard, residents wanted to know why officers opened fire and when the investigation will be complete.

"I left my auntie at home, crying her heart out," Eddines cousin, Andrea, 25, said. ``Something is boiling inside of me right now I can't explain."

But Fort Lauderdale Police Chief Bruce Roberts said his department is still investigating the shooting, so it doesn't yet have the answers to many of residents' questions.

"We just can't give you many more facts right now," he said.

FEAR OF RETRIBUTION

Residents said they were concerned about how officers treated them in the community and are afraid to file complaints because they fear retaliation.

"It's not just [Officer] Todd Hill, it's all of them," said Sharanda Morgan, 37, who lives nearby. ``That's why we don't file that complaint. They will come back and harass us."

A few residents asked why police cars didn't have cameras to record the shooting and when the investigation would be done.

"Those cameras are going to tell the truth," said Sylvester King of Fort Lauderdale.

Roberts, one of those who called meeting, said close to $2 million is set aside for cameras in all patrol cars. They should be installed by spring or summer of 2007, he said.

In other developments Thursday, Coconut Creek police said one of the victims had identified Eddines as one of the carjackers of the Mitsubishi.

The carjacking, which took place Friday in the parking lot of a Walgreens in the 6300 block of State Road 7, remains under investigation, Creek police spokesman Tony Avello said.

Avello said that detectives have not identified Jackson, 21, as one of the carjacking suspects.

According to court records, Eddines has never been convicted of a felony in Florida, although he has been arrested 10 times since 2003.

Prosecutors either dropped charges against him, or judges imposed probation or jail time but withheld finding him guilty, court records show.

BSO, meanwhile, said Thursday that Jackson committed an armed robbery around 2 p.m. Saturday in the parking lot of the Lakeside apartments in Tamarac.

According to the sheriff's office, two men in a Mitsubishi SUV, armed with semi-automatic handguns, approached three teenage boys and demanded they empty their pockets.

The teens gave the robbers two cellphones, an iPod, three PlayStation 2 games and $30 in cash. They identified Jackson as one of the armed robbers, BSO said.

"The robbery is still under investigation and at this time we have not determined if Troy Eddines was involved," said BSO spokesman Jim Leljedal.

Jackson's grandfather, Charlie Jackson, questioned the charges against his grandson.

"They let him out of jail and now they cooked up some strong-armed robbery charges against him," Charlie Jackson said Thursday afternoon. ``Can you believe this?"

26 ARRESTS

Travis Jackson has been arrested 26 times since 1999. Most were when he was a juvenile. The outcome of the cases are not public record.

But in 2000, he was convicted of robbery and spent almost three years in prison, according to the Florida Deparment of Corrections. He also was convicted of cocaine possession in 2004 and sentenced to probation.

Two marijuana charges against Jackson remain unresolved, records show.

Tuesday's shootings came after Fort Lauderdale police Officers Robert Norvis and Todd Hill stopped the Mitsubishi in the 500 block of Northwest 17th Avenue near Sistrunk Boulevard. As the officers neared the car, it reversed and hit one of the officers in the leg, police said.

The officers opened fire, killing Eddines, of Lauderdale Lakes, as he sat in the driver's seat. Jackson was shot twice in the back, family members told The Miami Herald. He was treated at Broward General Medical Center and released Wednesday.

The shootings, in an area just off Sistrunk Boulevard have residents questioning what they call excessive force by Fort Lauderdale police.

On Oct. 31, Officer Jonathan Welker opened fire on a 17-year-old teen who had been reported missing by his family. The teen, Joshua Mendelson was bleeding and carrying a stick when he started to approach Welker.

His family says they are still waiting to find out what happened to the young man.

Their attorney, Larry Davis, sent a letter to Gov. Jeb Bush Nov. 8 asking that the Florida Department of Law Enforcement be appointed to investigate the shooting.

The governor's office is still reviewing the request, said spokesman Anthony DeLuise.

Investigators Look For Mystery Witness In Fatal New York Police Shooting (FINDLAW/AP)

By Tom Hays, Associated Press Writer

AP, December 1, 2006

(AP) - NEW YORK-The search for a key missing witness in the police killing of an unarmed black man who died in a hail of 50 bullets intensified with the arrest of four people who have provided clues about the witness' identity, a law enforcement official said.

At a news conference Thursday, police Commissioner Raymond Kelly said the Wednesday raid that led to the arrests was related to the shooting investigation. He refused to elaborate.

Another law enforcement official later told The Associated Press that the arrests of three men and one woman on gun charges had produced information about the identity of an important witness to the shooting. That witness was possibly with the three victims on Saturday when officers fired 50 shots at their car, somehow escaped and disappeared.

A lawyer for the victims denied that such a person exists. An attorney for five others at the bachelor party also said there was no fourth person in the car.

The shooting killed 23-year-old Sean Bell on his wedding day and wounded two of his companions, setting off a storm of outrage in New York, especially in the black community. The three victims are black, and the police officers included two blacks, two whites and one Hispanic.

Officers armed with a search warrant raided the Queens apartment, a known drug-dealing location, based on a tip that "persons of interest" lived there, said the official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because the investigation was still under way. It was unclear if a loaded semiautomatic pistol recovered inside the home had any connection to last week's incident, the official added.

An unnamed undercover shooter and four others - identified as detectives Mike Oliver, Mark Cooper and Paul Hedley and Officer Mike Carey - have been placed on paid administrative leave while the Queens district attorney's office conducts a grand jury investigation that could result in criminal charges.

The intensity of the search for the mysterious fourth man reflected its potential impact on a case rife with conflicting accounts and unanswered questions about why the five officers unleashed the barrage of bullets.

An undercover officer has told investigators that another missing witness - a man dressed in black and standing in from of a sport utility vehicle - argued with Bell and his companions as they exited the club where Bell was having a bachelor party. The officer was part of a vice team investigating complaints about prostitution and drug dealing at the club.

Outside the club, the man in black reached into his pocket as if he had a weapon as Bell challenged him to a fight and one of the groom's friends said, "Yo, get my gun," two law enforcement officials said, citing the undercover officer's account.

Officials said the exchange prompted a second undercover detective to follow Bell and three other men as they walked away toward their car, apparently suspecting the men meant to arm themselves and attack the man in black.

Moments later, the second undercover officer started shooting at the car when Bell, while trying to drive away, bumped him and smashed into an unmarked police van.

Through his lawyer, the detective has insisted that he clearly identified himself as a police officer as he tried to stop them. He also has said he spotted Joseph Guzman, then sitting in the passenger seat, make a sudden move for his waistband before he and four other officers opened fire.

Police union officials have suggested that a fourth man could have fled with the gun - a scenario investigators haven't ruled out.

"The existence of a fourth person is important to this investigation," Kelly said.

Meanwhile, the hospitalized survivors, Guzman and Trent Benefield, still insist there was never a fourth person involved, their lawyer said Thursday.

"There were three people in the car - period," said the attorney, Sanford Rubenstein. "The claim of a fourth person is a myth."

Charlie King, who is representing five other members of the bachelor party, cited Kelly's statement that eight men were outside the club just before the shooting.

"Clearly there's not a fourth person in the car," he said. "There were five outside of the car and two men who were injured in the car and Bell, who was killed."

King said the group, which was unarmed, argued with a man outside the club shortly before the shooting.

"But they told me the man they were arguing with was the one the undercover officer thought had a gun, and they (police) just let that guy drive off," he said.

King said his clients were afraid of being harassed by police. He said one was taken into custody for an hour Thursday before being released. Two have been identified as Lorenzo Kinred and Jean Nelson, but the other three were not revealing their names out of fear, he said.

At the police news conference, Kelly announced the formation of a new committee to "review the policies and procedures governing the activities of undercover officers throughout the New York Police Department." Aside from NYPD brass, the committee will include Cedric Alexander, a former police chief in Rochester, New York, and now an official for the state Division of Criminal Justice Services.

Bell's funeral was scheduled for Friday at the church where he was to be married.

Security Of Electronic Voting Is Condemned (WP)

By Cameron W. Barr

The Washington Post, December 1, 2006

Paperless electronic voting machines used throughout the Washington region and much of the country "cannot be made secure," according to draft recommendations issued this week by a federal agency that advises the U.S. Election Assistance Commission.

DOJ_NMG_0100310

The assessment by the National Institute of Standards and Technology, one of the government's premier research centers, is the most sweeping condemnation of such voting systems by a federal agency.

In a report hailed by critics of electronic voting, NIST said that voting systems should allow election officials to recount ballots independently from a voting machine's software. The recommendations endorse "optical-scan" systems in which voters mark paper ballots that are read by a computer and electronic systems that print a paper summary of each ballot, which voters review and elections officials save for recounts.

Voters in Maryland cast ballots on electronic machines that produce no paper record of each vote; in the District and Loudoun County, voters can choose between using such machines and optical-scan systems. Other Northern Virginia jurisdictions, and many counties across the state, use electronic voting systems exclusively.

NIST's recommendations are to be debated next week before the Technical Guidelines Development Committee, charged by Congress to develop standards for voting systems. To become effective, NIST's recommendations must then be adopted by the Election Assistance Commission, which was created by Congress to promote changes in election systems after the 2000 debacle in Florida.

If the commission agrees with NIST, the practical impact may not be felt until 2009 or 2010, the soonest that new standards would be implemented. The standards that the Election Assistance Commission will adopt are voluntary, but most states require election officials to deploy voting systems that meet national or federal criteria.

State election officials in Maryland and Virginia declined to comment yesterday on the NIST report, which they were reviewing.

Alice P. Miller, executive director of the District's Board of Elections and Ethics, said through a spokesman that she would not comment because she is a member of the Technical Guidelines Development Committee.

NIST says in its report that the lack of a paper trail for each vote "is one of the main reasons behind continued questions about voting system security and diminished public confidence in elections." The report repeats the contention of the computer security community that "a single programmer could 'rig' a major election."

Fears about rigging have animated critics for years, but there has been no conclusive evidence that such fraud has occurred. Electronic voting systems have had technical problems -- including unpredictable screen freezes -- leaving voters wondering whether their ballots were properly recorded.

Computer scientists and others have said that the security of electronic voting systems cannot be guaranteed and that election officials should adopt systems that produce a paper record of each vote in case of a recount. The NIST report embraces that critique, introducing the concept of "software independence" in voting systems.

NIST says that voting systems should not rely on a machine's software to provide a record of the votes cast. Some electronic voting system manufacturers have introduced models that include printers to produce a separate record of each vote -- and that can be verified by a voter before leaving the machine -- but such paper trails have had their own problems.

Printers have jammed or otherwise failed, causing some election directors to question whether a paper trail is an improvement. Maryland state elections administrator Linda Lamone, in an undated video snippet that her critics have circulated on the Internet, says that voter verification is unnecessary. "I'm not going to put this paper on my machines -- it'll be over my dead body, because I just don't think it works. It really is a false sense of security," she said.

For critics of paperless electronic voting, the report is vindication. "I think I got it right," said Aviel Rubin, a Johns Hopkins University computer scientist who has long questioned the security and reliability of some electronic voting systems.

Linda Schade, a founder of TrueVoteMD, which has pressed for a system that provides a verifiable paper record of each vote, said, "These strong statements from a credible institution such as NIST add yet another voice to the consensus that paper electronic voting as used in states like MD is not secure. We hope that the [Election Assistance Commission] formally adopts these improved standards."

Even critics of paperless electronic voting have grown disenchanted with the practical problems of adding printers to electronic "touch-screen" voting machines.

"Why are we doing this at all? is the question people are asking," said Warren Stewart, policy director of VoteTrustUSA, a group critical of electronic voting systems. "We have a perfectly good system -- the paper-ballot optical-scan system."

State Set Later Date For District 23 Runoff (HC/AP)

By Suzanne Gamboa, Associated Press

Houston Chronicle, December 1, 2006

WASHINGTON — Gov. Rick Perry set the election to replace a deceased state lawmaker a week later than he scheduled a congressional runoff election, a Latino group objecting to the earlier voting day said in a document filed with the Justice Department.

The League of United Latin American Citizens is objecting to the Dec. 12 date set for voters in District 23 to decide whether to pick Republican Rep. Henry Bonilla or Democrat Ciro Rodriguez as their U.S. House representative.

Perry and Secretary of State Roger Williams set Dec. 19 for a special election to replace Republican state Rep. Glenda Dawson. Orders for the two elections were submitted the same day.

Scott Haywood, Williams' spokesman, said the special election to replace Dawson was set at the earliest possible date it could be set under the Texas election code. "Because there are different types of elections, different sets of laws would apply to fill a vacancy," he said.

LULAC has objected to the date for the District 23 runoff because it falls on the Feast of the Virgin of Guadalupe, a religious holy day celebrated by many Catholic Hispanics by attending Mass, holding processions and family gatherings and other events. The district that stretches from near El Paso to South Texas and takes in several counties on the border has a 61 percent Hispanic voting age population.

"The state representative district is predominantly white-Anglo population and would not be affected by 'El dia de la Virgen de Guadalupe'," LULAC national attorney Luis Vera Jr. said in the DOJ filing, using the Spanish translation of the Day of the Virgin of Guadalupe.

The 23rd district's voters are "adversely affected by setting it on the holiest of religious holidays. There can possibly be no other reason for the different dates than an attempt to suppress the Latino vote."

Vera also contends the state could have set the District 23 on a Saturday and that it did not have to be on a Tuesday.

Bonilla faced seven challengers in the Nov. 7 election after the race was thrown open when the Supreme Court ordered the district redrawn. The district had been altered in 2003 in a way diluted Latino voting strength and violated the Voting Rights Act, the high court ruled.

Bonilla won 49 percent of the vote and Rodriguez drew 20 percent, sending them to a runoff. Vera is serving as treasurer for Rodriguez's runoff campaign.

Because Texas has a history of discriminating against minority voters, it is required to seek approval of election changes and decisions from the Department of Justice. Vera is asking DOJ not to approve the runoff date unless the state extends early voting to include a Saturday or Sunday and the election date is not on a holy day and a day that provides adequate time for all voters to be notified of the election.

Same-sex 'Marriage' Heads To High Court (WT)

By Jon Ward

The Washington Times, December 1, 2006

Maryland's highest court is scheduled to hear arguments Monday on the same-sex "marriage" issue.

The case before the Maryland Court of Appeals comes from a lower court ruling in January in which a judge decided a 1973 statute defining marriage as between a man and woman violated the state constitution.

The ruling by Baltimore Circuit Judge M. Brooke Murdock was stayed until the appeals court could hear the case.

"The momentum is definitely on the side of preserving marriage," said Glen Lavy, an attorney with the Alliance Defense Fund, a national Christian legal organization involved in the case.

Same-sex "marriage" advocates acknowledge the overwhelming majority of voters and state courts are defining marriage as a union of one man and one woman, but say time is on their side.

DOJ_NMG_0100312

"It took 13 state supreme courts to reject the idea that interracial marriage bans were unconstitutional before the California Supreme Court struck down the ban," said Dan Furmansky, executive director of Equality Maryland, a homosexual lobbying group in Annapolis. "Then it took 20 years before the United States Supreme Court struck them all down.

"We wouldn't be bringing this case if we didn't feel it was a matter of basic fairness," he said.

Winning the original suit, brought in 2004 by nine homosexual couples and one single homosexual, will be challenging because it seeks to change the law.

"People intuitively know that marriage is the union of a man and a woman and, despite preferences that some judges may have, unless they are completely willing to thumb their nose at the law, there is no question that marriage currently is between a man and a woman," Mr. Lavy said.

He also said Maryland residents should decide in a referendum vote the definition of marriage.

Voters in 27 states, including seven in the most recent election, voted to define marriage as between a man and a woman. In November, Arizona became the first state in which residents voted against a same-sex "marriage" ban.

In July, five state courts and one federal court issued rulings that upheld traditional marriage laws similar to those in Maryland.

To date, the only state to legalize same-sex "marriage" is Massachusetts. After Maryland, pending right-to-"marry" lawsuits remain in California, Connecticut and Iowa.

The Maryland Attorney General's Office will defend the state in the oral arguments.

In a court brief filed last week, the office defended Maryland's law defining marriage as a union between a man and a woman, but indicated an openness to legislation that would pave the way for the legislation of the same-sex "marriage." The court also should defer to the Maryland General Assembly "where competing policies and their complexities could be balanced," the brief also stated. However, the office has decline to discuss the case before the arguments.

Kenneth Y. Choe, one of the plaintiffs' attorneys and with the American Civil Liberties Union, said he will appeal to three provisions of state law, but primarily he will point to the state's equal rights amendment.

"We are emphasizing that the exclusion of same-sex couples from marriage is a great unfairness to families headed by gay and lesbian couples, and that unfairness is not tolerated by the Maryland constitution," he said.

Conservative Rabbis Reconsider Stance On Gay Sex (WP)

By Alan Cooperman

The Washington Post, December 1, 2006

After years of debate, the Conservative Jewish movement is on the verge of redefining its approach to homosexuality, a pivotal decision for a movement that occupies a shrinking middle ground between Orthodox and Reform Judaism.

A panel of 25 eminent Conservative rabbis will meet in New York next week to consider five proposed teshuvot, or answers, to the question of whether homosexual sex is permitted under Jewish law.

Although the answers have not been made public, Conservative leaders said that two defend the traditional position that Leviticus 18:22 -- "Do not lie with a man as one lies with a woman; it is an abomination" -- prohibits homosexuality between men and, by extension, between women.

The other three proposals offer various arguments for reinterpreting that prohibition. On a practical level, they could open the way for Conservative rabbis to perform same-sex commitment ceremonies and for Conservative seminaries to ordain openly gay rabbis.

"I think the committee is deeply divided -- like the rest of society is divided, like our movement is divided," said Rabbi Joel H. Meyers, executive vice president of the Rabbinical Assembly, the main association of Conservative rabbis. "But the tension has grown to the point that the committee is hard-pressed to give some clear guidance to the movement."

Clarity, however, may not be forthcoming. Rabbi Avis D. Miller of Washington's Congregation Adas Israel said the "rabbinical scuttlebutt" is that the panel -- the Committee on Jewish Law and Standards -- will approve two conflicting answers, one upholding the status quo and one calling for change.

That is possible because it takes the votes of just six of the panel's 25 members to declare an answer to be valid -- meaning that it is a well-founded interpretation of Jewish law, not that it is the only legitimate interpretation. It would be possible to approve all the answers, or none of them.

If two or more contradictory answers are accepted, "that will be the strongest statement for America, because everything in America spiritually and religiously seems to have become political, and the way you know it's political is that it's either 'yes' or 'no,' " said Irwin Kula, a Conservative rabbi who heads the New York-based National Jewish Center for Learning and Leadership.

"In a genuine spiritual tradition, 'yes' and 'no' are both living options. . . . Both sides are right, and we're not used to that, because in a political reality, only one side can be right," he said.

Moreover, whatever decision the committee reaches will be advisory. Miller noted that in the Conservative movement, each rabbi is the ultimate arbiter of Jewish law in his or her synagogue, and each "will be able to choose the opinion of the law committee that he or she agrees with." She predicted that some will perform same-sex ceremonies, allow same-sex couples to hold family memberships, and give same-sex couples the honor of an aliyah, or call to the altar, -- and some will not.

Still, the decision is important for the future of Conservative Judaism, because it could return the movement "to an older, 'big tent' model," said Jonathan Sarna, a professor of American Jewish history at Brandeis University.

"What I think is likely to happen is, there will be multiple options, rather than a single option," he said. "Both sides will be unsatisfied. One will say, 'You didn't give full acceptance.' The other will say, 'You accepted something that violates the Torah.' "

But, Sarna continued, the Conservative "movement as a whole will be able to say that it is in the center and, more important, that there is more than one way to be a Jew, more than one way to interpret Jewish law. . . . The Democratic Party did pretty well with that big-tent strategy in this past election, and my sense is there is a lesson there for a centrist movement that is struggling to appeal to younger people."

Pamela S. Nadell, director of Jewish Studies at American University and author of "Conservative Judaism in America," said the Conservative movement, which has about 2 million members worldwide, was the largest branch of Judaism in the United States from the 1950s to the 1980s. It shrank dramatically from 1990 to 2001 as its membership fell from 47 percent of Jewish adults who belong to synagogues to 33 percent.

Nadell blamed the shrinkage partly on defections to the Orthodox and Reform branches of Judaism. In addition, she said, the Conservative membership is aging, the Orthodox have a much higher birthrate, and the Reform movement's more welcoming approach to intermarriage has appealed to young families.

Nadell predicted that if the movement liberalizes its position on homosexuality, a few rabbis and congregations will leave, just as some did when Conservative seminaries began ordaining women in 1985. But she said she doubts that the changes will either fracture the movement or, as some hope, reenergize it.

"I just don't think the movement's problems, truthfully, are related to homosexuality," she said.

AMD Gets Subpoena In Graphics Chip Probe (AP)

AP, December 1, 2006

AMD Receives DOJ Subpoena in Graphics Chip Business Antitrust Probe

SAN FRANCISCO (AP) -- Advanced Micro Devices Inc. said late Thursday that it had received a subpoena from the Justice Department regarding an investigation into possible antitrust violations in the graphics processors and cards business.

Sunnyvale-based AMD, the world's No. 2 maker of the microprocessors that act as the core calculating engines of computers, entered the graphics chip market earlier this year with the $5.4 billion acquisition of ATI Technologies Inc.

The move was seen as a strategic blow to AMD's larger rival, Intel Corp., and one that would allow AMD to broaden its product portfolio and shed its image as a boutique player that sells only microprocessors and flash memory chips. The deal was completed in October.

AMD said that the Justice Department has not made any specific allegations against AMD or ATI, and that the company intends to cooperate with the investigation. An AMD spokesman declined to comment beyond the press release.

DOJ_NMG_0100314

The scope of the Justice Department investigation was unclear. A call to a spokesman for Santa Clara-based Nvidia Corp., the other dominant maker of graphics chips, was not immediately returned.

Shares of AMD closed up 16 cents at $21.57 on Thursday on the New York Stock Exchange before the news was announced. AMD shares declined by a penny in after-hours trading.

Advanced Micro Gets U.S. Subpoena On Graphics Chips (Update2) (BLOOM)

By Vivek Shankar

Bloomberg, December 1, 2006

Nov. 30 (Bloomberg) -- Advanced Micro Devices Inc. said it received a U.S. antitrust subpoena over graphics processors and cards, a market it entered last month with the $5.4 billion acquisition of ATI Technologies Inc.

The Justice Department hasn't made any specific allegations against Advanced Micro or ATI, Sunnyvale, California-based Advanced Micro said today in a statement sent by Business Wire. It plans to cooperate with the investigation.

The acquisition of ATI, the largest maker of computer graphics chips for notebook computers, was Advanced Micro's biggest ever. The deal leaves Advanced Micro and ATI rival Nvidia Corp. dominant in the graphics-chip business, Global Crown Capital analyst David Wu said.

``The two duopolies are AMD and Nvidia," San Francisco- based Wu said. The probe will benefit lawyers, and not stockholders or taxpayers, he said.

The Justice Department may subpoena Nvidia also if it is investigating the larger graphics market, Wu said. He said he covers Nvidia and Intel Corp., the world's largest maker of semiconductors, and owns Intel shares.

Calls after business hours to the offices of Advanced Micro spokesman Drew Prairie and Santa Clara, California-based Nvidia spokeswoman Calisa Cole weren't immediately returned.

With the acquisition, Advanced Micro is seeking to win orders from makers of business laptop computers who currently rely on larger rival Intel's Centrino product. Advanced Micro shares, down 30 percent this year, rose 16 cents to $21.57 in New York Stock Exchange composite trading today.

Judge's Stance On Past Deals May Affect Current At&T Plan (MRKTWTCH)

By Corey Boles

Market Watch, December 1, 2006

WASHINGTON (MarketWatch) -- A judge presiding over a technical hearing into a previous round of telecommunications mergers Thursday took a tough stance that could have ramifications for another deal, the proposed takeover of BellSouth Corp. (BLS) by AT&T Inc. (T).

The oral hearing evaluated the conditions attached by the Justice Department to the mergers between Verizon Communications (VZ) and MCI and between SBC Communications' and AT&T. Judge Emmett Sullivan seemed to indicate he could try to toughen conditions, and this stance could embolden the FCC to ask for more conditions in the proposed AT&T-BellSouth merger, analysts said.

Sullivan asked Claude Scott, a lawyer for the Department of Justice, whether the current proposed merger should enter his thinking when pondering the case of the previous mergers. Scott responded that the two matters are entirely separate.

The hearing's purpose was to evaluate the conditions agreed to by the Justice Department's antitrust unit and the two companies formed by the separate mergers, AT&T and Verizon.

As part of the decree, the companies agreed they would sell part or all of the "black fiber" controlled in commercial properties in more than 700 buildings across the U.S. That would allow smaller competitors access to the business clients within the buildings. Both companies say they have buyers lined up for the fiber.

Sullivan also appeared to somewhat angrily reject the argument put forward by John Thorne, an attorney for Verizon, that the deals had already closed and the hearing should deal only with a minor part of a much larger matter.

"I may not be required to do anyone else's work, but I will do an independent evaluation of the materials. I can assure you of that, and we will see where the merger stands at that point," said Sullivan.

DOJ_NMG_0100315

Thorne had pointed out that, for all practical purposes, the mergers had closed. The name of the sports arena in Washington D.C., for instance, has already been changed to Verizon Center from MCI Center.

Sullivan gave little indication Thursday as to how he would ultimately rule.

Opponents of the agreement were also present at the hearing. These include lobbyist groups representing smaller companies in the telecommunications industry, Sprint Nextel Corp. (S), the New York Attorney General's Office and consumer advocates.

Arguing on behalf of these parties, antitrust lawyer Gary Repack said that the decrees reached between the Justice Department and the companies would not protect business customers and in fact would lessen competition.

Sullivan asked Repack and Chris Wright, representing Sprint, whether he should, rather than rejecting the agreement, ask for more evidence from the government as to how it came to make up its mind.

Both disagreed, urging the judge to strike down the decrees instead.

The hearing has more to deal with the job done by the Justice Department in evaluating the deals than it does the mergers themselves. There is no longer an SBC Communications or MCI, and no one involved in the case has suggested that the deals could ultimately be undone.

But the outcome of the case could potentially have an impact on the current AT&T-BellSouth merger, say analysts.

"If the judge comes out and really criticizes the last round of mergers, it could give Federal Communications Commission Democrats more ammunition to demand conditions in the current AT&T merger," said David Kaut, a telecom analyst with investment bank Stifel Nicolaus.

That merger is being held up by the two Democratic commissioners on the FCC who are attempting to extract more in the way of concessions from AT&T before they approve the deal.

The Justice Department has already approved the AT&T-BellSouth deal with no conditions whatsoever.

No 'rubber Stamp' On Telecom Mergers, Judge Says (CNET)

By Anne Broache, CNET News.com

CNET News, December 1, 2006

WASHINGTON--A federal judge on Thursday continued to press the Department of Justice to explain why he should approve twin mergers involving some of the nation's largest telephone companies, but did not say when he will make a final decision.

Emmet Sullivan of the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia warned multiple times that he has no intention of "rubber-stamping" the mergers--proposed between AT&T-SBC Communications and Verizon-MCI--and plans to issue an opinion only after an "independent review" of the materials presented to him.

"Don't I have to scrutinize that merger to determine if it's in the public interest?" Sullivan asked at the outset of an afternoon hearing here that lasted more than two hours.

The pair of deals got the green light more than a year ago from the Federal Communications Commission and the DOJ's antitrust division, which collectively imposed only minor conditions aimed at alleviating competition concerns.

Both AT&T and Verizon have since closed the books on their respective acquisitions, which prompted Sullivan to remark Thursday with some measure of disdain: "It's a done deal. The MCI Center became the Verizon Center, and everyone goes on their own way." (He was referring to the Washington D.C.'s downtown sports and entertainment complex.)

Some observers say Sullivan's actions could also affect the outcome of another megamerger, between AT&T and BellSouth, which won unconditional approval from the Justice Department this fall. The FCC has repeatedly postponed a decision on that deal because of reported disagreements over what restrictions to impose.

Sullivan has maintained that it's his duty to give the deals a thorough look. A 1974 federal antitrust law called the Tunney Act calls for the courts to vet agreements negotiated between the Justice Department and the companies involved to ensure the deals satisfy the "public interest." During the infamous Microsoft antitrust trial, a federal judge invoked the Tunney Act to alter the settlement agreement in that case before approving it. In 2004, Congress rewrote the law to make court review more a requirement than a voluntary undertaking.

When the telecommunications giants and the government appeared before the judge in July, Sullivan scolded the Justice Department for allegedly failing to present enough facts. He said he would not be able to sign off on the mergers until he received more information about the deals' potential impact on the public.

He said Thursday that "it remains to be seen whether the record is complete yet" and questioned whether the government was withholding "significant documents." Justice Department attorney Claude Scott replied that the government had submitted to the court a "fair representation" of the thousands of documents and interviews they had gathered while vetting the deals.

Attorneys for the government and the telephone companies continued to assert that the deals would not stifle competition or harm consumers. The merger agreements had already been modified in an attempt to ensure the companies' competitors could gain access to fiber optic connections in certain commercial buildings where Verizon and MCI or AT&T and SBC had been the only two companies supplying "last-mile" connections, leaving no immediate competition after the merger.

"As we indicated before, the violation is addressed 100 percent," Wilma Lewis, an attorney for AT&T, told the judge.

Such claims by the government and the telephone companies have drawn an outcry from a number of outsiders, including the Alliance for Competition in Telecommunications, a group led by Silicon Valley attorney Gary Reback, who played a major role in convincing the Clinton Justice Department to pursue an antitrust case against Microsoft; Comptel, a trade organization representing Bell competitors; and New York State Attorney General Eliot Spitzer.

In a lengthy slide show, an animated Reback accused the government of lying about or withholding important information about the competitive impact of the mergers. He criticized antitrust authorities for focusing only on situations in which the number of competitors was reduced from two companies to one and questioned why reductions from three companies to two or four companies to three, for instance, weren't equally worrisome.

"The government can't just make up facts," he said.

The Justice Department's Scott disputed the picture painted by Reback, saying Reback had skewed the analysis by "taking snippets of information ands pieces of data out of context."

Sullivan again raised the possibility of holding an evidentiary hearing on the matter but seemed to be leaning against that option. He said he didn't believe it was Congress's intent to have a court "duplicate" what the Justice Department has vowed was a painstaking analysis. "I can't draft my own complaint," he added.

But a particularly testy exchange with Verizon deputy general counsel John Thorne indicated that Sullivan may not go easy on the dealmakers. When Thorne suggested that the merger was closed and already pleasing Verizon's business customers, Sullivan shot back with, "If the merger is closed, why are we here then?"

"You say it's a done deal, a fait accompli," he went on. "The merger's not finished, either. The merger has not been approved by this court."

Rinker Says U.S. Regulators Want Details On Cemex Bid (Update1) (BLOOM)

By Miriam Steffens

Bloomberg, December 1, 2006

Dec. 1 (Bloomberg) -- Rinker Group Ltd., Australia's biggest building materials maker, said U.S. antitrust regulators have asked for more details on Cemex SA's hostile $11.7 billion takeover bid for the company.

``Rinker received a request for additional information'' yesterday, the Sydney-based company said in a statement to the Australian Stock Exchange today. Monterrey, Mexico-based Cemex will also have to provide more details before it gets a ruling on the deal, according to the statement.

Cemex wants to buy the Australian company for its business in the U.S., which accounts for more than 80 percent of earnings. The deal would make the Mexican company the world's biggest cement maker. Rinker is focused on Florida, Arizona and Nevada, which the census bureau forecasts will be the fastest-growing U.S. states.

The U.S. Department of Justice request will extend the bidding process. It also indicates Cemex may have to sell some assets in Arizona and Florida, where both companies have strong market positions, to gain approval for its plans, according to Andrew Dale, an analyst at Macquarie Bank Ltd. in Sydney. He has a `neutral' rating on Rinker.

DOJ_NMG_0100317

Shares of Rinker closed 10 cents lower at A$18.55 at the 4:10 p.m. close in Sydney. The stock has surged 34 percent since Cemex on Oct. 26 offered to buy the company for $13 a share, which equates to A$16.46 at today's currency exchange rate. Rinker yesterday rejected the offer as ``opportunistic and far too low."

Previous Intervention

The Federal Trade Commission and the Department of Justice ask for additional information ``only when there is a strong likelihood that some part of a transaction would violate the antitrust laws," Dale wrote in a note to clients. The regulators have passed about 95 percent of all merger proposals in the past five years without further requests, he said.

The regulators intervened in Cemex's takeover of Britain's RMC Group Plc for 2.3 billion pounds ($4.5 billion) last year, allowing the purchase on condition it sold RMC's ready-mix concrete operations in Tucson, Arizona, within six months to preserve competition.

The delay may help Rinker in its quest to find alternatives to the hostile offer. The company may seek a tie-up with Hanson Plc of the U.K. to thwart the bid, according to Simon Thackray, an analyst at ABN Amro Holding NV in Sydney.

Cemex, the world's third-largest cement maker, could pay as much as A$19.50 before the deal eroded profit gains and returns on capital employed, Macquarie's Dale said in his note. The company could reach $380 million in three years through cost savings and gains from selling Rinker land holdings, beating its target of $130 million, he said.

`May Walk Away'

``The decision to acquire Rinker is a large one and Cemex may walk away if it feels it cannot derive the best value," Dale said. ``Another buyer for Rinker is unlikely to emerge. Tension in the bidding process is low."

Hector Medina, executive vice president of planning and finance at Cemex, will travel to Sydney next week to talk to Rinker investors. The company will ask its own shareholders to approve the deal at a meeting Dec. 7.

The bid would be the biggest takeover of an Australian company, and cap a record year of acquisitions in the country. Proposed takeovers have soared to $164 billion in 2006, from $111 billion last year, according to data compiled by Bloomberg.

Cemex is advised by Citigroup Inc. Rinker has hired UBS AG to help it on its defense.

Senator Has Questions For NASD (NYT)

By Gretchen Morgenson

The New York Times, December 1, 2006

Charles E. Grassley, the Iowa Republican and departing chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, has asked NASD, the securities industry's largest self-regulatory organization, to describe in detail how it identifies and tracks possible insider trading among its members.

Mr. Grassley's staff is investigating the Securities and Exchange Commission's handling of an insider-trading case involving a prominent hedge fund. The questions being asked of NASD indicate that Congressional scrutiny of the nation's market regulators is growing.

Insider trading appears to be a growing problem for regulators. In August, The New York Times reported that an analysis of the nation's biggest mergers during the last year found abnormal trading in the securities of 41 percent of the companies in the days and weeks before the deals became public. Those buying shares during these periods of unusual trading generated gains of as much as 40 percent.

"This oversight effort is about making sure the watchdogs are getting the job done," Mr. Grassley said in a statement. "It's about maintaining public confidence in the system by making sure the average Joe investor is on equal footing with big shots on Wall Street."

Mr. Grassley sent his request to Mary L. Schapiro, the chairwoman and chief executive of NASD, in a letter on Tuesday — the same day that NASD announced that it was merging its oversight operations with those of the New York Stock Exchange.

He asked that NASD respond to his questions about its regulatory approach by Dec. 18.

The letter from the senator parallels his September request that the Government Accountability Office investigate how the S.E.C. polices the financial markets and pursues insider-trading cases. The G.A.O. agreed last month to conduct a broad review of S.E.C. enforcement practices and those of its office of compliance, inspection and examination, which oversees money managers.

The G.A.O. has until June 2007 to issue the report.

Mr. Grassley asked NASD to describe its market surveillance tools, its sampling methods for capturing unusual trading around a market-moving event like a merger, its approach to repeat offenders and how it ensures that it "casts a wide net during market surveillance and oversight."

NASD was also asked to describe the types of enforcement actions it takes, the frequency of such actions and the degree to which the organization's enforcement efforts are overruled by the S.E.C.

Under its proposed merger with the New York Stock Exchange regulators, NASD will oversee securities firms, arbitration and the licensing of brokers, while the exchange's regulators will conduct market surveillance and compliance for companies whose shares trade on the exchange. Both the S.E.C. and the NASD's membership must approve the deal; if they do, Ms. Schapiro will become chief executive of the combined entity.

A spokeswoman for Ms. Schapiro said she declined to comment.

Others in Congress are also interested in the apparent increase in insider trading. The Senate Judiciary Committee, overseen by Arlen Specter, a Pennsylvania Republican, until Congress changes hands next year, is expected to hold a hearing on Tuesday on the oversight of insider trading.

Mr. Specter convened a hearing on the subject in September, at which a New York Stock Exchange official said that there was a significant increase in the number of insider-trading referrals submitted by the exchange to the S.E.C. in the last two years.

The request for information from the NASD comes amid an inquiry by Mr. Grassley's staff and the Senate Judiciary Committee into the S.E.C.'s handling of an insider-trading investigation involving Pequot Capital Management, a $7 billion hedge fund run by Arthur J. Samberg. That investigation, which began in 2004, centered on a number of profitable trades Pequot made in advance of mergers or other market-moving news.

The Pequot inquiry was overseen by Gary J. Aguirre, a former staff lawyer at the S.E.C., who has told the Senate that his superiors blocked him from interviewing John J. Mack, an influential Wall Street executive and a friend of Mr. Samberg. Mr. Mack now heads Morgan Stanley.

Last summer, the S.E.C. took Mr. Mack's testimony in the case. In October, it advised Mr. Samberg and Mr. Mack that it would not recommend any enforcement actions against them and closed the Pequot investigation. Mr. Samberg and Mr. Mack have repeatedly denied any improper conduct.

S.E.C. officials had argued that Mr. Aguirre could not demonstrate that Mr. Mack had inside information and was therefore not justified in taking his testimony as part of the investigation.

Mr. Aguirre, who said he was simply interested in getting information from Mr. Mack, protested the decision and was fired in September 2005, a year after he was hired.

In addition to questions relating to NASD's market surveillance techniques, Mr. Grassley asked NASD to describe its procedures for preventing brokerage firms from retaliating against analysts, brokers or other employees, and protections that exist for whistle-blowers at NASD member firms or the regulator itself.

How NASD manages its extensive broker disciplinary records is another topic of interest to Mr. Grassley. He asked NASD what procedures it had to ensure that the public information it provided was accurate and asked what efforts NASD had made to upgrade this program.

"Is the NASD of the opinion that it is the sole party entitled to deliver such information to the investing public?" Mr. Grassley asked.

Michigan MLS Agrees To Settle Antitrust Complaint (INMAN)

By Glenn Roberts Jr., Inman News

Inman News, December 1, 2006

FTC will consider proposed agreement with MiRealSource

DOJ_NMG_0100319

MiRealSource, a broker-owned multiple listing service in Michigan, has agreed to settle a Federal Trade Commission complaint that challenged MLS rules the agency claimed violate antitrust laws.

The FTC last month announced settlement agreements with five MLSs and complaints against two other MLSs related to MLS policies that blocked some property listings from reaching some public property-search Web sites, such as Realtor.com and MLS-operated sites. On Monday the FTC posted a notice stating that the complaint against MiRealSource was withdrawn to allow the commission to consider a proposed settlement agreement with that MLS.

Members of the FTC will consider whether to approve the proposed agreement.

Virginia Blatt, CEO for MiRealSource, which formed in 1966 and has about 7,000 members, said Wednesday that the MLS board voted to approve the consent agreement and MLS managers will "make some modification to our rules as a result of it. We think it will work out in a positive." The MLS must implement new rules within 45 days of the FTC's final approval of the consent agreement. Blatt said that the MLS did incur some costs in seeking legal assistance related to the complaint.

She added, "There is no point in spending a significant amount of resources, time and energy to litigate with the FTC. We'd rather spend our energies ... in service to our members." The MLS board had several meetings to discuss the FTC matter, she said. "They gave it a lot of thought, and concluded that resolving the dispute is in the best interests of our members."

And in a statement Wednesday, MiRealSource officials said, "Finally, and perhaps most importantly, MiRealSource recognized that sweeping changes in the real estate industry, fueled in large part by the widespread use of the Internet and consumer expectations of access to information that the Internet provides, meant that its rules would have to evolve, regardless of the outcome of its dispute with the FTC."

In its 13-page complaint against MiRealSource, the FTC stated that the MLS "adopted rules and policies that limit the acceptance, publication and marketing of certain properties, based on the terms of the listing contract entered into between a real estate broker and the customer who wishes to sell a property." The FTC charged that these rules violate federal antitrust laws.

The complaint focuses on rules that blocked a type of property listing from the MLS in which homeowners had entered into "exclusive agency" contracts with MLS members, and also on a rule that required brokers to offer a specific set of services in order for the MLS to accept property listings submitted by them.

Under an exclusive agency agreement, property owners have the right to sell a property on their own and are not required to pay the broker if they directly locate a buyer for the property. The MLSs did not place similar restrictions on the more popularly used "exclusive right to sell" agreement, under which sellers must pay the broker a commission when the property is sold.

These rules were particularly restrictive compared to other MLS rules that the FTC investigated -- many of the other MLSs accepted limited-service and exclusive agency listings but had rules that blocked exclusive agency listings from being distributed to certain public Web sites. Several MLSs that adopted exclusive agency restrictions have said that they did not wish to publicize property listings in which houses could be sold directly by the owner, without the benefit of compensation for its members.

The FTC complaint stated that MiRealSource passed a rule in August 2003 that blocked the MLS from accepting any listings other than exclusive right to sell listings, and that year the MLS adopted a "Co-Mingling Policy" that prevented MLS members operating home-search Web sites from combining MLS listings with listings from other sources. Also, the MLS adopted a rule in 2004 "specifying the minimum set of real estate brokerage services that a listing broker was required to offer in order to have a listing on the MiRealSource MLS," the FTC charged.

Exclusive agency listings "are a means by which listing brokers can offer lower-cost, unbundled real estate brokerage services to home sellers," the FTC said in the complaint, and limited or "unbundled" real estate services "are lawful arrangements."

Patrick Roach, deputy assistant director for the FTC's Bureau of Competition, said that there will be a 30-day public comment period if the commission approves the consent agreement. The proposed consent agreement has not yet been placed on the public record.

The FTC is proceeding in its complaint against RealComp II Ltd., a corporation owned by several Realtor boards and associations in Michigan that has about 14,800 members.

EU Says Energy Suppliers, Grids Are Still Colluding (Update1) (BLOOM)

By Adam Mitchell

Bloomberg, December 1, 2006

Nov. 30 (Bloomberg) -- The European Union official heading an antitrust inquiry into the energy market said a requirement for energy suppliers and distribution grids to become separate legal entities has failed to open up the industry.

A report by the European Commission, the EU's executive body, will be released on Jan. 10. The body plans to use it as a basis for improving the rules that govern the energy market and to take legal action against companies.

``Legal unbundling has not prevented systematic communication between network and supply branches'' of companies, said Lars Kjoelbye, head of the team that has been working on the probe since June 2005, in Brussels yesterday.

He cited the case in which Eni SpA, Italy's former gas monopoly, was fined 290 million euros ($382 million) in February by Italy's antitrust authority for blocking access to its pipeline that transports gas from Algeria.

``The network branch had planned to invest expanding the capacity of a gas pipeline to Italy but the supply branch said the project should be dropped because the extra energy could put prices under pressure,'' Kjoelbye said.

Rome-based Eni's appeal against the fine was partially accepted yesterday, news agency Ansa reported. Eni will get a reduction in the penalty, the amount of which hasn't yet been published, Ansa said.

Removing National Barriers

The Italian company said this week it expects to announce within the next two months plans to build a new import terminal for liquefied natural gas in Italy. On Nov. 24, it offered to auction gas at below-market prices to resolve a separate antitrust investigation into whether the state-controlled company was restricting competitors' access to the country's only existing LNG facility, which Eni controls through its Snam Rete Gas SpA pipeline unit.

The commission is trying to open the EU's 250 billion-euro power and gas market to more competition, using a law that gives it the right to conduct broad investigations into areas of the economy it thinks are performing poorly. The antitrust inquiry is part of the EU's push to remove national barriers within the 25-member bloc, break up monopolies and stop collusion.

``Europe needs large investment in infrastructure, but if a company has both network and supply interests it won't make an investment in its network if this is bad for the supply business,'' Kjoelbye said. ``We're stuck in the middle of the river: liberalization has not changed market conditions. We need a more European outlook, and more cross-border capacity.''

Environment Agency Drops Part Of Its Plan To Ease Pollution Reporting Rules (FINDLAW/AP)

By John Heilprin, Associated Press Writer

AP, December 1, 2006

(AP) - WASHINGTON-The Bush administration, looking at the prospect of stronger oversight from a Democratic-led Congress, is withdrawing a proposal to let big polluters report less often on what they spew from their smokestacks.

The administration, however, is going ahead with a plan to make one-third less provide detailed figures at all.

The government last year proposed easing air regulations to exempt some companies from having to tell the Environmental Protection Agency about what it considers to be small releases of toxic pollutants.

That proposal is still alive. But abandoned now is the idea of making companies that must make such reports, known as toxic release inventory, do so every other year instead of annually.

"You will be pleased to know that I have decided against moving forward with changes to TRI reporting frequency," EPA Administrator Stephen Johnson wrote Democratic Sens. Frank Lautenberg and Robert Menendez this week.

Johnson decided the program would not be effective unless the reporting was done each year, agency spokeswoman Jennifer Wood said Thursday.

The EPA does plan to change the inventory requirements, easing what it called the "regulatory burden" on companies through use of a short form for reporting toxic pollution.

DOJ_NMG_0100321

Currently, some 23,000 facilities are required to submit reports annually if they release more than 500 pounds (227 kilograms) of the worst toxic pollutants. Those include mercury, DDT, PCBs and other chemicals that persist in the environment and work up the food chain.

Johnson made clear in his letter Tuesday to the senators that the administration plans in 2007 to raise that threshold reporting requirement to 5,000 pounds (2,268 kilograms). Companies would be exempt from the reporting requirements if they store the pollutants on site and claim to release "zero" amounts into the environment.

According to EPA officials, the higher threshold would free one-third of the 23,000 facilities from the reporting requirements. They include mining, utility, oil, rubber, plastics, printing, textile, leather tanning and semiconductor operations.

Bush Against Airline Emissions Cuts (AP)

By John Heilprin

AP, December 1, 2006

The White House opposes plans by European nations to require airlines to curb greenhouse gases, saying it would unfairly disadvantage U.S. carriers.

"We are strongly opposed to the imposition of a tax. We think this will violate trade rules," James Connaughton, chairman of the White House Council on Environmental Quality, told a group of international reporters Thursday.

"It's also not a smart way to find your way to efficiency in the aviation (industry)," he said. "The aviation sector has already made dramatic progress in becoming more fuel efficient because they have to. It costs a lot of money to fly people around."

Connaughton said a better approach is to "come up with a partnership to ensure new approaches that are efficient, but also to relieve congestion that is in the airways. There are real restrictions between our markets and also with Asia that causes a tremendous extra consumption of fuel that's necessary."

Technically, the European Commission is not proposing a tax. Instead, it is writing rules to require that airlines trade carbon emissions. Given a choice, airlines told the commission they preferred a cap-and-trade scheme over a tax on carbon emissions.

To Connaughton, "It goes right to the customer, to the bottom line of what it costs to fly. Let's just call it what it is: It's a tax."

He did not elaborate on whether the Bush administration would file a complaint with the Geneva-based World Trade Organization once the commission proposal is made public.

The EU's emissions trading program is intended to encourage industries from many sectors to cut greenhouse gases. It would set limits and allow for trading allocations of carbon dioxide emissions.

The EU is required by the 1997 Kyoto Protocol on climate change to reduce its carbon emissions by 8 percent below 1990 levels by 2012. But cars and airplanes, major sources of CO_2 emissions linked to global warming, are not covered by the treaty.

The European Commission sees the airlines emissions trading as a tool that could help Europe meet the Kyoto targets. By giving airlines a carbon allowance, companies that do not use the full amount can sell their unused limits.

"You don't have a market if you don't have a shortage," the European Commission's top environment official, Mogens Peter Carl, said in October.

EPA Staffers Go To Hill Over Global Warming (CSM)

By Peter N. Spotts

The Christian Science Monitor, December 1, 2006

This week, labor leaders representing more than 10,000 Environmental Protection Agency scientists, engineers, and staff have asked Congress to hold aggressive oversight hearings on the agency's own greenhouse-gas emissions programs.

Under the Bush administration's voluntary approach, the labor leaders' petition says, the agency isn't doing enough to encourage the use of current technology to control carbon-dioxide emissions, the leading cause of human-induced climate change. In fact, the time for a voluntary program is over, the leaders say.

DOJ_NMG_0100322

"The science is too clear and the consequences are too grave" to continue down the path the administration is following, says William Hirzy, an EPA senior scientist currently on a teaching assignment at American University. He's vice president of the National Treasury Employees Union chapter that represents employees at EPA headquarters in Washington.

The labor leaders, who are presidents of the EPA's 22 union locals, also called on lawmakers to ensure that agency experts are allowed to speak freely and openly about global warming with the public and Congress "without fear of reprisal."

In addition, the petition, which was sent to two key Capitol Hill committees, asks lawmakers to "support a vigorous program of enforcement and reduction in GHG [greenhouse-gas] emissions."

The administration has held that regulating CO2 is outside the agency's purview. Indeed, this week, the US Supreme Court heard arguments in a suit against the EPA over this issue. Deputy Solicitor General Gregory Garre argued that Congress never gave the EPA authority to regulate CO2. Even if the agency had the authority, he continued, "now is not the time to exercise such authority, in light of the substantial scientific uncertainty surrounding global climate change and the ongoing studies to address those uncertainties."

The petition's drafters say they originally planned to release the document in a few weeks, on the eve of the new, Democratically led Congress. But they opted to send the document to the House Energy and Commerce Committee and the Senate Environment and Public Works Committee this week as the high court heard oral arguments on the issue.

This is not the first time EPA's unions have flagged issues that some members reportedly have difficulty raising through bureaucratic channels. And it's unclear how deep the petition's sentiments run through the agency's rank and file. "We can't say it's 100 percent," Dr. Hirzy acknowledges.

Still, the unions represent the only safe avenue for career scientists and engineers to speak out, according to Jeff Ruch, executive director of Public Employees for Environmental Responsibility. In 2005, he explains, the US Supreme Court held that public employees couldn't rely on the First Amendment to shield them from retaliation if they blew the whistle on unethical or illegal activities on the job.

The petition comes at a time when speculation is rising in Washington that President Bush may substantially modify his approach to carbon emissions. In press interviews, some administration officials have hinted that Mr. Bush is preparing to unveil new energy and climate policies, perhaps in his State of the Union message early next year.

Some analysts say that the White House has polled energy companies, asking: What's your bottom line on possible regulations? In October, the head of Shell Oil, speaking at the National Press Club, said that a patchwork of state rules would be too hard to deal with, and that a national program is needed.

"You've got different dynamics at play," and the logical place to look for a new position would be the State of the Union address, says John Stanton, vice president of the National Environmental Trust.

Tax Horse-Trading Could Be Focus Of Lame-Duck Session (WSJ)

By John Harwood

The Wall Street Journal, December 1, 2006

See updates to Washington Wire each weekday at www.washwire.com1.

TAX HORSE-TRADING could be lame-duck focus.

Sales-tax states are confident of two-year extension for federal deductions, as home states of Senate leaders Frist of Tennessee and Reid of Nevada both benefit. Business wants similar treatment for R&D credit renewal, while Democrats seek additional alternative-minimum tax fix now, to avoid paying for it after they reinstate "pay-as-you go" budget rules. Republicans bristle, but White House needs deal to move trade bills.

Under pressure from doctors, lawmakers work to block drop in expected Medicare payments. Revenue likely would come out of $10 billion "stabilization" fund for regional health plans. Health plans aren't fighting hard, since the money hasn't been doled out yet. "It's air," says one lobbyist.

Republican pollster Neil Newhouse says voters "couldn't come up with a single" congressional accomplishment.

CAFE CLASH looms among Capitol Hill Democrats.

DOJ_NMG_0100323

Senate leaders, including incoming Energy Chairman Bingaman, back an Obama plan forcing government to raise corporate average fuel-economy standards for autos by one mile per gallon each year, unless regulators prove it isn't feasible. Obama notes the current U.S. car standard of 27.5 miles per gallon has been "frozen" for 20 years, while Japan has gone to 45 mpg.

House Energy Chairman-to-be Dingell of Detroit blasts CAFE as outmoded, and instead backs incentives for flex-fuel cars. Deron Lovaas, a vehicle expert at the Natural Resources Defense Council, says House Democrats, the auto industry and United Auto Workers face rising pressure to "cut some sort of deal" with the Senate.

UNIVERSAL-PRESCHOOL advocates seek boost in new Congress.

Coalition backing action includes University of Chicago Nobel economist James Heckman, business groups and liberal antipoverty warriors. Incoming Senate Finance Chairman Baucus has pushed new federal funding to match state money for "voluntary, universal pre-K for all income levels." A $25 million private Minnesota venture sponsors a pre-kindergarten voucher experiment. But huge national price tag -- $30 billion to $70 billion a year -- makes congressional action unlikely.

Kennedy will push long-stalled Head Start renewal, hoping to fully fund programs for neediest children before extending pre-K to the middle class.

The delay came from Republican demands that church programs be allowed to hire exclusively from their denominations.

FORMER VIAGRA pitchman Dole teams up with Pfizer again, this time to hawk success stories for Medicare's drug benefit. The retired Kansas senator has revamped his Web site, bobdoleonmedicare.com2, with a grant from the manufacturer.

MARKET NICHE: Organizers expect about 150 attendees and 15 exhibitors at next week's "Sixth Rebuilding Iraq Conference & Expo" outside Washington. Iraq-reconstruction conferences in 2003 drew packed houses.

REPUBLICAN SHUFFLE: Virginia's Warner could yet pass on top party post on Senate Environment panel, instead taking ranking Intelligence slot. He would succeed Kansan Roberts, who feuds with incoming Chairman Rockefeller. Roberts could then reclaim ranking on Agriculture panel in time for farm bill important back home. Approaching 80, Warner jokes: "I've spent most of my life worried about defense....I don't know if I'll live long enough to figure out global warming."

BIOTECH, INDIA deals face House-Senate squabbles.

Biotech firms expect Senate to clear long-stalled bill giving government more flexibility and funding to contract for bioterror-related treatments. But odds are low for matching House version before adjournment.

Senate complicates civilian nuclear deal with New Delhi by requiring India to back U.S. efforts against Iran, along with annual "certification" of India's "cooperation." India and White House want those provisions yanked. Business backers expect consensus package with House this year. "This doesn't stand a chance" in the next Congress, says one supporter.

Commerce takes 230 firms in India trade jaunt, including nuclear suppliers General Electric and Westinghouse.

Another Plan For Snowmobiles (NYT)

The New York Times, December 1, 2006

Yet another winter and here we are, still wrangling over snowmobiles in Yellowstone. Last week the National Park Service released a draft environmental impact statement that would allow 720 snowmobiles a day into the park. It would also require snowmobilers to ride with guides and to use the newest generation of supposedly environmentally friendly machines.

But everything we have learned about snowmobiles in Yellowstone — thanks to an apparently unending series of publicly funded studies — tells us that there should be no snowmobiles there at all.

Last winter, the park service — by accident — conducted an even more persuasive experiment. Snowmobile numbers were way down in Yellowstone, thanks largely to uncertainty about the regulations. And every measurement showed just how much cleaner the air was with only about a third of the machines proposed under this new plan zooming through the park. But even those few still exceeded the noise limits wherever they concentrated — at Old Faithful, for instance.

Snowmobiling is almost entirely about speed, and most of the promised environmental gains have been sacrificed for more horsepower. The best way to get people into the park in winter is the new generation of snow coaches, small, snow-going buses that are vastly quieter and cleaner.

The snowmobile problem is a political vortex of surprising endurance. Scientific studies funded by the Clinton and Bush administrations have made it clear again and again that snowmobiles seriously degrade the environment of Yellowstone. The park service needs a new plan, and if it can't provide one then Congress should intervene. There should be no snowmobiles in Yellowstone.

COMMENTARY Gonzales: So You Don't Think Meth Is Your Problem? (AAS)

By Alberto Gonzales, U.S. ATTORNEY GENERAL

Austin (TX) American-Statesman, December 1, 2006

It has become a familiar scene on the evening news across the country: Neighbors watch in stunned silence as police raid the house next door and the nice couple who kept to themselves is hauled away for running a methamphetamine lab in the basement. How could this happen, the neighbors ask, in our neighborhood? Isn't this the kind of thing you only see . . . somewhere else?

Compared with marijuana, heroin or cocaine, methamphetamine, or meth, is relatively new in the headlines. But it has had a tremendous and terrible impact in a short time.

Once thought to be a problem primarily affecting America's rural communities, we now know that no community is safe from the destruction caused by meth.

Users are drawn in by the drug's promise of euphoria. Its quick, feel-good results make it appealing to a teenager who may be feeling blue or to an exhausted stay-at-home mom.

Even more sinister in some ways than cocaine or heroine, continued methamphetamine use can interfere with the brain's ability to experience pleasure normally. Imagine not being able to feel joy from the things that make you happiest? Imagine you have unknowingly sacrificed your ability to feel such a basic human emotion for the false, short-term promise of feeling happy, high or euphoric.

Users quickly learn that methamphetamine is far from glamorous. Their teeth rot, they can't sleep, and they become emaciated from lack of appetite. But they're addicted, and they usually cannot stop without help.

So we should care about the drug addict? They are their own victims — no one forced them to use an illegal drug, right? They deserve to suffer.

But while some consider drug abuse to be a victimless crime, meth does not just affect the user. It affects users' children, it affects the community, and in a very real and lasting way, it affects the environment.

Meth's collateral damage is nothing short of horrifying. We've seen babies burned to death when meth-cooking parents accidentally set fire to a home lab. We've seen children exposed to hazardous chemicals and severely neglected by their meth-abusing parents.

And we've seen environmental damage from meth. The chemicals used to make the drug include lye, red phosphorus and hydriodic acid, and each pound of finished methamphetamine creates up to six pounds of hazardous waste. These toxins are often dumped onto the ground or into the water systems — making meth your problem.

Last March, Congress passed the Combat Methamphetamine Act, which gave us tools for targeting meth traffickers. The law, signed by President Bush, provides a national standard for the retail sale of products containing the ingredients needed to make meth, like pseudoephedrine.

One change you may have noticed is that local retailers moved some cold medicines behind the counter. It seems like a small step, but thanks to this and other initiatives — particularly at the state level — we have made tremendous progress in cutting production of meth.

DOJ_NMG_0100325

Now we're focused on halting the manufacture and smuggling of meth from superlabs controlled by Mexican drug traffickers operating in the United States and Mexico and to reducing demand in this country.

I've made clear to U.S. attorneys throughout America that meth is a priority. But we cannot win the fight against meth with prosecutions alone. We need to educate people about the dangers of meth, so they never start using it. Finally, we need to make sure meth abusers know help is available, so they can get clean.

Recent events around the country have educated people about the dangers of the drug. The Justice Department is working with its partners at the federal, state and local level, in government and in the private and nonprofit sectors, to raise understanding of this problem.

Education efforts do indeed reduce demand. To put it simply, the more people know about meth, the less likely they are to use it. And we've created an educational presentation called Meth 101, which is online at www.usdoj.gov/methawareness.

Meth poses a tremendous challenge for law enforcement and society. We all share a responsibility to ensure a safe, successful and drug-free future for our children and grandchildren. Progress will be something very worthy of giving thanks for this holiday season.

'CRYSTAL' PALACE (NYPOST)

By Todd Venezia, Erika Martinez And Stefanie Cohen

The New York Post, December 1, 2006

December 1, 2006 -- The trailer-park drug known as "hillbilly crack" has been putting on the Ritz lately - as federal drug agents uncovered a crystal-meth lab inside the $6,000-a-month Manhattan penthouse of a bank executive, authorities said yesterday.

Michael Knibb, an information-technology vice president at Citigroup, ran the sophisticated drug operation from the living room of his luxury apartment overlooking the United Nations, said Drug Enforcement Administration officials.

The 37-year-old Knibb - who makes an estimated $250,000 a year - allegedly told authorities that he had decided to make his own methamphetamines because he could not find a reliable drug dealer after moving to New York from Seattle two years ago.

Knibb was one of 10 alleged do-it-yourself drug makers busted this week as part of a federal anti-meth sweep dubbed Operation Red Fusion.

Yesterday was National Methamphetamine Awareness Day.

The arrests were made after each of the suspects allegedly bought meth-making chemicals from the same Internet sites.

None of the suspects were major dealers, and most just made enough for their own use, according to the DEA.

Knibb wasn't the only suspect whose profile didn't fit the image of the typical meth producer.

Another suspect is Mehmetcan Dosemeci, a Columbia University doctoral student, who told cops he mixed and used the stimulant to boost his studying, officials said.

Dosemeci, a native of Turkey, is a Fulbright scholar and a graduate instructor at the school.

He was busted after he allegedly made the boneheaded mistake of going online to get one of the prime meth ingredients, iodine crystals, and having it sent to his Manhattan Avenue apartment.

DEA agents raided his home in October. The history student might have also gone far in chemistry, since DEA officials said the 1.3 grams of meth they found had a purity of 98 percent.

"It's just not as it seems at the moment. It's a big misunderstanding," Dosemeci said at his apartment yesterday.

He and Knibb were free on $150,000 bail.

Agents described Knibb's operation as "sophisticated" for a small-time meth lab. He allegedly used heating elements from lava lamps to cook up the drug. The DEA said they found 7 grams of meth, refined to 92 percent purity, in his apartment.

"To find a meth lab . . . in a penthouse in New York City is shocking, as well a frightening," said John Gilbride, special agent in charge of the Manhattan DEA office.

Knibb was busted in June after allegedly buying red phosphorus online. The controlled substance is a prime meth ingredient. According to residency records, he returned to Seattle in July of his year and stayed in a drug-treatment center. He could not be reached for comment.

Cops also busted Nicholaos Georgopoulos, 29, and Allen Jasovsky, 56, both of whom allegedly brewed meth at a Manhattan Potamkin car dealership on 11th Avenue, where they worked as mechanics. One of the men would keep a lookout, while the other would mix the drug for their own use, the DEA said. Georgopoulos said he had done the drug for only a couple of years - sucked in by Jasovsky, a 30-year addict.

"It doesn't mean I'm a bad guy, I just have a problem. I don't want to hurt anyone else, I've hurt myself enough," Georgopoulos said from his home in Astoria, Queens.

He said drug use was rampant at the dealership, and that they would cook the drugs behind the opened hoods of cars while they were supposed to be working.

In Ridge, L.I., agents arrested Christopher Bigoness, who allegedly had a mobile meth lab in his pickup truck. In addition to the meth, he allegedly was growing "magic mushroom" in his parents' home.

His efforts to grow the hallucinogenic fungi, however, caused him to inhale mold spores and sickened him.

Knibb, Dosemeci, Bigoness, Jasovsky, Georgopoulos and three other suspects face 20 years in prison, while two others face 10 years.

Citicorp Executive Among 10 Accused In Drug Sting (NYS)

By Elizabeth Solomont

New York Sun, December 1, 2006

A Citicorp executive accused of manufacturing methamphetamine in his East Side penthouse was one of 10 people charged with operating nine illegal drug labs in New York City and Long Island, Drug Enforcement Agency officials announced yesterday.

Michael Knibb, 36, allegedly cooked up the highly addictive drug in the living room of his apartment on East 39th Street overlooking the United Nations, officials said. Officials identified him as a vice president of IT Test Systems at Citicorp, a subsidiary of Citigroup. A spokesman for the company confirmed Mr. Knibb's employment.

Officials said his arrest and charges against nine others stemmed from a six-month investigation known as "Operation Red Fusion," which targeted suspects who allegedly imported chemicals used to make methamphetamine from the same Web site. Officials declined to name the site, but said the suspects were producing the drug for individual use and not for sale.

According to officials, three of the labs were in Manhattan, two each were in Queens and Long Island, and there were one in Brooklyn and the Bronx. Methamphetamine, known as meth, crank, and crystal, can be made from household ingredients and is considered highly addictive and explosive. "These labs are ticking time bombs," the special agent in charge of the DEA's New York office, John Gilbride, said.

A lawyer for Mr. Knibb, Heidi Cesare, last night declined to comment on the case.

Officials said the defendants worked independently. The group includes a graduate student at Columbia University, Mehmetcan Dosemeci, 28, and an undergraduate student at SUNY Stonybrook, Arkady Koroshikh, 20.

Nine defendants pleaded not guilty yesterday to felony charges associated with the operation of the illegal labs, while one is a fugitive, officials said. If convicted, they face a maximum of 20 years in prison and $250,000 in fines.

Meth Lab In 'High' Rise (NYDN)

New York Daily News, December 1, 2006

A Citigroup executive turned his fancy 38th-floor penthouse apartment overlooking the United Nations into a crystal meth lab, one of nine secret dope factories shut down by drug agents, federal officials said yesterday.

DOJ_NMG_0100327

He and nine other New Yorkers, including a Fulbright scholar at Columbia who wanted to stay awake to write his dissertation, were charged with setting up the toxic do-it-yourself labs across the metro area.

"A new animal has been unleashed in New York City," said John Gilbride, special agent in charge of the DEA's New York office.

For six months, agents tracked the purchase of red phosphorous and other chemicals from an Internet-based foreign company.

The most prominent alleged mad meth scientist was Michael Knibb, a vice president for information technology for Citigroup. He was tracked ordering 100 grams of meth's component chemical, court papers allege.

When the feds checked his penthouse on E. 39th St., they discovered beakers, solvents and heating elements in his living room and bedroom.

Knibb admitted he lost his crystal meth source when he moved here from Seattle 18 months ago, "so he decided to manufacture it himself," DEA agent David Campbell stated in an affidavit.

"He's a real gentleman," said a shocked employee in the luxury building. "He rides a motorcycle and has a high-paying job."

Mehmetcan Dosemeci, 28, a doctoral student in history at Columbia University who teaches political science and was a Fulbright scholar, was tripped up by a shipment of iodine crystals sent to his Manhattan Ave. flat.

"While writing his dissertation, he wanted to take methamphetamine to keep awake. . . . He researched how to manufacture it on the Internet," Campbell said.

A U.S. magistrate in Brooklyn released Knibb and Dosemeci on $150,000 bonds Wednesday.

Drug labs were also set up by two mechanics in the garage bay of Potamkin Mitsubishi in Manhattan, in another suspect's pickup truck, and in several residences on Long Island. All the labs produced drugs for the suspects' personal use, authorities said.

The eight others charged are: Nicholaos Georgopoulos, 29, of Astoria, Queens; Allen Jasovsky, 56, of Englishtown, N.J.; Christopher Bigoness, 48, of Ridge, L.I.; Arkady Koroshikh, 20, of Bay Ridge, Brooklyn; Christopher Beltzer, 24, of Queens; Eric Wright, 36, of the Bronx, and Steven Satornino, 32, and Adam Mills, 41, both of Patchogue, L.I. All but Wright, who remains a fugitive, have been arraigned and released.

"From the cornfields of the Midwest to the penthouses of New York City, this drug is a poisonous danger that affects not only the user but the entire community," Gilbride said.

Because flammable chemicals are used in the making of the highly addictive meth, one home lab in six triggers potentially dangerous explosions, he said.

Penthouse Lab Busted In Methamphetamine Crackdown (NSDY/AP)

By Pat Milton

AP, November 30, 2006

NEW YORK -- A Manhattan corporate executive accused of cooking up methamphetamine in his penthouse apartment was one of 10 people busted in a crackdown on clandestine drug labs in the city and Long Island, Drug Enforcement Administration officials announced Thursday.

The six-month investigation, dubbed "Operation Red Fusion," targeted suspects who allegedly imported chemicals used to make the drug from the same Web site, said John Gilbride, special agent in charge of the DEA's New York office. The suspects were making the drug for individual use and not for sale, said Gilbride.

Michael Knibb, 36, a Citicorp executive, was cooking the drug up in the living room of his East Side penthouse overlooking the United Nations, Gilbride said. Another suspect was arrested for running a lab in the back of his pickup truck, while a third was using a garage bay at a Manhattan car dealership. Knibb's attorney, Heidi Cesare, did not immediately return a phone call for comment.

DOJ_NMG_0100328

Nine of the defendants, including Knibb, were arraigned in U.S. District Court in Brooklyn following their arrests, while the tenth remained a fugitive. According to Gilbride, three of the labs were in Manhattan, two in Long Island, two in Queens, and one apiece in Brooklyn and the Bronx.

The arrests mark yet another eastward advance for a drug that has been slowly growing in popularity in urban areas, after gaining a foothold years ago in small towns across the Midwest and Appalachia.

"From the cornfields of the Midwest to the penthouses of New York City, this drug is a poisonous danger that affects not only the user but the entire community," Gilbride said.

Officials said that one in six clandestine labs result in an explosion creating devastating consequences for the individual and neighbors, particularly in densely populated areas such as New York City and its suburbs.

Suspicious tell-tale signs that could indicate the existence of a meth lab include an air conditioner unit running during winter months, a tube dangling outside a window being used as a vent, and the presence of caustic fumes or odors, said John Fassanello, a DEA chemist.

Methamphetine, also known as meth, crank and crystal, can be made from household ingredients, including over-the-counter cold medications. It can be snorted, injected, inhaled or smoked.

Agents uncovered two personal meth labs on Long Island. One was in Ridge, where the individual was producing meth from the back of a pick-up truck, said Richard Dormer, Suffolk County police commissioner.

The investigation received its nickname because red phosphorous and other chemicals such as iodine are used to manufacture the drug. Gilbride declined to identify the Internet company that sold the chemicals, but did say it was outside the U.S.

The defendants pleaded not guilty to the charges and all but one was released on bail. If convicted, they face up to 20 years in prison.

7 Held On Drug Trafficking Charges (WT)

By Jerry Seper, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, December 1, 2006

Drug Enforcement Administration agents have arrested seven suspected drug traffickers who operated methamphetamine laboratories throughout New York City and Long Island. Those arrested included a corporate executive, an automobile mechanic and a university teaching assistant.

"The danger of meth labs has spread from mid-America to Midtown," DEA Administrator Karen P. Tandy said.

"In New York City, the potential for damage is enormous -- drug criminals are playing with fire in apartment buildings that thousands of innocent people call home," she said. "With today's arrests, we're extinguishing those fires before they become explosions and ensuring that those who put New York's citizens at risk pay the price."

The arrests came as a result of an undercover investigation known as "Operation Red Fusion," led by the DEA and the Justice Department's Organized Crime Drug Enforcement Task Force, with assistance from the Suffolk County Police Department. Three other suspected traffickers are being sought.

DEA spokesman David C. Ausiello said agents targeted persons in New York City and Long Island who imported red phosphorus and other restricted chemicals, such as iodine, which are known to be used to manufacture methamphetamine in illegal laboratories.

Mr. Ausiello said the agents discovered nine operational methamphetamine laboratories and equipment used in growing psilocybin mushrooms and marijuana, and they seized manufactured methamphetamine and hundreds of grams of restricted chemicals, including red phosphorus and iodine.

He said the laboratories were found at a penthouse apartment overlooking the United Nations, a garage bay at a Manhattan automobile dealership, a pickup truck, a single family residence and apartments located on Long Island. He said those arrested were not members of a single organization, but rather acted independently, producing personal-use quantities of methamphetamine.

The laboratories were discovered in Manhattan, the Bronx, Brooklyn, Queens, Patchogue and Ridge.

El Paso, Nation Focus On Meth Awareness (EPT)

By Tammy Fonce-Olivas

El Paso Times, December 1, 2006

Law enforcement officials in El Paso joined the nation today in recognizing National Methamphetamine Awareness Day, which was proclaimed by President Bush as a day to raise awareness about the dangers of meth abuse and reduce demand for the drug.

Zoran B. Yankovich, special agent in charge of the Drug Enforcement Administration in El Paso, said methamphetamine is manufactured from a variety of store-bought chemicals and can dramatically affects users' minds and bodies. Chronic use can lead to violent behavior, paranoia, and an inability to cope with the ordinary demands of life.

"I understand that people use drugs to get high. Our message to them is to get high on life," Yankovich said.

According to the 2005 National Survey on Drug Use and Health, individuals ages 18 to 25, are the most likely to use meth. Additionally, it is estimated that more than 10 million people have abused meth, about 512,000 of them in 2005.

The number of teens who have tried meth has decreased in recent years, Yankovich said.

Though law enforcement officials around the nation have made significant progress combating the supply of methamphetamine by reducing the number of meth labs in the U.S, the drug remains a serious problem. Yankovich added that most of the meth used in the U.S., or 85 percent of it, is manufactured in Mexico.

All counties in New Mexico consider methamphetamine as their "No. 1 drug problem," Yankovich said.

In El Paso, cocaine and marijuana are the most common illegal drugs. However, police are concerned about the growing popularity of meth, Deputy Chief Sylvia Aguilar of the El Paso Police Department.

Carrie Walker, a treatment specialist of Peak Hospital of Santa Teresa, said two out of 10 people who turn to them for drug abuse treatment have used meth. Though the drug treatment facility is in New Mexico, it serves residents from throughout the region, Walker said.

The number of methamphetamine-related cases prosecuted nationwide has increased by 700 percent in the past decade, said Margaret Leachman, chief of the El Paso Division of the U.S. Attorney's Office.

In El Paso, the U.S. Attorney's Office prosecutes 50 to 100 cases a year. About 99 percent of them result in convictions, Leachman said.

Penalties for possession of methamphetamine vary depending on the quantity of the drug and other factors such as whether a weapon was involved.

Leachman said a person caught with 50 grams of meth, which can fit in an average plastic sandwich bag, can face 10 years to life imprisonment if convicted. Possession of a gram of meth can lead to two years in prison.

S. Florida Sounds Alarm On Spread Of Meth Labs (MH)

By Jay Weaver

The Miami Herald, November 30, 2006

The number of start-up meth labs in Florida dipped during the past year, but law enforcement officials issued dire warnings Thursday about the scourge.

"We're working like never before to combat this epidemic," said Fred Ganem, associate special agent in charge of the Drug Enforcement Administration in Miami.

"Simply reducing the supply of methamphetamine is not our only challenge," he said. ``Reducing the demand is also a challenge."

The DEA and U.S. attorney's office hosted a local workshop as part of a national campaign to raise awareness about the highly addictive, inexpensive drug.

Meth affects the central nervous system like cocaine, but is much stronger. Its recipes are readily available on the Web and can be concocted with common household agents such as ether, drain cleaner and rubbing alcohol. Pseudoephedrine, the main ingredient used to create the meth, is found in over-the-counter cold remedies.

The drug has been common on the West Coast, but in recent years has spread across the Midwest and into Florida, law enforcement officials say.

"We are seeing more and more of methamphetamine coming in from Mexico," said DEA agent Dean Wolpert.

In Florida, local police and federal agents have cracked down on hundreds of meth labs in the central and northern parts of the state -- but not as many in South Florida, where authorities have raided about a half-dozen in Miami-Dade and Broward counties.

"Here in South Florida we have not seen the onslaught," said U.S. Attorney R. Alexander Acosta, who warned that his office would aggressively prosecute meth suppliers.

According to DEA records, 245 meth labs started up in Florida during the past year, down from 341 in 2005 and 332 the previous year. Officials said the decline resulted from more law enforcement activity, community awareness and the influence of so-called superlabs in Mexico.

Still, the drug, once associated with only rural areas, has grown insidious.

"It's a universal problem," said Dr. David Fawcett, of the South Florida Methamphetamine Task Force.

Drug Enforcement Agency Urges Use Of Hot Line (HAGMH)

By Pepper Ballard

Hagerstown Morning Herald, December 1, 2006

In observation of today's National Methamphetamine Awareness Day, the Hagerstown chapter of the Drug Enforcement Administration wants to remind the public of its anonymous meth tip hot line.

Kyle Williamson, resident agent in charge of the Drug Enforcement Administration in Hagerstown, said that those who have information about methamphetamine activity may leave anonymous tips at 1-866-305-3016.

According to the Drug Enforcement Administration's Web site - www.dea.gov - today is the first National Methamphetamine Awareness Day, which is intended to spread awareness of the dangers of meth.

President George W. Bush issued a proclamation Monday declaring today as the national awareness day.

Methamphetamine, also known as meth, crystal or ice, is manufactured in a variety of ways, but often includes a chemical mix of pseudoephedrine, the main ingredient of Sudafed, and ingredients found in common kitchen cleaners and other toxic products, Williamson said.

Williamson said the DEA and Maryland State Police established in June the Western Maryland Meth Initiative. The group has representatives from state law enforcement agencies in Frederick, Washington, Allegany and Garrett counties, he said.

The group has developed a lab team that has undergone specialized training to dismantle labs used to cook the drug and to clean up those labs, he said.

Be Wise To Methamphetamine Danger (LEBDN)

By David J. Arnold Jr., Lebanon Daily News

Lebanon (PA) Daily News, December 1, 2006

Crank. Ice. Speed. Chalk. Glass. Whatever the street name, methamphetamine, or meth, is an addictive drug with toxic effects on both its users and the communities in which it is used.

Meth and the clandestine labs used to make meth have become such a scourge in the law-enforcement community that today, Nov. 30, was proclaimed the first-ever National Methamphetamine Awareness Day by the U.S. Department of Justice. If we are going to fight this highly addictive and destructive drug effectively, it is important we all understand its dangers.

Unfortunately, meth is a national problem that has reached Pennsylvania. Once thought to be isolated to the midwestern United States, it is increasingly moving east and into the mainstream. In fact, in the last two years in Pennsylvania 189 lab s have been shut down.

Right here at home, our community won't soon forget the methamphetamine laboratory discovered by the Lebanon County Drug Task on South Sixth Street in the city of Lebanon. The chemicals found at the scene required the expertise of the Pennsylvania State Police Clandestine Laboratory Response Team. The laboratory results indicated that the chemicals present in the home placed residents in the area in danger of death or serious bodily injury due to the risk of exposure to the chemicals.

Meth has many monsters.

First, the drug itself is a powerful central nervous system stimulant. It is highly addictive and has devastating effects on both the brain and body. Abusers show symptoms of violent behavior, anxiety, confusion and insomnia. They can also have hallucinations, mood disturbances, paranoia and delusions. Poor hygiene, open, infected sores from intense, delusional scratching and decayed and discolored teeth are just some of the horrible physical byproducts of a drug that literally rots a way a user's physical appearance and health.

Because meth is inexpensive to make, often with easily-obtained cold medicines and common household items, it is more common than we'd like to think. In fact, meth labs are no longer considered a strictly "rural" problem. These days, labs are found in rural, city and suburban residences; barns, garages and outbuildings; back rooms of businesses, apartments and hotel and motel rooms; even on boats and in the trunks of cars.

Dirty and dangerous, every clandestine, homemade meth lab is a ticking time bomb — literally. Explosions, serious environmental hazards and dangerous concentrations of chemicals and gases pose deadly risks to innocent family members, too often children who are severely neglected and exposed to the deadly drug and its byproducts. Neighbors are exposed to the highly volatile lifestyle and physical dangers, as are investigators, once they are on the scene. And all too often, there is the cost of human life.

Fortunately, there is some good news.

In the war against meth, Pennsylvania is working hard to avoid the full-blown epidemic faced by states to our west. Last year, our state Legislature and governor passed legislation putting cold medicines most often used in meth production behind the pharmacy counter.

The Pennsylvania State Police has made its Clandestine Laboratory Response Team and its Special Emergency Response Team available to assist in securing lab sites and recovering and processing evidence.

Attorney General Tom Corbett has worked cooperatively with district attorneys and other members of law enforcement in communities where meth is most prevalent, combining manpower, equipment and training to fight the problem. And, on behalf of the children, they are working on a statewide "Drug Endangered Child" protocol for law enforcement, medical and social-service personnel responding to an incident where children are found in a clandestine laboratory setting.

Meth is a community-wide problem that requires public vigilance with a law-enforcement response. If you know a meth user, there is help. If you suspect a meth lab is in your community, immediately call your local police or the district attorney's office at (717) 274-2801, ext. 2360. Do not investigate yourself. Only law enforcement can respond with individuals who are trained to deal with dangers (like invisible yet fatal chemicals and fumes) that lie within these labs.

No state will ever be completely immune to the tragedy of meth. But the more we know about it, the better equipped we will be to deal with this terrible, horrible, highly destructive drug. On National Methamphetamine Awareness Day, I encourage you to find out a little more about meth at http://www.usdoj.gov/methawareness. What you learn might just save a life.

Arnold is the district attorney of Lebanon County.

It's Meth Awareness Day (LCJ)

Louisville Courier-Journal, December 1, 2006

Thursday is National Methamphetamine Awareness Day, and the U.S. Attorney's Office in Louisville held a news conference in the city to draw attention to the dangers of the highly addictive drug and efforts to curtail its use.

U.S. Attorney David L. Huber and Richard A. Badaracco, assistant special agent in charge for the federal Drug Enforcement Administration in Louisville, will conduct the the news conference at the U.S. Attorney's office at 510 W. Broadway.

Similar news conferences are planned across the country on Thursday.

The awareness day was proclaimed by President Bush and is sponsored by the U.S. Department of Justice.

The Business Of Meth Is Changing To Meet Demand (LCJ)

By Kay Stewart, The Courier-Journal

Louisville Courier-Journal, December 1, 2006

The days of makeshift home laboratories for methamphetamine are on the wane, but the highly addictive stimulant is thriving — and its manufacture is changing to meet demand just as hot business products do, federal authorities said during a news conference Thursday in Louisville.

Increasingly, meth is being imported from Mexico in a highly pure form called crystal meth that can be smoked, leading to an instant high.

"What has not changed is the lethal effect," U.S. Attorney David L. Huber said at the news conference, which marked National Methamphetamine Awareness Day. "It's … very destructive to the body and the brain."

Home labs are less common now because most states, including Kentucky, adopted laws regulating sales of ephedrine and pseudoephedrine products used to make meth.

Huber and others said they hoped that the news conference would remind people of the drug's dangerous consequences — and that children would get the message to never try it because one dose can lead to addiction.

Meth ranks third, behind marijuana and cocaine, in popularity among illegal drugs in the region, but it leads all drugs in devastation, said Richard A. Badaracco, assistant special agent in charge of the Drug Enforcement Administration's Louisville office.

"Meth mutilates," Badaracco said, surrounded by displays illustrating his point.

One poster board pictured a healthy, vibrant young woman labeled "prom queen" next to a picture of an emaciated, hollow-cheeked "meth queen" with scabs on her face — both wore the same strapless pink dress.

There were close-up pictures of open mouths showing rotting teeth and infected gums — "meth mouth" — and before-and-after photos showing the appearance of rapid aging caused by meth.

In Jefferson County, police have busted 49 meth labs this year, Huber said.

The U.S. attorney's office prosecuted cases involving 600 meth labs in Western Kentucky last year, he said, compared with fewer than 260 this year — a decline attributed to regulations on sales of meth-making products.

But crystal meth arrests are on the increase, he said. In a drug bust last week, Badaracco said, authorities seized 25 pounds of crystal meth from Mexico.

"These Mexican trafficking organizations are stepping up to the plate," he said.

Enforcement is a top DEA priority, he said, but "we are not going to arrest our way out of this problem."

Today Is National Methamphetamine Awareness Day (DESERTS)

The Desert Sun, December 1, 2006

Today is National Methamphetamine Awareness Day.

Federal, state and local agencies making public aware of problem of methamphetamine and what the public can do to fight the spread of this deadly synthetic drug.

The federal Drug Enforcement Agency in Los Angeles is hosting an educational event at 11 a.m.

it is designed to teach the public about the dangers of clandestine methamphetamine labs and how to spot labs in a neighborhood.

Federal, state and local police agencies considers the Coachella Valley a hub for meth distribution because much of the production of this deadly drug has shifted to Mexico.

It is then smuggled into this area and distributed through out the rest of California and the country, officials said.

Research Center Studying Meth In Valley (FRESNOSN)

Fresno State News, December 1, 2006

As the U.S. observes National Methamphetamine Awareness Day today (Nov. 30), researchers at California State University, Fresno are studying meth use and abuse in the Central Valley as part of the fight against the damaging effects of the dangerous and highly addictive drug.

Nov. 30 has been designated by the Substance Abuse Mental Health Administration and the United States Department of Justice.

"Identifying the extent of methamphetamine abuse in the Central Valley is key to addressing the treatment needs for persons addicted to this drug," said Dr. Virginia Rondero Hernandez, faculty researcher for the Social Welfare Evaluation, Research and Training Center at Fresno State.

"This is especially true for families with children who may be at risk for becoming involved with child welfare systems due to parental use of methamphetamine," she said.

Methamphetamine abuse is one of the top research agenda items for the Social Welfare Evaluation Research and Training Center. This research will include community-based studies intended to identify appropriate treatment interventions for methamphetamine abuse. Findings from this research will be used to inform decision-making processes and public policy.

The Central Valley, like other areas of the nation is affected by the criminal and social consequences of methamphetamine production, sales and use. According to the Office of National Drug Control Policy, the proportions of methamphetamine arrests in Central Valley counties in 2001 and 2002 were higher compared to heroin arrests made during the same years.

Rural areas have been particularly affected by the presence of methamphetamine production. The National Drug Intelligence Center reported that in 2003, there were 130 super labs seized in California in which 121 labs were located in the counties of Fresno, Kern, Kings, Los Angeles, Madera, Merced, Orange, Riverside, Sacramento, San Bernardino, San Joaquin, Stanislaus and Tulare.

Methamphetamine is a highly addictive drug that can easily be made from ingredients purchased over the counter. The drug harms not only those who use it, but numerous families and communities throughout the country. Based on public child welfare data, as much as 75 percent of child protection removals are due to parental substance abuse issues, a proportion of which is contributed to methamphetamine use.

The Social Welfare Evaluation, Research and Training Center, a major initiative for Fresno State, offers research, training and evaluation services to address social welfare issues and policies impacting the Central Valley region. For more information, contact Brandie Campbell at 559.278.7940.

Meth Use, Behind The Numbers (HUTCHN)

Hutchinson (KS) News, December 1, 2006

Today has been declared National Methamphetamine Awareness Day by the U.S. Department of Justice in an effort to generate awareness about the damaging effects of the drug on individuals, families and communities.

Anyone with questions or a problem with meth may call 1-888-8NO-METH (866-6384) weekdays from 7 a.m. to 7 p.m. Here are some statistics about meth use and abuse in Kansas and the nation.

l According to the 2004 National Survey on Drug Use and Health, nearly 12 million Americans - almost 5 percent of the population above age 12 - have tried meth in their lifetime, with an estimated 1.4 million persons using in the past year and 600,000 in the past month.

l Kansas is ranked 13th in the nation in the number of meth labs or dump sites found so far in 2006, but 29th in the nation in percentage of people 18 to 24 who used meth in the past year and 18th for youths 12 and older using, at 1.75 percent and 0.92 percent, respectively.

l Young adults 18-25 are the most likely to use meth, followed by the 12 to 17 age group, with the average age of first use at 22.1 years in 2004.

l The rate of use is higher among males than females, with the highest rates among Pacific Islanders, American Indians or Alaska Natives. Past year meth use among whites (0.7 percent) and Hispanics (0.5 percent) was higher than among blacks (0.1 percent) or Asians (0.2 percent).

l Treatment admissions of persons with meth as the primary use problem increased from 21,000 in 1993 to 117,000 in 2003.

l Kansas is ranked 13th in the nation in the number of meth labs or dump sites found so far in 2006, as reported by law enforcement, down from ninth in 2005, according to Kansas Bureau of Investigation statistics. Year-to-date, 140 labs have been found, compared to 290 in 2005.

l Reno County is ranked first in the state in number of labs found this year, at 29, down from 37 reported in 2005. Cowley County, which led three of the past four years, reported only eight labs, down from 53 last year. Only 45 of the state's 105 counties have reported meth labs in 2006.

Beware: Today Is National Meth Awareness Day (BLACKHP)

By Wendy Pitlick, Black Hills Pioneer

Black Hills (SD) Pioneer, December 1, 2006

LEAD - Methamphetamine use in Lawrence County is significantly lower than it was two years ago, State's Attorney John Fitzgerald said this week.

Though he did not yet have specific statistics to point to for the decrease in meth arrests in the county, Fitzgerald said he has seen a dramatic decrease in methamphetamine cases in the court system. He attributes that to the state crack down on pseudoephedrine (the main ingredient in methamphetamine typically found in cold medicine) sales, and a national education campaign about the dangers of methamphetamine.

That's good news, in a sea of what has become a growing epidemic nationwide. But government leaders nationwide, as well as civic and social groups throughout the country have designated today, Nov. 30, as National Methamphetamine Awareness Day. The day has been established by the U.S. Department of Justice to raise awareness about the dangers of methamphetamine, as well as find ways to help those who have become addicted to the drug. In order to commemorate the day in South Dakota, the U.S. Attorney General's Office, the Governor's office, the S.D. Attorney General's office, the Department of Human Services, and MAPP-SD have partnered to get information out about the dangers of meth use. The governor's office has also issued a proclamation recognizing the day.

"Methamphetamine (Meth) use and distribution has been recognized as a major and growing problem for all citizens of the state of South Dakota," Gov. Mike Rounds stated in the proclamation. "In one way or another, all South Dakota residents will feel the impact of this dreadful disease through increased costs associated with drug use, addiction, chemical cleanup, increased work for law enforcement and social services, overcrowded jails, increased domestic violence and physical abuse, shattered marriages, lost jobs, and devastated and neglected families."

According to Rounds, designating Nov. 30 as National Methamphetamine Awareness Day is only one of the ways government officials have fought against meth use. In South Dakota, a statewide task force has completed a strategic plan to provide meth-specific education, prevention and early intervention for students and community members. Further, a statewide campaign launched in 2006 entitled "Face Facts: Meth Makes You Ugly," focuses on teaching students about the devastating effects of meth use through real-life stories from former addicts.

But the state still has a long way to go for education and prevention. Although Lawrence County has seen a decrease in overall meth numbers, methamphetamine busts have skyrocketed statewide. According to the Methamphetamine Awareness Prevention Program of South Dakota (MAPP-SD), there were 8.81 pounds of meth seized last year between January and September. By comparison, this year law enforcement officers seized 24.52 pounds of the drug within the same time frame.

DOJ_NMG_0100335

According to a study conducted by the Substance Abuse and Mental Health Services Administration, individuals ages 18-25 make up the largest percentage of the 1.3 million people who used meth last year. That translates into more criminal activity as meth users search for a way to support their habit, increased violent activity, larger prison populations and more prisoners with significant health problems, and larger case loads for social workers and child protection advocates.

"It (meth) has a lot of people in a panic. They don't know what to do," MAPP-SD representative Nikkole Abbas said of the growing epidemic of the drug. "It is draining a lot of resources."

From July 2005 to June 2006, officials from the S.D. Department of Corrections reported that 47 percent of incarcerated females reported using meth, while 37 percent of those females were diagnosed with a methamphetamine addiction. By comparison, 32 percent of adult males in the prison system reported using meth, while 14 percent were reported as meth addicts.

Though Abbas reported that methamphetamine is considered a "late stage drug," meaning individuals use it after a long history of being involved with other drugs and alcohol, there are still risk factors for students. According to a S.D. Youth Risk Behavior Study conducted in 2003 12 percent of 11th grade females used methamphetamine one or more times in their lives. That's why many statewide programs designed to combat meth use focus specifically on teaching students to make healthy choices overall.

"Somebody typically doesn't go out and just start using meth," Abbas said. "They have to have usually been drinking alcohol or smoking pot for awhile first. (Teenagers) are usually not even exposed to meth unless they're at the parties where people are drinking. Once they're in that environment that's where they get offered it. It's not just something that a kid is going to go out one day and just start using necessarily."

But there are exceptions to every rule, and Abbas said teens and adults alike who do not have a history of drug or alcohol abuse have been known to use meth because of its false promises of increased performance in sports, weight loss, and energy boost.

"I just heard of a case recently where a couple had completely raised their kids and she had to divorce him because he got into meth use after all of that," Abbas said.

Methamphetamine is a highly addictive, man-made drug, which commonly gives its users a feeling of euphoria and a boost of energy that can last for days on end. A person who uses meth may experience irritability, headaches, extreme anxiety, sleeplessness, confusion, aggressive feelings, violent rages, and depression. In some severe cases meth users can become psychotic and experience paranoia, hallucinations, and delusions, which can lead to extremely violent behavior.

Agencies Coordinate Nationwide Anti-ice Efforts (PDN)

By Eric Palacios, Pacific Daily News

Pacific Daily News, December 1, 2006

In an effort to raise awareness on the perils associated with the drug ice on Guam, several federal and local law enforcement agencies launched their public outreach programs in conjunction with the U.S. Department of Justice-sponsored National Methamphetamine Awareness Day.

U.S. Attorney Leonardo Rapadas said the anti-drug campaign will be more than just the table-top display yesterday at Guam Premier Outlets.

"We're going to hit new venues, get into the villages and the schools and meet with youth groups in the coming year to raise even more awareness on this evil," Rapadas said. "And the youth are the most vulnerable today," he said.

Rapadas added that yesterday's event was unique in that, being a national event, it was held at the same time as in every state and federal jurisdiction to highlight the "nationwide efforts to increase awareness and decrease demand" of the addictive drug.

The crystallized form of the drug is the most prevalent of illegal drugs on Guam, Rapadas said, and accounts for about 90 percent of total seizures.

"We're making headway," Tony Marquez, resident agent in-charge of the Drug Enforcement Administration on Guam, said, in reference to DEA's enforcement efforts.

DOJ_NMG_0100336

But in addition to the seizures of people attempting to sneak in the drug through Guam's ports of entry, local officials have said they have discovered more drug labs that have been set up to manufacture ice on Guam.

As part of the Department of Justice's national effort to combat the use of methamphetamine, an educational presentation was created and is available to the public on the DOJ Web site, www.usdoj.gov/methawareness.

Stop Methamphetamine From Corroding Community (RDC)

By Jennifer Faringer

Rochester Democrat and Chronicle, December 1, 2006

(November 30, 2006) — Today marks National Methamphetamine Awareness Day as sponsored by the U.S. Department of Justice.

The National Council on Alcoholism and Drug Dependence-Rochester Area, a program of DePaul Addiction Services, is engaged in a communitywide campaign to raise awareness to the potential impact of methamphetamine.

With the invaluable input of city/county/state law enforcement, the Monroe County District Attorney's Office, Drug Enforcement Administration, schools, universities and addictions professionals, we are in a position to monitor and work together to prevent the local influx of meth.

Methamphetamine is a powerfully addictive stimulant that dramatically affects the central nervous system, resulting in brain damage that is both more immediate and more severe than that caused by cocaine.

Due to the rapid nature of dependence (in as little as three months) there is very high potential for abuse. Meth abusers experience severe weight loss and damage to blood vessels in the brain (potential stroke) as well as damage to blood vessels in the circulatory system. The chronic meth user appears decades older and is often poorly groomed with skin abscesses and very poor dental hygiene. Psychologically, users experience paranoia, aggression, depression/anxiety, poor memory and confusion.

Methamphetamine is spreading in cities and rural settings previously thought untouched. Nationally, law enforcement reports meth as its No. 1 problem with related arrests increasing 85 percent from 2002 to 2005.

Meth affects not only addicts but their families and their community. In 2005, an estimated 3,000 children were removed from toxic meth lab sites, according to the Partnership for a Drug Free America.

On a community level, 1 pound of meth produces 5 to 6 pounds of hazardous waste. Chemicals used are toxic and often disposed of in streams, fields or sewage systems, contaminating the environment.

Vapors produced during the cooking process permeate walls and carpets of houses and buildings, making them uninhabitable with cleanup costs in the thousands of dollars per site. Many of the chemicals used are highly flammable resulting in explosions that injure not only the meth cooker, but families and neighbors too.

Meth is manufactured from basic and accessible ingredients: ephedrine, red phosphorus, iodine, acetone, anhydrous ammonia, lye and others. One-third is produced in illegal home labs; two-thirds are produced in Mexico and run by organized crime and street gangs.

As parents, educators, clinicians and citizens we can educate ourselves and be aware of the warning signs of meth abuse as well as the telltale signs of its production.

Faringer is director, DePaul's National Council on Alcoholism and Drug Dependence-Rochester Area.

Meth Awareness Day Takes On Special Meaning In Jefferson County (NOW)

NOW-TV, December 1, 2006

Today is National Methamphetamine Awareness Day. In an effort to combat meth labs, the Alcohol and Substance Abuse Council in Jefferson County is embarking on a specific methamphetamine prevention initiative to help ensure that meth stays out of the community. The center is partnering with local law enforcement to make sure that everyone in the community is aware of the effects of meth.

The council said although the meth problem in Jefferson County has not yet reached epidemic proportions, its abuse has the potential to change the very face of a community.

Meth Awareness Day Honored In Virginia (WRC)

WRC-TV, December 1, 2006

Officials Aim To Combat Meth Addiction, Heighten Awareness

FAIRFAX COUNTY, Va. -- The U.S. Department of Justice has declared Thursday the first national Meth Awareness Day to underscore the dangers and highlight the importance of education and awareness about the risks of the highly addictive drug.

In Virginia, government officials joined law enforcement and treatment and prevention specialists in "Meth 360," a demand reduction campaign.

The Fairfax County and Prince William County police departments, along with local community service boards and substance abuse treatment programs, worked with the Partnership for a Drug-Free America to give a "360-degree" perspective on methamphetamine during presentations to community groups, parent coalitions, business associations, faith-based groups, schools and hospitals.

Hundreds of students at West Potomac High School in Alexandria were shown graphic images from a police bust of a local methamphetamine lab on Thursday. Officials said they hope the pictures would deter the students from using the drug, making it or selling it.

The students were shown before and after mugshot pictures of people who were arrested for possessing meth, then rearrested for the same thing a year later.

"The skin in ruins, the hair in ruins, the dramatic weight loss, the wrinkles on the face -- I think, again, it makes the impact of the drug a little bit more immediate, especially to teenagers," said Drugs, Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms Enforcement Agency intelligence analyst Jennifer Loftland.

The DEA said the number of meth labs discovered in Virginia has grown from 5 in 2001 to 52 last year.

"It's absolutely a problem. There's meth coming in from Mexico. There's also locally produced methamphetamine in small clandestine laboratories -- mostly in the rural areas around Virginia," said DEA agent Shawn Johnson.

Agents said it is crucial to talk to students about the dangers of meth early because the largest numbers of meth users are 18 to 25.

Chuck Rosenberg, U.S. Attorney for Virginia's eastern district, said the number of young people using meth in northern Virginia is down, and he would like to keep it that way.

"It ruins lives. It kills people and we need to get the message out," he said.

Officials said that since the Meth 360 program began in July 2006, more than 700 northern Virginia residents have attended 22 of the program's presentations and learned about the effects the drug has on communities and strategies for drug abuse prevention and treatment.

Four Meth 360 presentations have also been televised on the Fairfax Public Access station.

Area Substance Abuse Council's New Novus Center (KCRG)

By Liz Mathis

KCRG-TV Cedar Rapids, December 1, 2006

Vilsack signed a law almost 20 months ago to ban psuedoephedrine purchases in an attempt to try to shut down meth labs.

And Thursday, National Meth Awareness Day, those in the know say the law is working.

U.S. prosecutors, law enforcement and local drug counselors all say they can see a difference in their work since the ban took effect.

"Because these labs have decreased, it's lessened the drain from all the social agencies that deal with these problems, of the poor people that get addicted to methamphetamine," said Shirley Schneider, Novus Director.

DOJ_NMG_0100338

But meth addicts are still finding the drug. That's why the Area Substance Abuse Council (ASAC) qualified for a $1.5 million grant.

Welcome to ASAC's new Novus Center. These office walls will hear stories about meth addiction and all the troubles that come with it.

Experts say meth is still easy to get despite progress to lower access.

These four Novus counselors, one family therapist and case manager will help more than 135 meth addicts a year.

The Novus drug counselors will also use the matrix treatment program, new to Linn County but successful in California.

And when their three-year grant runs out they say the need will still be there.

The federal grant is targeted to help rural areas. They'll serve Linn, Jones and Benton Counties.

ASAC is one of only seven agencies, nationally that received a treatment grant.

Novus is located in the Dows Building in downtown Cedar Rapids.

National Methamphetamine Awareness Day (KAIT)

By Heather Flanigan

KAIT-TV Jonesboro, December 1, 2006

JONESBORO, AR -- The war on drugs is a battle that's been fought across the United States for years... but Thursday the emphasis was on meth, which accounts for up to 90 percent of all drug cases in many Midwest communities.

Thursday is National Methamphetamine Awareness Day but unfortunately, it's a problem that isn't going away soon.

"Methamphetamine is currently the number one most abused drug in the country," said DEA Task Force Officer Roger Case, "Primarily in Arkansas, it's a scourged drug. It's taken the place of almost all the other major drugs including cocaine and crack cocaine as the number one abused drug in the state."

As ASU students listened to a presentation Thursday...the message was clear. Meth equals death.

"It is just so critical that people not make the mistake to try this drug even one time. It's a wicked drug, it's highly addictive and it destroys your body and it will destroy your marriage and it will destroy your job and it will destroy your life," said Bud Cummins, U.S. Attorney for Eastern District of Arkansas.

The traditionally Caucasian drug started out mostly abused by teens...but the demographics have changed. "It's crossed racial and economic barriers...it's a drug for everyone now," said Case.

Missouri leads the nation in seized meth labs...but the drug is found across the U.S.

"In the past it was centered primarily on the west coast, now we still see large numbers of super labs on the west coast but those are dropping thanks to a national effort to curtail the distribution and importation of ephedrine and pseudoephedrine," said Case.

Methamphetamine use among high school seniors more than doubled between 1990 & 1996.

National Meth Awareness Day (KTHV)

By Melissa Dunbar

KTHV-Tv Little Rock, December 1, 2006

President Bush declared Thursday National Methamphetamine Awareness Day. In addition, he's asking for $25 million in his 2007 budget for recovery programs for addicts. Here locally, Arkansas DEA agents are busy fighting the spread of meth coming in from Mexico.

In his more than 30 years in law enforcement, DEA Assistant Special Agent in Charge Bill Bryant says meth is by far the most devastating drug he's seen.

Bryant says, "It is highly addictive and psychologically affects those who use it. They become very paranoid; they live for it and depend on it."

Bryant's team consists of DEA offices in Little Rock, Fayetteville and Fort Smith. They're mostly busy tracking the crystal or ice form of meth coming straight from Mexico.

Bryant says, "Here in Arkansas, we have Interstate 30, Interstate 40, Interstate 55—all major turnpikes, which are routes traffickers use."

DOJ_NMG_0100339

The amount of meth labs found in Arkansas has gone down since 2005 when a new state law went into effect. That's the law that requires you to show your drivers license when buying any medicine with pseudoephedrine in it. It is designed to keep the manufacturers from going from store to store buying one of meth's main ingredients.

Bryant says, "We were able to attack the small labs in Arkansas, but the Mexican traffic has picked up the slack to furnish this meth ice. We're seeing all over Arkansas meth ice seizures."

Bryant thinks National Meth Awareness Day is a good idea; one that he hopes opens eyes.

He says, "It's just a drug I've never seen so catastrophic to people. People who go into treatment, it's not a 30-day treatment. It takes a long time to get off methamphetamine."

While President Bush wants to reduce the number of domestic meth labs by 25 percent in three years, methamphetamine use appears to be growing. A government report shows it used to be a problem only in rural areas west of the Mississippi, but now meth use is being reported along the East Coast, in Connecticut and Maine for example. In Washington D.C., meth use is up 115 percent.

DEA Agents Seizing More Homemade Meth Labs; Smugglers Filling Void (WAVE)

By Caton Bredar

WAVE-TV Louisville, December 1, 2006

(LOUISVILLE) -- A large seizure last week of meth brought into Kentucky from Mexico underscores the point drug enforcement officials hoped to make through Methamphetamine Awareness Day -- which was Thursday, November 30. Despite the decrease in actual labs throughout Kentuckiana, as WAVE 3's Caton Bredar reports, the dangers of meth may be greater than ever.

By any name, in many forms, Richard Badarraco, a DEA Assistant Special Agent in Louisville, will tell you the results are the same.

"Meth mutilates," he says. "It has more consequences than any drug we've ever been up against."

California motorcycle gangs made it notorious in the 60s. By the 1980s, meth reached the Midwest. The devastation remains the same.

"The physical aspects of an individual within a short period of time of becoming hooked on methamphetamine can just be devastating, in terms of health issues, in terms of general appearance," says Assistant U.S. Attorney/Deputy Criminal Chief Philip C. Chance.

According to DEA agents, the number of meth labs locally and nationwide is down, thanks partly to restrictions placed on common cold medicines. That's the good news.

The bad news is part of the on-going problem itself: with meth lab seizures declining, imports of a more highly concentrated form of the drug -- often called Crystal Meth or Ice -- are coming from south of the border. Officials say 80 percent of meth in this country is coming from Mexico.

"We had an enforcement effort last week, where, here in the area, we arrested a Mexican trafficking organization and seized 25 pounds of methamphetamine. That's huge."

Regardless of where its manufactured, the effects of meth hit too close to home, with volatile labs located in residential neighborhoods, ready to explode at a moment's notice.

"It's a major thing," says Chance, "when you as a prosecutor, standing in court, are asking a judge to send a guy away for 10 years of their life, and for that guy to come up to you and say thank you."

As DEA agents emphasize, the biggest danger the public faces with meth is believing it's not your problem.

DEA officials say the street value of that meth from Mexico seized last week is around $16,000 a pound. So the 25 pounds totaled roughly $400,000.

The U.S. Attorney's office is working with international authorities, as well as state and local agencies, to try and control the distribution of pseudophedrine, one of the main substances used in the manufacture of meth.

National Meth Awareness Day (ENM)

By Tenikka Smith

Eyewitness News Memphis, December 1, 2006

The Drug Enforcement Agency is reporting some shocking numbers. The DEA says Tennessee is responsible for 75 percent of meth lab seizures in the Southeast.

The agency says most of the methamphetamine used in the state is being brought in from Mexico and the Southwest Border area.

Meth manufacturing is an ongoing problem across the country, but government and law enforcement agencies are fighting back.

Several meth task force units have been formed in recent years and there are also new laws restricting products used to make the drug, including pseudoephedrine and household chemicals. Officials say these measures have helped to reduce the number of operating meth labs.

According to a White House study, approximately 12 million people have tried meth at least once, 1.4 milllion people used it in the past year.

East Texas Law Enforcement Talks About Meth Problem (KLTV)

By Molly Reuter

KLTV-TV Tyler, December 1, 2006

Across the nation and locally law enforcement agencies gathered Thursday in support of Methamphetamine Awareness Day. The goal of the national campaign is to raise awareness about meth use. Here in East Texas there is some good news,.

You may not like having to get what used to be over the counter medications like pseudoephedrine from a pharmacist, but law enforcement officials say that hassle is actually keeping the community safer.

"The meth labs have dropped almost 100 percent in the last three years, and that's two fold," said DEA Agent Richard Sanders. "One and most significantly because of House Bill 164." House Bill 164, which went into affect in August of 2005, took meth's key ingredient pseudoephedrine off the counters. In fiscal year 2005, before the bill, the Drug Enforcement Agency in Tyler responded to 33 meth labs, costing taxpayers more than $155,000. After the bill, in 2006 the number of labs dropped to just 13. So far in fiscal year 2007, the DEA says they've only broken up one meth lab. The DEA says that doesn't mean the drug has left East Texas.

"Right now from our office, approximately 99 percent of the methamphetamine or the ice that we are running into are from a host country," said Sanders. State Representative Leo Berman, who helped write House Bill 164, says the state understands this problem.

"We are going to completely fund the sheriff's department, DPS, and local police departments along the border, so they can increase the tight weaponry to compete with the automatic weapons that the Mexican drug cartel has in smuggling this stuff across the border," said Leo Berman State Representative, District 6. Until then, law enforcement asks East Texans to take control of their communities by helping get rid of the drug all together.

Last March, a joint investigation between state and federal agencies broke a major methemphatmine ring in East Texas, known as Operation Icebox. That meth was being brought in from Mexico. The DEA says the organization responsible no longer exists.

Bay Area Teachers Give Lesson On Meth (KNTV)

KNTV-TV San Jose, December 1, 2006

Students at a San Francisco high school got a different kind of lesson Thursday.

It was part of a new national campaign to raise awareness about one of the nation's most dangerous street drugs -- methamphetamine.

NBC11's Joe Rosato talked to teachers who told their students that meth is a dangerous drug.

The teachers also said for every pound of meth made, there are 5 pounds of toxic waste left behind.

Teachers told Rosato that of all the lessons taught at San Francisco's School of the Arts, the lesson about meth is the most urgent.

DOJ_NMG_0100341

Methamphetamine is a synthetic street drug considered to be among the most addictive.

"It's probably our most dangerous drug that's out there as far as destroying families destroying lives," said Javier Pena of the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration.

Agents from the DEA held similar classes across the country Thursday as part of the first national methamphetamine awareness day.

The DEA said even though it's successfully shut down hundreds of California's illegal meth labs, the drug remains a major problem in the Bay Area.

"We're getting our methamphetamine from Mexico back into California. It's still out in the streets. The purity level is very high," Pena said.

The warnings about drugs and addiction weren't lost on high school students attending the event, Rosato reported.

They said the drugs are readily available at every turn.

"You see it every day in the streets and it's kind of hard because you never know ... that could be you one day," said a student named Brittany.

The DEA said it hopes the national campaign will keep young people from experimenting with the highly addictive drug.

They said it's a lesson better taught in the classroom than on the street.

NC Cracking Down On Meth Labs (N14CHAR)

By Jennifer Moxley

News 14 Charlotte, December 1, 2006

CHARLOTTE – November 30 was proclaimed National Methamphetamine Awareness Day by President Bush, who has set a national goal of reducing the number of methamphetamine labs in the country by 25 percent in the next three years.

“Meth is one [drug] that leads to the highest concentration of dopamine in the brain, and this is likely to account for the fact that methamphetamine is one of the most addictive of all the drugs of abuse,” said Dr. Nora Volkow of the National Institute of Drug Abuse.

One of the most common ingredients in the production of meth is pseudo-ephedrine – something that is also a common ingredient in several cold medications that can be purchased without a prescription.

In order to combat meth use, state lawmakers passed a law in January that placed restrictions on the amount of those medications that can be purchased, and required that they were moved from their place on the pharmacy shelves to behind the counter.

The law appears to be working, as the number of meth labs in North Carolina failed to rise for the first time since 1999.

Despite the decrease in meth labs, officials say that the fight is far from over.

“The numbers of clandestine mom and pop meth labs may be declining, but the number of methamphetamines on the street is increasing, and it’s coming from Mexico,” said George Holding, the United States Attorney for the Eastern District of North Carolina.

With the reduction of meth labs within the state, North Carolina plans to put resources towards reducing meth trafficking and use. The U.S. Attorney’s office is busy training state and local agents – as well as state prosecutors – on methamphetamine-related crime.

The Drug Enforcement Administration webpage will post locations in each state where known methamphetamine clandestine labs or dumpsites were located so that individuals can be aware of possible meth contaminated sites within their communities. This is the first such national listing of seized former meth sites available to the public.

"Methamphetamine Awareness Day" In Bucks (WFMZ)

WFMZ-TV Online, December 1, 2006

Bucks County is marking "Methamphetamine Awareness Day." The federal DEA held an educational presentation this morning to teach the community about the dangers of the hazards and dangers of the drug. WFMZ's Eve Tannery will have the details on 69 News at Noon. The Bucks County Council on Alcoholism and Drug Dependence also participated in the event, which included a demonstration project. Participants got a bird's eye view of the discovery of a clandestine lab by local law enforcement, and the subsequent apprehension of a suspected meth "cook".

BERMAN HONORED FOR LEGISLATION THAT LIMITS METH MANUFACTURE (TMT)

By Jacque Hilburn

Tyler (TX) Morning Telegraph, December 1, 2006

State Rep. Leo Berman was honored Thursday as part of National Methamphetamine Awareness Day, an observation designed to stress drug prevention, education and treatment.

Berman led the charge to pass HB 164 in August, which requires retailers to remove medications used in the manufacture of methamphetamine from the shelves and place them behind the pharmacy counter.

Officials from the Eastern District U.S. Attorney's Office, Drug Enforcement Administration, FBI and Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives paused to acknowledge the representative's efforts.

"There was a problem with the cold pills being readily available," said Mary Ann Cozby, assistant U.S. attorney. "Today, they are behind the counter and locked up - we appreciate Leo Berman's diligence."

As part of the new legislation, people may purchase certain medications only in limited quantities after registering their identification with the pharmacy.

DEA agent Richard Sanders said meth production creates a multitude of problems and risks for law enforcement, families and communities. Chemicals used to create the drugs are hazardous, explosive and costly to remediate.

In 2005, 33 labs were discovered, Sanders said, adding, "To clean up, that cost taxpayers $150,000. In 2006, there have been 13 labs, costing $58,000."

Authorities attributed the reduction to tighter restrictions on purchasing.

Berman said he was approached about three years ago by federal officials to push for change.

And even though there is legislation in place to address the problem, there's still work to do, he said.

"I'd like to go to an electronic system," he said. "Right now all the purchasing logs are on paper. I'd like there to be a centralized Web site so law enforcement can see who is purchasing" the items.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Alan R. Jackson presented Berman with a resolution, acknowledging the positive outcome of the bill.

"HB 164 has resulted in a significant, measurable reduction in the prevalence of illicit methamphetamine labs in the East Texas area," he said.

In a written statement, U.S. Attorney Matthew D. Orwig, who was out of town on business, said increased awareness of the problem will be critical in addressing it.

"Events like this are so important because they bring the facts to the public," he said. "Meth is a powerful poison. It kills the user while destroying the family and environment."

Additional information about the harmful effects of the drug can be obtained at USDOJ.

State Representative Wants To Use Technology To Fight Meth Production (LNJ)

By ADAM J. HOLLAND

Longview (TX) News Journal, December 1, 2006

Berman honored for fight against drug

TYLER — Even though state Rep. Leo Berman, R-Tyler, was pleased to be honored by federal officials Thursday for his fight against illegal drugs, he said there is still more work to be done.

As part of National Methamphetamine Awareness Day, Berman was presented with a resolution in Tyler by U.S. Attorney Matthew D. Orwig, recognizing his contribution to fighting the production of meth in East Texas.

Berman co-authored and introduced Texas House Bill 164 in 2004, which led to the 2005 law that medications containing pseudoephedrine must be kept behind the counter at pharmacies.

DOJ_NMG_0100343

PSE is a common ingredient in over-the-counter cold medication and is also used to manufacture illegal methamphetamine.

The law also requires that customers are allowed to purchase only two packages of PSE products at a time, and that customer identities are recorded.

Berman wants to take the law one step further, which could make investigations into meth manufacturing more efficient and effective, he said.

"I'd like to go to electronic filing of pseudoephedrine purchases so that law enforcement officials statewide can see records on a Web site," Berman said.

He said he would then like to tackle the problem of meth traffickers coming into Texas from Mexico, with additional manpower and tools — including high-powered weapons — to city, county and state law enforcement agencies near the border.

"We've eliminated many of the meth labs here (in Texas), but refined meth crack is being manufactured in Mexico and being brought to Texas ready to sell," Berman said. "The Mexican drug cartels are using high-powered weapons, and we should do anything we can to help put a stop to the meth traffic."

While federal law enforcement officials did not address Mexican meth labs Thursday, they touted that the number of clandestine meth labs seized in East Texas was reduced from 13 in federal fiscal year 2006 to one so far in the 2007 fiscal year.

The federal fiscal year runs from Oct. 1 to Sept. 30 the following year.

"And we only found it Tuesday night in Upshur County," DEA agent Richard Sanders said, declining to give more details.

Statewide, the number of meth lab seizures declined by 62 percent during the seven months after Aug. 1, 2005, when Berman's bill became law, according to a report released Thursday by the White House Office of National Drug Control Policy.

The same period one year earlier yielded 285 seizures.

Additionally, workplace drug testing results showed a 14.8 percent decrease in positive tests for amphetamine during the first five months in 2006, compared to the same period a year earlier, the report showed.

National Methamphetamine Awareness Day was sponsored by the U.S. Department of Justice to generate awareness about the effects of meth abuse on people, families and communities.

"Almost every drug case these days has a meth connection. I'm just amazed at how prevalent it is," said Alan R. Jackson, assistant U.S. attorney. "Meth is just killing those people."

Officials Call Attention To Spread Of Meth Problems (NSDY/AP)

By Dave Collins

AP, November 30, 2006

HARTFORD, Conn. -- The two maps displayed by federal and state officials at the Capitol on Thursday showed the alarming spread of methamphetamine problems across the country.

For example in 1992, only Oregon had 40 or more people per 100,000 population being treated for meth use. The other map showed that by 2004, most states west of the Mississippi had that treatment rate.

The problems are clearly spreading to the eastern half of the United States, and top state and federal officials in Connecticut said Thursday that they have anti-meth efforts underway but they also need help from the public.

"It's headed right toward us," U.S. Attorney Kevin O'Connor said. "This year, it's not a major problem. But if we ignore it, we're not proactive, it could soon become a major problem and then we will all be paying the price for that."

O'Connor was joined by Gov. M. Jodi Rell and officials from state and federal law enforcement and public health agencies on the first National Methamphetamine Awareness Day sponsored by the U.S. Department of Justice.

Officials said they were unaware of statistics showing that the number of workplace employees testing positive for meth surged 35 percent in Connecticut during the first five months of the year, compared with the same period in 2005.

The data by New Jersey-based Quest Diagnostics Inc. showed the number of workers testing positive for meth dipped dramatically in several Midwest and western states, but surged along the East Coast.

Federal authorities describe meth as a powerful, highly addictive drug that dramatically affects the central nervous system. Its most common ingredient is pseudoephedrine or ephedrine, which are found in cold medicines.

DOJ_NMG_0100344

But other ingredients used to make meth create health and public safety hazards, officials say. They include ether, paint thinner, acetone, drain cleaner and battery acid. Those ingredients make meth-producing labs toxic and potentially explosive.

Officials said the public can help by reporting any signs of potential meth-making activity, such as a strong smell of ammonia, urine or ether, propane tanks with fittings that have turned blue and large amounts of discarded cold tablet containers.

Meth users often pick or scratch their skin, creating open sores that may become infected. They also often grind their teeth and clench their jaws.

One of the first indicators that the meth problem had reached Connecticut came in June 2005, when police discovered meth labs in two homes in East Hampton.

The busts came after authorities got a tip from a farm supply store owner, who reported some people buying large amounts of iodine solution, another meth ingredient. Three people were arrested.

Authorities said two meth labs have been found in Connecticut this year.

Brian Crowell, a top Drug Enforcement Administration agent in Connecticut, said there isn't a scourge of meth labs in the state, probably because they are more difficult to hide here than in rural states. He also said meth could be making its way to Connecticut through well-established drug distribution routes.

Most of the meth in the United States is coming from so-called "super labs" in Mexico, Crowell said.

The DEA has agents trained to deal with meth labs, and it has trained more than 1,500 police officers and emergency responders in New England on handling the drug factories.

"If you produce or traffic methamphetamine in Connecticut, you will be apprehended and you will go to jail," Crowell said.

Rell said a new federal law that took effect Sept. 30 is helping to fight the problem. The law bans over-the-counter sales of certain cold medicines that have ingredients used to make meth, including pseudoephedrine and ephedrine. It requires consumers to show a photo identification, and they can only buy a 30-day supply of such medicines.

The governor said she would be calling on the legislature next year to increase the penalties for selling or manufacturing meth. Proposals she made earlier this year were not approved in the 2006 legislative session.

Under Rell's plan, first-time violators could face up to 15 years in prison and/or a fine up to $50,000. For a second offense, they'd face up to 30 years in prison and/or a fine up to $100,000. Subsequent offenses would call for an automatic 30-year prison term with a fine of up to $250,000.

"We need to send that message that the sale and possession of this drug will land you in jail," Rell said.

State Hopes To Thwart Growth Of Meth Use (NHR)

By Gregory B. Hladky

New Haven Register, December 1, 2006

HARTFORD — If your neighbor's house stinks of cat urine and you see piles of empty Sudafed packages in their trash, state and federal law enforcement officials want to know right away.

Although it may sound bizarre, those are two of the indicators that the occupants of that house could be running an illegal lab to create the highly addictive and dangerous drug methamphetamine.

Thursday was National Methamphetamine Awareness Day and key federal and state officials used the occasion to urge residents to help keep "the scourge of methamphetamine" from overrunning this state.

"We're lucky that it hasn't taken hold (in Connecticut) as it has in so many other states," said Gov. M. Jodi Rell. She said law enforcement officials in Connecticut are using a coordinated approach to try and stifle the use of meth here before it becomes a major drug problem.

Kevin J. O'Connor, the U.S. attorney for Connecticut, said authorities last year shut down three meth labs in this state and two more were discovered this year.

O'Connor called meth, also known on the street as "ice," "crank" or "speed," a "very addictive, deadly and devastating drug."

O'Connor said that, in 1992, the only state with a documented meth problem was Oregon. Today, virtually every western state has active meth addicts.

DOJ_NMG_0100345

One reason meth hasn't spread in a major way to the northeastern U.S. is that illegal meth labs that manufacture the drug tend to be both dangerous and very smelly. Such labs are much more easily concealed in the vast rural areas of western and Midwestern states than in highly urbanized areas such as Connecticut.

A new federal law that took effect Sept. 30 requires pharmacies to get photo identification and keep records on people who buy cold medicines like Sudafed that contain pseudoephedrine or ephedrine, two of the substances most commonly "cooked" down in illegal labs to create meth.

O'Connor said states that have passed their own laws requiring such restrictions on those cold medicines have seen a dramatic reduction in locally produced meth.

Other materials used in making meth include diet aides, drain cleaners containing lye, acetone, brake cleaner, iodine solution or crystals, camp stove fuel, rubbing alcohol, engine starting fluid, paint thinner, Freon benzene and battery acid.

Officials said the meth "cooking" process can be dangerous in terms of fire and the hazardous chemicals used, and also because the process creates toxic waste products that are potentially serious environmental pollutants.

One byproduct of a meth lab is the smell it produces, which experts describe as something like ammonia or cat urine.

Shutting down meth labs won't solve the whole problem, officials warned, because so-called "meth super-labs" are now in operation in Mexico, creating large quantities of the drug for the U.S. market.

Meth is being smuggled into this country along the same supply chains used to bring in heroin and cocaine, according to state Public Safety Commissioner Leonard C. Boyle.

But Brian R. Crowell, special agent in charge in this state for the federal Drug Enforcement Administration, said it isn't inevitable that meth will join cocaine and heroin as a major problem drug in Connecticut, and that it's possible to "be aggressive and keep it from getting a foothold here."

Rell said she will ask the 2007 General Assembly to create stiffer penalties for possession and sale of methamphetamine.

Group To Monitor Spread Of Meth (PROJO)

By Tom Mooneyjournal

The Providence Journal, December 1, 2006

CRANSTON — A group of health officials and law enforcement representatives came together yesterday to raise awareness of a drug plague that they say has so far spared much of New England but will come.

The spread of methamphetamine use and addiction has ravaged other parts of the country, said U.S. Attorney Robert Corrente. In Hawaii, for instance, methamphetamine addiction has surpassed alcohol abuse, he said. We want "to get out in front of the problem and be prepared when the problem is here," Corrente said.

To do so, Corrente and others announced the formation of a coalition of experts to monitor and hopefully prevent the drug's spread. The announcement coincided with similar announcements being made across the country as part of National Methamphetamine Awareness Day.

Dr. Ellen Nelson, director of the state Department of Mental Health Retardation and Hospitals, said methamphetamine "is a very potent substance that here at the department of MHRH we are concerned about."

Methamphetamine is a highly addictive stimulant, she said, that can devastate the central nervous system. It comes in several forms, including powder, crystal, rocks and tablets. When the drug is "cooked" into crystals, it is called crystal meth.

Long-term meth users often experience anxiety, sleeplessness, confusion, violent rages and cravings for more of the drug. It can also produce a condition known as "meth mouth," a serious deterioration of teeth and gums.

The Drug Enforcement Agency reported that in 2005 about 20 methamphetamine labs were discovered in New England. In contrast, there were 2,176 such discoveries in Missouri last year, the DEA reported.

The only significant methamphetamine case to emerge in Rhode Island in the last year involved two Rhode Island men who were charged last month for allegedly running a meth lab in Coventry.

Corrente said the local prevalence of cheap heroin and cocaine is perhaps the reason New England has yet to see widespread abuse of methamphetamines.

DOJ_NMG_0100346

"Even though we are among the last states to witness the ravages of methamphetamine addiction," said Corrente, "we would be foolish to believe that the spread of methamphetamine will stop at our borders."

The first way to attack the problem, he said, was by raising awareness of the problem. Women looking to lose weight and college students determine to stay awake to study, could easily become addicted to methamphetamine use if they tried it as an alternative to "speed" drugs.

The coalition will include members of the U.S. Attorney's office, the Drug Enforcement Administration, the governor's office, the state attorney general's office, the MHRH, the departments of health and education, and substance abuse treatment agencies such as CODAC.

Corrente said members of the coalition will, for now, meet once every few months to discuss ways to educate people about the dangers of the drug.

Attorney General Patrick C. Lynch also announced, in recognition of the national awareness day, that he would, for a second year, submit legislation to toughen penalties for the manufacture and possession of methamphetamine.

Law Officials Eye 'meth' Flow (NHUL)

By Rick Dumont

The New Hampshire Union Leader, December 1, 2006

Seabrook – Last month law enforcement officials netted the largest ever methamphetamine bust in New England history.

Two of the four individuals arrested in connection with transporting 12 pounds of the 99-percent pure drug into New Hampshire were arrested in Seabrook.

The other two were arrested in Lynn, Mass.

All four were indicted this month on federal narcotics charges and could face life in prison if convicted.

What has law enforcement and government officials on edge is that the four all came to the area by way of Atlanta just to try and open a market for the highly addictive and dangerous drug.

Arthur Soto-Saavedra, Omar Hervis, Jose Ambriz and Tyler James all are being held in federal custody pending trials currently scheduled for Dec. 12, U.S. Attorney for New Hampshire Tom Colantuono said. Soto-Saavedra is a Mexican national who was living in Atlanta.

In a press conference at the Seabrook Police station yesterday morning, Colantuono, along with Rockingham County Attorney Jim Reams, law enforcement officials from several agencies in Massachusetts, New Hampshire, the DEA and state health officials spoke on the arrest and what plans officials have to keep New Hampshire and New England from becoming inundated with the notorious drug.

Worth over a million dollars on the street, 12 pounds of "crystal meth" is enough to feed the habits of thousands of people, officials said.

"These people were attempting to establish a market for crystal methamphetamine in the New England area," Colantuono said.

Court documents allege undercover officials had contact with Soto-Saavedra and had arranged the buy with him and Hervis. Ambriz and James, ages 19 and 20 respectively, were transporting the drug from Atlanta for the sale on Oct. 24.

Through their investigation officials discovered there was not a steady stream of meth coming into New England, and that several dealers were "struggling to get a distribution network set up to capture the market," court records showed.

DEA officials dealt with Soto-Saavedra and Hervis who was the so-called debt enforcer for Soto-Saavedra's operation to arrange the buy, court records showed.

In response to the growing nationwide problem of crystal meth manufacturing distribution and use, Nov. 30 has been dubbed National Methamphetamine Awareness Day by both the President and Gov. John Lynch.

As such officials, in addition to announcing the arrests, spoke about their plan to help keep the scourge of meth from devastating families and communities in New England like has happened in several Midwestern states.

E-mail Warns College Students Of Meth Dangers (AP)

Associated Press, December 1, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0100347

ATLANTA - Georgia college students will soon be getting an e-mail warning them of the dangers of methamphetamine.

The e-mail, which features graphic photos of meth users with oozing sores and rotting teeth, will be sent to the 260,000 Georgia college students at the state's 35 schools in the coming days. The initiative was announced at a state Capitol news conference on Thursday by U.S. Attorney David Nahmias and other state and federal law enforcement and education officials.

"It's an ugly, painful way to go," the e-mail says.

Law enforcement officials stressed that meth is a highly addictive drug and students who might use it to stay awake to study for exams or heighten sexual performance are in for a long recovery program down the road.

"There are no recreational meth users," Sherri Strange, head of the Drug Enforcement Administration's Atlanta office, said. "Your first hit and you're hooked."

While the number of mom-and-pop meth labs in Georgia has declined in recent years, the state has become a hub for traffickers bringing pure forms of crystal meth over the border from Mexico, officials said.

The education initiative in Georgia is part of National Meth Awareness Day.

Graphic Meth Anti-drug Ads Await Students (AJC)

By Saeed Ahmed

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, November 30, 2006

As more than 300,000 college students in Georgia open their school-provided e-mail in-boxes in the next few days, they will be greeted by disturbing images of young people with bloodied faces, rotting teeth and backs covered with scabs.

This is how state officials plan to drive home the point to the 18-to-25 year-old set about the dangers of methamphetamine.

The U.S. Attorney's Office in Atlanta, along with state officials and representatives from the state's public and private colleges, announced the e-mail campaign in a news conference at the state Capitol on Thursday morning in observance of "National Meth Awareness Day."

More than 100 activities are planned nationwide Thursday, but Georgia's approach is unique, officials said.

Some colleges began sending out the e-mails Thursday; others might not get around to it until Friday. The pictures are graphic:

A close-up of a girl's mouth — blackened crooked teeth and dark red sores on her lips — is paired with the message: "You'll never worry about lipstick on your teeth again."

In another, a teenager with hollow eyes and a disfigured face stares out at the viewer. The text underneath: "Actually, doing meth won't make it easier to hook up."

"A lot of young people, they aren't scared of dying. But they don't want to be ugly," said U.S. Attorney David Nahmias, explaining how the images can be effective in curbing methamphetamine use. "[These pictures show that] if you use meth, you will be unhappy and ugly."

Authorities zeroed in on the college-aged demographic because national studies show they are the most likely to use methamphetamine.

Meth use among all Georgia age groups is five times the national average, but the state ranks in the bottom eighth nationally in recorded meth use by 18-to-25-year olds, official said.

Becky Vaughn, president of the Georgia Council on Substance Abuse, said the agencies were targeting the college-age students in hopes that they could "stop it now before it becomes a problem."

Metro Atlanta also has become one of the leading distribution centers. Six of the 14 significant seizures nationally since 2005 have been in Georgia, including the largest on record – 378 pounds in Hall County in August, said Drug Enforcement Administration Special Agent Sherri Strange.

"If this amount is coming into Georgia, then a good portion is being used," Strange said.

The contents of the e-mail were sent to the colleges and universities for distribution. The federal government was not given the students' e-mail addresses, Nahmias said.

The University System of Georgia will be sending out the message to each of its 260,000 students in 35 campuses. Another 60,000 students in 25 private colleges will receive the e-mails, as will more than 12,000 students at Emory University.

New Push To Halt Meth Abuse (WXIA)

WXIA-TV Atlanta, December 1, 2006

On the campus of Georgia State University it seems everyone knows someone who has abused methamphetamine.

"You know, their teeth rot out, they are really strung out they get little weird clicks and just act not normal. It's really kind of sad," said student Carrie Newman.

"It affects their relationships, their work, their motor skills, how they act, and their emotions. Big changes," said Brett Opstad.

Meth use is more prevalent among 18 to 25 year olds than any other age group.

Officials with the U.S. Justice Department Thursday announced a joint effort with several other agencies to get the word out about the dangers of this highly addictive drug.

"Today's meth is a drug that if used even once can have very real and very negative consequences," said U.S. Attorney David Nahmias.

"Meth is probably the most dangerous and devastating drug I've seen in my career. It's dangerous to the user and their family. There are no recreational users. The first hit and you're hooked," said D.E.A Agent Sherri Strange.

In the coming days, 300,000 Georgia college students will receive an e-mail outlining what the drug can do to teeth, skin, and lives. The email includes graphic pictures of methamphetamine's effects on real people.

"This is one of many steps the justice department is taking against meth. We all know meth kills and when enough people understand that we will have made a difference in our communities and made them a safer places to live," said Nahmias.

FBI Director Visits Richmond (RTD)

By Mark Bowes, TIMES-DISPATCH STAFF WRITER

Richmond Times-Dispatch, December 1, 2006

FBI Director Robert S. Mueller paid a visit to the bureau's Richmond office yesterday to talk with local agents and review the agency's priorities, ranging from terrorism to public corruption.

Mueller has visited 37 of the agency's 50 field offices across the country this year to talk strategy and become better acquainted with local operations. Under tight security, he spoke briefly with Richmond reporters yesterday before flying by helicopter to his next stop - the bureau's Norfolk office.

"Since Sept. 11, our first priority is preventing another terrorist attack," said Mueller, who was sworn in as director seven days before the attacks. "And consequently, there is not a lead that does not go unreviewed, not a lead that we do not pursue when it comes to the threat of terrorism. So that has been a substantial change for us."

In addition to terrorism, the bureau also has prioritized violent crime - particularly murder and gang activity - along with public corruption, cyber crime and counterintelligence initiatives. "And they've done great work in [the Richmond] division over a substantial period of time in each one of these areas," Mueller said.

The Richmond division, he added, has done a very good job in investigating public-corruption cases.

"There have been some arrests recently that have become fairly well known," he said. "And I will tell you - not just with this division but across the country - public corruption has been our No. 1 criminal priority. Over the last two years, we've convicted more than 1,700 officials at the federal, state and local level who have abused the trust and broken the laws."

Mueller said the bureau's success is largely dependent on its relationships with state and local law-enforcement agencies, and those ties are especially good in the Richmond area, he said.

"I'm very pleased to know that down here we have exceptional relationships with [Chief] Rodney Monroe of the Richmond Police Department, with whom I worked when I was in Washington," Mueller said. Contact staff writer Mark Bowes at mbowes@timesdispatch.com or (804) 649-6450.

Richmond Division Of FBI Fighting Cyber Crimes (WRIC)

WRIC-TV, December 1, 2006

The Richmond division of the FBI is making strides in the fight against violent and cyber crime. That's according to FBI director Robert Mueller, who made a stop here Thursday. Mueller says Richmond special agents working with state and local law enforcement are more effective than ever.

He also applauds outreach programs aimed at the area's Muslim community.

FBI Director Robert Mueller says, "We are your friends we want to work with you to prevent terrorist attacks and that to the extent you can be helpful, we need your help."

According to Mueller, the bureau's top priority here and across the country is counter-terrorism.

FBI Chief: Hampton Roads Unit Vital To Agency Work (DPHR)

By Beverly N. Williams 247-4755

Daily Press, December 1, 2006

Robert S. Mueller III visits the region's field office in Norfolk, praising its investigations.

NORFOLK -- Cyber crime, terrorism, public corruption and violent crime are among the chief concerns for FBI agents working in the Hampton Roads area, the agency's director said Thursday during a stop at the Norfolk office.

"Norfolk is a very important city given the naval contingent," said Robert S. Mueller III. The FBI's Norfolk Division "also is important to us, and it has done tremendous work over the last several years, whether it's terrorism, cyber crime, public corruption or violent crime," he said.

"Each of these are priorities for the FBI, and we've made substantial strides in this division against these various threats," said Mueller, who was appointed by President Bush to head the agency in September 2001, just seven days before the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks.

Mueller, who flew in from Washington by helicopter to meet with FBI agents in Hampton Roads on Thursday, said part of the division's success stems from its agents working closely with local and state law enforcement officials. One such collaboration focuses on cyber crime in Hampton Roads.

"Cyber crime is our number three priority," Mueller said during a short press conference at the FBI's Norfolk office. "We're concerned about the ability of government-sponsored hackers to address our naval or military capabilities or the infrastructure. We're concerned about individual hackers that can cause millions if not billions of dollars in damage, not just here but around the world."

Other cyber issues include child pornography, the migration of child pornography to the Internet and the luring of children on the Internet, he said.

"All of these are areas in the cyber arena that we have built up over the past three to four years, so we have the capability of undertaking these investigations and gathering the evidence and having successful prosecutions," Mueller said. "And this division is one of those that's been in the forefront of this activity."

In 2003, the FBI's Norfolk Division created the Cyber Crime Working Group, whose members include the Virginia State Police, the U.S. Attorney's Office, the U.S. Secret Service, U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement, and police departments from Newport News, Hampton, Norfolk, Virginia Beach and Chesapeake. The Naval Criminal Investigative Service and the NASA Office of the Inspector General also participate.

Mueller said that while some people have lost confidence in the bureau because of things such as the espionage case involving Robert Hanssen, a former FBI counterintelligence agent, the agency is improving as an organization.

The bureau is also growing as domestic and global agency, he said.

"We've reviewed our security, and we're more flexible and more responsive, but we still have a way to go," Mueller said. "There's not anyone in the FBI who doesn't understand that we need to improve and grow to protect the United States against those who want to hurt us."

FBI Director: Agency More Sensitive To Rights (VP)

By Tim Mcglone

Virginian-Pilot, December 1, 2006

NORFOLK - The FBI has changed the way its agents deal with members of the Muslim and Arab American communities in light of criticisms that followed post-9/11 terrorism investigations, the agency's director said Thursday.

FBI Director Robert S. Mueller III spoke briefly with reporters at the agency's Norfolk field office after meeting with agents as part of a periodic visit.

Counterterrorism became the FBI's No. 1 priority after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks in New York and Washington.

But the agency had been criticized for heavy-handed tactics, in Hampton Roads and nationally.

Mueller defended the initial response by his agents but said procedures have changed.

"In the wake of Sept. 11, quite obviously we did not know what we had on our hands," said Mueller, who became director only seven days before the attack.

"We did not know whether we had any additional hijackers in the United States," he added. "There was some substantial threat of a second wave."

He said agents immediately spread out across the country searching for accomplices in the attacks and interviewing flight school students. Several of the hijackers had taken lessons to learn how to fly the jets that were hijacked.

Sometimes, Mueller said, people were detained on outstanding warrants or immigration issues even though they had no knowledge of the attacks or information on the hijackers.

Often those people were detained for extended periods of time, a tactic that was called into question by the Justice Department's inspector general.

A 2003 report by the inspector general found that the FBI had violated the civil rights of hundreds of immigrants, most of Middle Eastern and South Asian descent.

"What the inspector general rightfully pointed out is that we should have done a better job in looking at the status of each of those individuals, even though they were rightfully detained, in terms of how long they were detained," Mueller said.

"We have changed our processes to make sure we look at that status immediately," he said.

He would not provide additional information Thursday on why two of the Sept. 11 hijackers had visited Hampton Roads in the months prior to the attacks. The pair, Mohamed Atta and Marwan al-Shehhi, stayed at a local hotel, cashed checks for $18,000 and visited a small grocery store in Newport News.

During his meeting with agents, Mueller said he heard their frustrations about a lack of personnel and frequent transfers, issues he said he is addressing.

Wreck involving officer kills baby

DALLAS -- A 9-month-old boy died late Tuesday and a police officer was seriously injured in a collision in south Dallas County, officials said. The child, Cortlan Jefferson of Dallas, died about 8:30 p.m. at Children's Medical Center in Dallas after the wreck in the 1900 block of Hampton Road in Glenn Heights, said a spokeswoman for the Dallas County medical examiner's office. The accident occurred about 8 p.m. when an Ovilla police patrol car collided with a car carrying the child and his mother, NBC5i.com reported. That vehicle was trying to make a left turn. The officer was ejected from the patrol car, which rolled over several times, officials said. She was airlifted to Baylor Medical Center in Dallas with very serious injuries, according to NBC5i.com.

Man gets life on meth charges

DALLAS -- A 44-year-old Dallas man was sentenced to life in federal prison Tuesday after pleading guilty in July to one count of conspiracy to possess with intent to distribute more than 500 grams of methamphetamine. Alejandro Tamayo was arrested in February. During the search and arrest in February, four Dallas officers suffered non-life-threatening injuries while helping the Drug Enforcement Administration serve a warrant at Tamayo's home. A report found that a Dallas SWAT officer accidentally shot a colleague in the leg and may have shot himself in the hand while returning fire during the incident. During the search, police seized cash, firearms and two kilograms of cocaine. Tamayo was ordered to forfeit his interest in the house at 1228 Oak Park Drive, two vehicles, $130,000 in cash, and eight firearms and ammunition seized during the execution of the warrant. Tamayo must also pay $37,662 in restitution to the city of Dallas for the injured officers' medical bills.

4 indicted in torture,

beating of teenagers

LUBBOCK - A grand jury has indicted four people who police say beat two teenagers and tortured them with a battery charger. Court records show that the boys, ages 15 and 16, were forced to sleep in a closet, starved and fed habanero peppers as punishment. The boys' father, Steve Lively, 40, and their stepmother, Melissa Lively, 37, were indicted on four counts of aggravated assault Tuesday. Amy Lively, the boys' 19-year-old sister, has denied all charges against her parents, Jason C. Lively, 19, a stepbrother, was indicted on 10 counts of aggravated assault. Kyle B. Sexton, 20, who lived with the Livelys, was indicted on multiple charges of aggravated assault.

Baby found alongside road was dead teen's

WESLACO - Hidalgo County authorities have determined that a 7-month-old baby found alongside a road is the child of a teenage girl whose burned body was found hours later in a field about 20 miles away. The baby was lying unclothed on her stomach beside a road north of Weslaco when a passing driver spotted her Monday night, Sheriff Lupe Trevino said. The next morning, farm workers reported finding the teenager's body in a sugar cane field south of Donna. Later Tuesday, authorities identified the young woman as Aida Mae Rodriguez, 16. The baby was identified as her daughter, Briggette Mae Rodriguez. Doctors said Briggette Mae was unharmed, although she was being treated for bronchitis. She has been turned over to Child Protective Services. Authorities say the girl's father is not a suspect.

Feds Bust Flashy Crime-fighter (PHI)

By Dave Davies, Michael Hinkelman & Chris Reber

The Philadelphia Inquirer, December 1, 2006

JOE MAMMANA is the kind of larger-than-life figure Philadelphians love - the kid who overcomes a crime-ridden youth to spend a fortune fighting crime; the ex-Marine who bluntly calls his rewards for missing thugs "bounties"; the Italian-American businessman who cares enough to pay for young victims' funerals.

And he does it all in style, wearing a diamond-studded Rolex and driving a silver Lamborghini.

But Mammana's world came crashing down yesterday when FBI agents descended on his North Philadelphia egg-processing business and his expansive Yardley home, searching both - as well as his Lamborghini and customized black Hummer.

Mammana was arrested on weapons charges after the feds found a loaded .357 Magnum in his nightstand, but it appears his troubles run much deeper than that.

Search warrants indicated that interest in Mammana was rooted in the FBI's economic crimes squad, and the feds were after business and tax records for evidence of suspected tax evasion, mail and wire fraud.

Details of the feds' suspicions about Mammana were unavailable yesterday.

His attorney, Martin L. Trichon, didn't return calls for comment.

Mammana faces a detention hearing on his weapons charge today.

His Philadelphia arrest comes as he's embroiled in a bizarre controversy involving a Columbus, Ohio, crime-fighting group that accused him of welching on a reward promise.

After the group threatened to sue Mammana, its president, Kevin Miles, was attacked and beaten outside his house by a man wielding a baseball bat, who told him to "drop the charges or anything you have filed," according to a police report.

Police say Mammana is not a suspect in the case, but he was asked about it during an appearance on Geraldo Rivera's TV show Wednesday night.

DOJ_NMG_0100352

He insisted he had nothing to do with the attack on Miles, adding, "If Kevin Miles is interviewing and walking, then it wasn't me."

"Because if you did it, you would have done the job right?" Rivera asked.

"I do everything completely," Mammana said.

Two days before Miles was attacked, the lawyer for his group, Central Ohio Crime Stoppers, said he was confronted after work by a man fitting the description of Miles' assailant.

Attorney Kinsley Nyce said he'd noticed the man hanging around outside the law firm's office, and that when Nyce went to his car, the man rushed toward him saying, "I'm with Joe."

Nyce said he drove away before the man reached the car.

Miles said he was struck several times by his bat-wielding assailant, who also clubbed Miles' dog. The attacker fled when Miles pointed a handgun that he carries at him.

"I believe the guy was trying to kill me," Miles said.

In a phone interview yesterday, Miles declined to discuss what his attacker said to him, but according to the police report, Miles heard him say, "Keep your mouth shut, drop the charges or anything you have filed, or we'll kill you."

Columbus police Detective Amy Morris said Miles' conflict with Mammana is a matter of interest, but that he's not considered a suspect at this point.

Although Mammana has seemed to be a successful and respectable businessman for years, he isn't a complete stranger to violence.

In 1991, he was convicted of hitting his wife with a counter-top and served eight months for assault. And a Philadelphia magazine profile said Mammana was charged with raping an ex-girlfriend in 1988 and was allowed to plead guilty to sexual harassment.

Besides those episodes, Mammana racked up a long list of criminal charges in the late '80s that included auto theft, forgery, and drug counts.

Mammana pulled his life together in the mid-'90s. A key, he told Philadelphia magazine, was a prison term that allowed him to kick steroids, which he'd gotten accustomed to using when he was a body-builder.

He became chief executive officer and eventually owner of the North Philadelphia egg-processing plant now called Yardley Farms. It takes raw eggs and turns them into powdered, liquid and frozen egg products.

Mammana has spoken with pride of hiring poor and working people from the community, and in recent years has become active as an anti-crime vigilante, dispensing tough talk and offering "bounties" on suspected criminals.

"Just bring these cowards in strapped to a horse, ankles to wrists," Mammana said of the killers of young Faheem Thomas-Childs, adding that he hoped when the thugs were arrested that other inmates knew they were child-killers.

"When I say jailhouse justice, I hope the inmates read between the lines and know what I'm talking about," Mammana said.

John Apeldorn, president of the Citizens Crime Commission, said Mammana had offered rewards and paid them for four or five local crimes, and he has one more that is "pending."

Recently, Mammana said he would pay up to $2 million for information solving the cases of 20 missing children, $100,000 per case.

Nyce said he believes authorities began looking more closely at Mammana because it seemed unlikely that his business could generate the income to support such efforts, not to mention his extravagant lifestyle.

There is some evidence that Mammana's egg-cracking business is struggling financially. Court records show a half-dozen lawsuits from creditors beginning in August of last year.

Attorney Edward Stock said Mammana's firm stopped paying his client, D.L. Snader, a Lancaster County trucking company, in October 2005.

Stock said Yardley Farms owes Snader $80,000 for bringing eggs from places as far away as Ohio, and he said the state revenue department also has sued the firm for $12,500 in back taxes.

Attorney Donald Wellford, who represents Mammana's firm in business litigation, declined comment.

Philanthropist Faces A Gun Charge (PHI)

By Larry Eichel

The Philadelphia Inquirer, December 1, 2006

Despite a criminal past, he had built a reputation as an anticrime crusader, helping to bankroll reward funds in some of the region's highest-profile murders and kidnappings.

Now Joseph Mammana finds himself back in trouble with the law.

Mammana, who lives in Yardley, was in federal custody yesterday, charged with violating the statute that bars convicted felons - which he is - from owning a gun.

Arrested Wednesday, he is to be arraigned today in U.S. District Court in Philadelphia. If found guilty, he could face a maximum sentence of 10 years in prison and a $250,000 fine.

His attorney, Martin Trichon, could not be reached for comment.

According to a federal affidavit, the arrest resulted from a search of Mammana's house conducted as part of an IRS probe into possible mail fraud, wire fraud and tax evasion.

During the search, the affidavit said, federal agents found a loaded .357 Ruger revolver in a nightstand in the master bedroom. The handgun, officials said, originally belonged to Mammana's late father.

There's no crime in possessing such a firearm, unless one has been convicted of a major crime. Mammana falls into that category, having amassed a long list of charges in three states between 1987 and 1991.

"It's kind of ironic that Joseph Mammana offers rewards for solving crimes and here obviously he's a convicted felon, and we find a gun," said Peter Alvarado, IRS special agent-in-charge in Philadelphia.

Mammana spent about two years in prison in Montgomery County, Camden County and Florida for burglary, grand theft and drug possession. In 1991, he pleaded guilty to a felony charge of aggravated assault for hitting his wife in the head with a countertop and threatening her with a knife.

"Any of my criminal past and things like that are irrelevant," Mammana, a bodybuilder and ex-Marine with a degree in criminal justice, told The Inquirer two years ago. "Everybody makes mistakes when they're kids."

In recent years, Mammana, who runs an egg-processing plant in North Philadelphia, has become known as a benefactor of various reward funds, including those managed by the Citizens Crime Commission of Delaware Valley.

For instance, he offered $10,000 for information leading to a conviction in the 2004 shooting death of 10-year-old Faheem Thomas-Childs outside a North Philadelphia elementary school. He put up $5,000 to help solve the Center City killing of Patricia McDermott in 2005.

He also reportedly pledged $250,000 in the disappearance of Alabama teenager Natalee Holloway in Aruba.

John Apeldorn, president of the local crime commission, described Mammana as a valued supporter of the organization who has invariably made good on his pledges.

"Joe's always put his money where his mouth is," Apeldorn said. "We hope that everything works out for him."

Last month, a citizens' anticrime organization in Ohio sued Mammana, claiming he had not made good on a pledge connected to the 2005 slaying of a 20-year-old female student at Ohio State University.

He replied that he pays only for convictions and that there had been no conviction in the case. But the organization, Central Ohio Crime Stoppers, said that it pays rewards for arrests and indictments.

Several days after the suit was filed, the president of the group reported being attacked by a man with a baseball bat who told him to drop the litigation. Mammana denied any knowledge of the alleged attack.

F.B.I. Arrest Philadelphia Philanthropist (KYW)

KYW-TV, December 1, 2006

(CBS 3) PHILADELPHIA Philadelphia Philanthropist Joseph Mammana was arrested at his Bucks County home Wednesday for possession of a firearm.

An F.B.I. arrest affidavit released Thursday states businessman Joseph Mammana, owner of Yardley Farms LLC, was arrested on a firearms violations.

DOJ_NMG_0100354

The affidavit states, "…Mammana knowingly possessed in and affecting interstate and foreign commerce a firearm after previously having been convicted of a crime punishable by more than one year in prison… ."

His past criminal record includes felony convictions for aggravated assault, larceny and narcotics violations, which prohibits him from possessing a gun.

Authorities said the F.B.I. searched Mammana's home in the 600 block of Sedgley Avenue in Yardley, Wednesday, in connection to an I.R.S. investigation, seeking tax and business records.

During the search agents discovered a loaded handgun in a master-bedroom nightstand registered to his deceased father, Edward Mammana.

"We're looking for information related to, what we considered to be economic fraud and tax violations," said U.S. Attorney Pat Meehan.

Mammana is well known throughout the Delaware Valley for making generous donations to the Citizen's Crime Commission, providing reward money to help solve high profile criminal cases.

When Natalie Halloway went missing in Aruba, her mother Beth Twitty took to the airways in Philadelphia asking for help. Mammana came to her aid and pledged $250,000 to Halloway's reward fund.

As police searched for the gunman who shot Faheem Thomas-Childs, Mammanna pledged a $40,000 reward.

The question now is could the money he has pledged to reward funds in Philadelphia and across the country be in jeopardy. A spokesperson from the Philadelphia Citizen's Crime Commission said they will look at the money that has been pledged and confront issues as they arise re-post any money if necessary.

Mammana is being held in federal custody and is scheduled to be arraigned in federal court Friday morning.

Pa. Felon-turned-philanthropist Arrested For Having Gun (AP)

By Patrick Walters

AP, December 1, 2006

A convicted felon-turned-philanthropist who has offered up reward money in several high-profile cases was arrested on a gun charge, authorities said Thursday.

Federal agents discovered a handgun in a nightstand Wednesday while they were searching Joseph Mammana's home in the Philadelphia suburb of Yardley for evidence of possible mail and wire fraud, according to an arrest warrant.

As a felon it is illegal for Mammana to possess a gun. He has a lengthy criminal record that includes convictions for aggravated assault, larceny and narcotics violations.

Records showed that the gun, which was loaded, was purchased by Mammana's father in 1979, authorities said.

Mammana has offered reward money in numerous high-profile crimes, including the disappearance of Alabama teenager Natalee Holloway in Aruba last year.

He also has assisted in the case of Julie Popovich, whose skeletal remains were found Sept. 1 near an Ohio reservoir. She was last seen leaving a bar near Ohio State University on Aug. 11.

He also co-sponsored a gun buyback program in Philadelphia in which people were offered shopping vouchers if they gave up their guns.

The telephone listing for Mammana's home was unpublished and a message left at his office was not returned. He remained in federal custody pending a hearing scheduled for Friday.

A message left with Mammana's attorney Thursday morning was not immediately returned.

Mammana, who owns a Pennsylvania egg farm, is currently embroiled in controversy in Ohio over the Popovich reward.

The head of an Ohio crime-stoppers group, Kevin Miles, is suing Mammana. Miles says someone with a baseball bat attacked him and told him to drop the lawsuit.

Mammana said he had nothing to do with the attack, but suggested the beating was deserved.

"If he was able to talk, it wasn't me," Mammana said in an interview last week with The Associated Press.

Miles' group, Central Ohio Crime Stoppers, sued Mammana on Nov. 15, seeking up to $131,000 it said he had pledged for information in Popovich's slaying.

DOJ_NMG_0100355

Mammana has said he will pay the money if the man who was arrested is convicted in the killing. But Crime Stoppers' policy is to pay rewards for arrests and indictments, not convictions, something Mammana understood when he signed a contract, according to Miles.

Investigators Looking For Motive After Arson Ruled In Plastics Fire (LONGNJ)

By ADAM J. HOLLAND

Longview (TX) News-Journal, December 1, 2006

Now that federal fire investigators have determined arson as the cause of a September fire at a Longview plastics recycling plant, they are bracing for the most difficult part of their probe.

Earlier this week, the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives determined that an accelerant was used to start the blaze Sept. 22 at the Southwest Plastics office on Estes Parkway.

It was the facility's second fire in less than three weeks, with the first one destroying the company's 35,000-square-foot warehouse on Sept. 5.

"Unfortunately, arson investigations are the longest to work and the hardest to prove," ATF agent Clay Alexander said.

Alexander said the next phase of the investigation would involve interviews with former and current employees who had access to the scene, and similar crime patterns that may have existed in and around the area.

"Right now we are just looking for motive — who would want to burn the business and why," Alexander said.

Southwest Plastics owner John Thompson could not be reached for comment Thursday, but has said that he had no known enemies.

His wife, Suzane Thompson, said Thursday that she was concerned that investigators have nothing to research, since the building remains were cleared to make way for a temporary facility.

"The only thing we had was video surveillance tape from our security system, and we haven't heard anything about that," Thompson said.

Alexander said that the tape is currently being reconstructed at the ATF laboratory in San Francisco, but he was hopeful that it could be sent to Tyler within a week or so.

"We hope (the tape) shows something, but it's just one avenue of the investigation," Alexander said.

He added that the ATF has already gathered evidence from the scene, and it was no longer necessary to scour it for additional clues.

There has been no cause released for the fire that destroyed the warehouse on Sept. 5.

TAX:

Democrats To Offer Permanent Tax Cut (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, December 1, 2006

Democrats have long attacked President Bush for the historic tax cuts he ushered through Congress during his first term and have promised to reverse at least some of them.

But among their top priorities when they take over Congress next month is passing a permanent tax cut of their own.

Included in their "Six for '06" platform that they say helped them win majorities in the House and Senate, Democrats promised to: "Make college tuition deductible from taxes, permanently."

Their tax cut promise is neither an election-year gimmick, Democrats say, nor a reversal in their long-standing opposition to Mr. Bush's tax cuts.

"Democrats have made it clear that the middle class will be our priority and making college more affordable is a key concern of working families," said incoming House Majority Leader Steny H. Hoyer, Maryland Democrat.

DOJ_NMG_0100356

They have been less clear, however, about their plans for other tax cuts that expire in 2010 and or how to raise the revenue required to institute the "pay-go" rules they have promised. Those rules prohibit adding any new spending to the budget or cutting taxes unless there is money in the budget.

Though Republicans dramatically sliced taxes without money in the budget, they now can point to historic levels of tax receipts because of the healthy economy that was, they say, spurred by the tax cut.

The only hints from Democrats about their tax plans have come from Rep. Charles B. Rangel, the New York Democrat who will be chairman of the Ways and Means Committee. He has told reporters that tax increases are on the table, but Democratic leaders quickly reined him in and continue to adamantly insist that they have no such plans for the time being.

The tuition tax deduction, along with a handful of other popular tax cuts, have been on the table in Congress ever since they expired at the end of the 2005 tax year. Tax filers next spring will not be able to deduct tuition costs unless something is done retroactively before then.

The tax cut is such a popular one that Republicans have tried for months to pair it with the elimination of the estate tax -- an idea most Democrats in Congress vehemently oppose. Though the elimination of the death tax had majority support in the Senate with Democratic backers, it could not pass the 60-vote threshold that Democrats required. So, Republicans added an increase in the minimum wage to further sweeten the deal.

Democrats still refused. And Republicans refused to strip out the popular tax deductions and pass them on their own.

Sen. Charles E. Grassley, Iowa Republican and outgoing chairman of the Finance Committee, has been critical of both sides for not already approving the tax relief.

"It's all because of political calculations," he said. "That's a shame."

Mr. Grassley and others have urged Republican leaders to go ahead and approve the popular tax cuts and make those cuts permanent before the end of the year.

"The election is over; the political outcome is certain," Mr. Grassley said. "We need to give taxpayers the same certainty about tax provisions that affect their bottom line. I hope the House and Senate use the lame-duck session to redeem themselves from lameness."

Regardless of whether Republicans can accomplish this in the coming weeks, Democrats have every intention of doing so when they take over.

"Democrats have made it a priority to cut taxes for the middle class," said Will Edgar, a spokesman for incoming Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid of Nevada. "The American people made clear they want change, and we're ready to work with the Republicans to move America forward."

Mr. Hoyer signaled a similar eagerness to work across the aisle on the matter.

"Democrats have been strong supporters of extending the college-tuition deduction and would like to join with our Republican colleagues to pass an extension before Congress adjourns for the holidays," he said. "Middle-class families deserve to know that this deduction will be there to help them pay for their children's education next year."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Defense Chief Nominee Meets Democrats (AP)

By Laurie Kellman

AP, December 1, 2006

Robert Gates, President Bush's choice to take over the Defense Department while the Iraq war rages, met Thursday with three Democratic senators who will be asked to vote on his confirmation next week.

Gates did not run into any immediate opposition, even from senators who in 1991 voted against his confirmation to head the CIA when Bush's father was president.

The Senate Armed Services Committee has scheduled a confirmation hearing Tuesday on Gates, who would succeed Donald H. Rumsfeld. A vote by the full Senate is expected later in the week.

"I don't start out with any minuses on the ledger," Sen. Robert Byrd, D-W.Va., said after his meeting with Gates.

DOJ_NMG_0100357

Sen. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., also pledged to approach the hearings with an open mind.

"Mr. Gates must persuade Congress and the American people that he will be a strong leader, that he is firmly committed to working within the administration and with the Congress toward a new course in Iraq," Kennedy said. "And that he deserves the trust of our nation, and especially our men and women in the armed forces."

Gates also met with Sen. Byron Dorgan, D-N.D., who in recent months has orchestrated a series of Democratic-led discussions featuring former generals and other officials critical of the Bush administration's conduct of the war.

"Although I will want to see what the Senate hearing discloses, unless something unusual arises, I am inclined to support the Gates nomination," Dorgan said. "We need new leadership at the Pentagon, and we need to move forward as quickly as possible to fill this vacancy."

Bush, smarting from his party's defeat at the polls three weeks ago, announced the day after the election that Rumsfeld was stepping down as Pentagon chief and Gates was the choice to take over.

Bush said Gates' background as CIA director would give the Pentagon and the war in Iraq more focus on intelligence.

Democrats about to take control of Congress have said they would gauge Gates' willingness to change the U.S. conduct of the war but so far have signaled no opposition to his confirmation.

"Presidents ought to get the Cabinet they want," said Sen. Christopher Dodd, D-Conn.

White House Warned On Airlines (WT)

By Sean Lengell

The Washington Times, December 1, 2006

A congressional committee has warned the Bush administration it faces legal action if it goes ahead with plans to relax foreign ownership rules of domestic airlines.

The Transportation Department, under orders from President Bush, is proposing to allow foreign investors to increase stock ownership in U.S. airlines from 25 percent to 49 percent.

The proposal wouldn't require congressional approval because it reinterprets -- rather than alters -- a decades-old aviation law, the agency says.

But some lawmakers reject the idea of increasing foreign investment in the U.S. airline industry. They also accuse the administration of using the Transportation Department to bypass Congress' legislative authority.

In a letter sent to White House Chief of Staff Joshua B. Bolten on Tuesday, the House Transportation and Infrastructure Committee says only Congress -- not the administration or federal agencies -- can change laws regarding foreign ownership of U.S. airlines.

"Making the rule final in the face of bipartisan congressional opposition would be a very poor start to the 110th Congress," says the letter, signed by two committee members from each party, including Rep. James L. Oberstar of Minnesota, the panel's ranking Democrat who is expected to become chairman in January.

The letter also was signed by Rep. Jerry F. Costello of Illinois, the ranking Democrat on the House Transportation and Infrastructure aviation subcommittee; Rep. Frank A. LoBiondo, New Jersey Republican; and Rep. Ted Poe, Texas Republican.

The issue centers on a long-standing requirement that U.S. citizens have "actual control" of domestic airlines. Under the plan, which was introduced late last year, Americans would need to control only certain aspects of a U.S. airline, such as safety and security measures. Commercial decisions, including which cities an airline can serve and the purchase of aircraft, could be foreign-controlled.

But any reinterpretation of foreign ownership rules would have difficulty standing up to legal challenge, the committee members say.

"The courts have ruled that an executive branch agency does not have the authority to interpret a law in a manner inconsistent with the plain meaning of the words of the law," the letter says. "We can see no basis for an argument that DOT's proposed interpretation of 'actual control' is consistent with the plain meaning of these words."

Reinterpreting existing laws goes against the spirit in which they were originally written, says Jim Berard, Democratic spokesman for the Transportation Committee.

DOJ_NMG_0100358

"To reinterpret this term 'actual control' and limiting it so narrowly to just security and military operations, and leaving everything else that the airline does ... to foreign control totally circumvents what Congress intended when that law was passed," he said.

"If the administration wants to change the law they should come to Congress, give us an opportunity to hold hearings, debate the issue and pass legislation to send to the president."

Mr. Bolten is accompanying Mr. Bush this week on the president's trip abroad and was unavailable for comment.

"The letter has been received, and we are aware of the members' position," White House spokesman Tony Fratto said. "There's nothing to announce at this time."

Another foreign ownership issue created an uproar in Congress earlier this year after a Dubai company, DP World, acquired six U.S. ports from British-owned P&O Ports North America. The controversy was so intense that DP World quickly agreed to find an American buyer for its U.S. properties, which include ports in Baltimore, New York, Philadelphia, Miami, New Orleans and Newark, N.J.

But foreign investment would help boost the ailing airline industry that saw four bankruptcies -- US Airways, Delta Air Lines, Northwest and United Airlines -- in recent years, the Transportation Department says.

Transportation officials also have said the proposal is key to the ongoing negotiations over the Open Skies agreement with the European Union, which would liberalize rules for international commercial aviation between the United States and the 25 EU countries, allowing for more flights to Europe by U.S. airlines.

Europe has threatened to delay the signing of the treaty unless the United States allows for greater foreign investment in U.S. airlines.

The Transportation Department has given no timetable for when it expects to reach a decision and declined to discuss the letter. But some on Capitol Hill think the agency wants to have the proposal in place before a meeting of European transportation ministers later this month

Pay Raise Proposed By Bush Would Be Smallest In 18 Years (WP)

By Stephen Barr

The Washington Post, December 1, 2006

About 1.8 million federal employees would receive a 1.7 percent increase in their basic pay and a 0.5 percent average increase in their locality pay next year under a plan that President Bush sent to Congress yesterday, administration officials said.

Bush recommended a 2.2 percent average raise in his fiscal 2007 budget, released in February. Under a 1990 pay law, yesterday was the deadline for the president to authorize an alternative plan if Congress had not stipulated a raise.

If federal employees receive an average raise of 2.2 percent next year, it would be their lowest annual salary increase in 18 years, according to congressional aides.

House and Senate spending bills propose a 2.7 percent average raise for federal employees, but the bills seem unlikely to pass in the lame-duck session. Congress, meanwhile, has voted for a 2.2 percent raise for the military, raising the prospect that lawmakers will go along with the smaller increase for the civil service when they wrap up their budget bills.

The president's plan would give higher locality adjustments to the metropolitan areas with the largest "pay gaps," as determined by Labor Department surveys comparing federal jobs with their private-sector counterparts.

Under the formula in the president's plan, federal employees in the Washington-Baltimore area would receive a 2.64 percent pay raise next year, starting with the first full pay period in January, officials at the Office of Personnel Management said.

The highest adjustment would go to federal employees in the New York City area -- 3.02 percent. In contrast, the majority of federal employees, who work outside the big cities and are lumped in a "rest of U.S." category, would receive a raise of 1.81 percent.

Colleen M. Kelley, president of the National Treasury Employees Union, objected to the pay formula at a meeting of the Federal Salary Council in October, saying she was concerned that most federal employees would receive a raise of less than 2 percent.

DOJ_NMG_0100359

The council, an advisory group, pulled back from approving the pay plan, and Kelley yesterday called the decision to go ahead with the formula "inappropriate" and "very disappointing."

She said "an awful lot of unknowns" swirl around next year's federal pay raise because of disagreements on Capitol Hill over whether to keep the government open on short-term funding or to bundle spending bills into a year-long omnibus measure.

"As far as we are concerned, the 2.7 percent raise is in play and we are going to do all we can to keep that alive," Kelley said.

By sending Congress his pay plan yesterday, Bush avoided triggering a part of the 1990 law that would have provided federal employees with an overall pay raise of 8.6 percent, which would have met a congressional goal of narrowing differences in salaries between the government and the private sector. Bush said a raise of that size would have cost $8.8 billion, an outlay that he said would interfere with higher priorities, such as maintaining the war against terrorism.

Officials said the pay plan would not be effective until Bush issues an executive order, probably late this month.GSA Studies Office Merger

The General Services Administration is looking at merging its policy shop into the office that handles congressional affairs, the agency's spokeswoman said yesterday.

Claire L. Dorrell, the GSA's spokeswoman, said "a pre-decisional, draft proposal" is being circulated inside the agency for comment to determine whether government-wide issues could be handled more efficiently and at reduced cost. There is no deadline for a decision, she said.

But some officials, who spoke on condition of anonymity because they are not authorized to speak about the merger, said they have no doubts that the consolidation will go forward, after a brief review.

Those officials noted that Lurita Doan, the administrator of general services, named Kevin Messner as the acting administrator of the GSA Office of Governmentwide Policy last month. Messner, a former chief of staff to Rep. Jim Kolbe (R-Ariz.), also is the head of the GSA Office of Congressional and Intergovernmental Affairs.

Messner, a political appointee, replaced a career executive, John G. Sindelar, who had been acting head of the policy office. Sindelar remains the office's deputy associate administrator.

The GSA policy office develops best management practices for the government in such areas as property, travel and transportation, technology and regulatory information. It also has helped support parts of the president's management agenda, such as electronic government initiatives.Talk Shows

Robert Linn, managing director of Ferris, Baker Watts, and David Kauffman, a certified financial planner with the firm, will discuss retirement planning on "FedTalk" at 11 a.m. today on Federalnewsradio.com and WFED radio (1050 AM).

Douglas J. Bourgeois, director of the Interior Department's National Business Center, will be the guest on "The IBM Business of Government Hour" at 9 a.m. Saturday on WJFK radio (106.7 FM).

Pat Roberts May Be Leaving Senate Intelligence Committee (MCT)

By Matt Stearns

McClatchy Newspapers, December 1, 2006

WASHINGTON - Republican Sen. Pat Roberts of Kansas is preparing to leave the Senate Intelligence Committee after an intense four years as chairman, according to Senate officials.

Roberts has been a lightning rod for partisan criticism throughout his tenure, which began just weeks before the United States invaded Iraq in March 2003.

The Intelligence Committee, once noted for bipartisan collegiality, was increasingly swept into the maelstrom of vitriol surrounding the intelligence that led to the Iraq war, the Bush administration's domestic surveillance program and the treatment of suspected terrorists in custody.

Neither Roberts nor his spokeswoman would comment for this story.

Critics say Roberts did the bidding of the Bush administration and dragged his feet on oversight, especially the investigations of pre-war intelligence leading to the Iraq invasion. A year ago, Democrats briefly forced a shutdown of the Senate to protest Roberts' stewardship of the investigations. Committee Vice Chairman Jay Rockefeller, D-W.Va., once accused Roberts of taking "all his talking points from the White House."

Roberts' defenders say he provided appropriate, forward-looking oversight and tried to avoid airing dirty laundry that could have compromised national security. Republican committee member Christopher Bond of Missouri applauded Roberts for "working hard on a bipartisan basis to try to move forward."

"Reasonable people can disagree about whether he did a really good job or whether he saved the president's hide," said John Pike, the director of Globalsecurity.org, a nonpartisan defense research center. "But it was an unusually tough assignment. How do you balance the intelligence community's obsession with secrecy with a public that has a difficult time understanding why no one stopped Sept. 11 and why the intelligence on Iraq was so at odds with reality?"

Among Roberts' accomplishments: A committee report issued unanimously in July 2004 that found intelligence leading to up to the war was faulty; overseeing a massive reorganization of the U.S. intelligence community; and persuading the White House to brief the entire committee on the domestic surveillance program, rather than just the chairman and vice chairman.

The committee has released two of its five so-called "Phase II" investigations that delve more deeply into issues regarding pre-war intelligence on Iraq. Still to come is the most potentially explosive: Comparing the pre-war statements of government officials with the intelligence available at the time.

The Senate officials, speaking on condition of anonymity because Senate committee assignments still are being worked out, said Roberts was weary of the carping associated with the committee's work and was concerned that partisanship might increase as Democrats lead the committee in the final years of the Bush administration. Roberts has been on the committee since his arrival in the Senate in 1997.

Roberts, 70, plans to run for re-election in 2008. He had no major party opposition in 2002, but since then the Democratic Party has had a resurgence in Kansas. Taking a different committee assignment would allow him to do more work directly related to Kansas and become less associated in the public mind with the increasingly unpopular Iraq war, the officials noted.

It's unclear who would replace Roberts as the top Republican on the Intelligence Committee. Sen. Orrin Hatch of Utah is next in line, but one official said Hatch may prefer to become ranking Republican on another committee. Hatch's office would not comment.

That would leave the job open to Bond, who has taken an increasingly prominent - and frequently partisan - role in intelligence matters over the last two years. Bond, who often served as GOP sound-bite bad cop to Roberts' more reserved good cop, also is writing a book on terrorism in Southeast Asia. Bond said that as far as he knew, Roberts would remain top Republican on the committee.

Treasury Undersecretary's Dual Roles Raise Questions (WP)

By Jeffrey H. Birnbaum

The Washington Post, December 1, 2006

Robert K. Steel is a Washington oddity. He holds two high-powered jobs, one inside and the other outside government.

As the new undersecretary of the Treasury in charge of domestic finance, Steel supervises thousands of federal employees and helps oversee the nation's multi-trillion-dollar financial markets. At the same time, he moonlights as the unpaid chairman of the Board of Trustees of Duke University, a major recipient of federal funds and one of the country's most richly endowed colleges.

Experts say it is rare for a senior executive branch official -- in this case a Treasury official ranked just below the department's No. 2 -- to hold a significant position outside government. Top federal executives customarily drop their nongovernmental posts to devote themselves to their time-consuming federal tasks and to avoid even the appearance of a conflict of interest with their public responsibilities.

"This situation is unusual," said Paul C. Light, a professor of public service at New York University and an expert on federal bureaucracy.

DOJ_NMG_0100361

Steel insisted that he keep his chairmanship at Duke -- his alma mater and that of his parents -- as a condition of taking the Treasury job. Government and university ethics officials approved the combination as long as Steel did nothing that had a "direct and predictable effect" on Duke's finances, a stipulation that he accepted.

The Senate Finance Committee was also informed about the pact, a Steel spokeswoman said.

Still, watchdog groups and others have expressed concern about Steel's situation. They worry that he will inevitably have to choose between his fiduciary duty to Duke, which has an endowment of $4.5 billion and about $3 billion in other investments, and his role at Treasury. His position there makes him privy to often-sensitive price-moving information about U.S. markets, especially those involving management of the government's $8.6 trillion in debt.

They also doubt that a senior Treasury official, whose hours are grueling, would have enough spare time to also chair a major research university. In addition, they question the propriety of allowing a top federal official to head an organization that in fiscal 2006 alone, according to Duke, received $1.1 billion in federal funds, including $45,543 from Treasury for a clinic for low-income taxpayers.

"It's a conflict of interest," said Thomas J. Fitton, president of Judicial Watch, a conservative government watchdog group. "In his role as the chairman of the Board of Trustees, there will be decisions he will make that will be in conflict with his role as a high-level government official."

Melanie Sloan, executive director of the left-leaning Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington, agreed. "The concept of having a government job is that you work only on behalf of the American people, and being a trustee creates a divided loyalty," she said.

Barbara Roper, director of investor protection for the Consumer Federation of America, added: "He's creating the very real possibility that he will face situations where he has not just the appearance of a conflict but the reality of a conflict and then will have to decide how to behave. There will always be questions about whether he handled that kind of situation appropriately."

The Senate is keeping a close watch on the Steel-Duke arrangement. "I intend to monitor this situation," said Sen. Charles E. Grassley (R-Iowa), chairman of the Finance Committee, which has jurisdiction over Treasury. "I also want to make sure that serving as Duke's board chairman doesn't take time away from Treasury duties. I've learned from my review of nonprofit organizations that serving on a board can be very time-consuming if the board takes its responsibilities seriously."

Steel, a former vice chairman of the investment banking firm Goldman Sachs, does not foresee trouble. His spokeswoman, Jennifer Zuccarelli, said Steel's deal was blessed at Treasury and the Office of Government Ethics and was disclosed to the Senate, which confirmed him in October. Steel has agreed not to raise funds for Duke and is no longer directly involved in its endowment or investments. Any effort he puts into Duke, she said, comes out of his private time.

Duke's trustees were consulted about Steel's new job and decided to retain him as chairman. According to minutes of the board's executive committee meeting in August, Steel explained what his role in Washington would be and said he would have to step away from direct dealings with Duke's funding. After a discussion without Steel in the room, the executive committee "agreed that Mr. Steel's service in Washington would not have a negative impact on his service to Duke."

Still, the board requires plenty of his attention. It meets four times a year for two days each time, usually Friday and Saturday. In addition, the board's executive committee, which Steel also chairs, meets seven times a year between board meetings.

The board is responsible for the school's well-being, financial and otherwise. "In essence, the Board of Trustees owns Duke University," said John F. Burness, a Duke senior vice president. "The trustees have ultimate responsibility for the university in all of its aspects, including financial."

As undersecretary, Steel has one of the largest portfolios at Treasury. He supervises the assistant secretary for financial markets, the assistant secretary for financial institutions, the fiscal assistant secretary, the deputy assistant secretary for community development policy and the director of the Community Development Financial Institutions Fund. He also oversees the Bureau of the Public Debt and, through the fiscal assistant secretary, the Financial Management Service.

The Bureau of the Public Debt borrows the money needed to operate the federal government and services the debt by issuing trillions of dollars in Treasury securities. The Financial Management Service receives and disburses all public monies, maintains government accounts and oversees a daily cash flow of $50 billion. The Community Development Financial Institutions Fund was created to expand credit in distressed communities.

DOJ_NMG_0100362

Steel is not the first Duke chairman to hold federal office. In the 1990s, John Koskinen kept his Duke post when he became deputy director for management of the White House budget office. He removed himself from all higher-education issues and did not raise money for Duke. But even with those restrictions, he said, the double duty was unusual. "Generally, you have to give up everything if you get into a high position," he said.

Light, the NYU professor, said that there is good reason for the rule and that Steel should resign from Duke's board. "The potential conflicts are significant," he said. "His positions violate the spirit of the law that separates public and private service."

Reid's Skills On Offense To Be Tested (LAT)

By Noam N. Levey

The Los Angeles Times, December 1, 2006

WASHINGTON — Sen. Harry Reid was playing tour guide as he welcomed the new class of Democratic senators to his ornate office days after last month's historic midterm election.

He chatted about Joshua trees in a wilderness area he helped create in his home state of Nevada and showed off a painting of the Mojave Desert shack where he grew up. Then, as eight nervous newcomers clustered around him, he pointed to a portrait above his desk of an aging Andrew Jackson.

"I like it because he's lost all his teeth," Reid said of the work he chose over more dashing renderings of the former president.

If the selection is unorthodox, it befits the man who will become Senate majority leader when Democrats assume power on Capitol Hill in January.

Unpolished and a little grandfatherly, Reid in many ways seems an unlikely torchbearer for his party.

He is uncomfortable delivering sound bites and policy pronouncements. He often interrupts his comments with awkward pauses that give the impression he has lost his train of thought. He seems to enjoy chatting about a legendary Nevada killer who eluded authorities in the 1920s and '30s as much as discussing the business of government. And he makes no secret of his indifference for the spotlight. "I don't think it's what the job calls for," Reid said in a recent interview.

As minority leader the last two years, his approach proved highly effective: By playing defense, Reid bottled up many GOP initiatives.

But with Democrats catapulted into control of the Senate, the former amateur boxer will assume a broader responsibility for charting alternatives to the Bush agenda. On Iraq, for example, Reid has promised a vigorous drive to withdraw troops.

As he prepares for his new job, however, Reid faces a huge question: Can he cobble together a legislative record his party can be proud of? Though his low-key style masks toughness and great political dexterity, it is unclear if that will be enough.

The Democrats will have a bare one-vote majority. And Reid will not have the platform commanded by President Bush or Rep. Nancy Pelosi (D-San Francisco), who as the next House speaker will preside over a chamber where a leader can exercise much greater control.

Reid also can expect to come under more scrutiny. In recent years, ethical questions have been raised about his sponsorship of legislation that benefited clients of his sons and son-in-law, his efforts to secure federal money for a bridge near land he owns, and political contributions he received from Indian tribes represented by imprisoned lobbyist Jack Abramoff. Reid has denied any impropriety.

"It's not going to be easy," said Barbara Sinclair, a UCLA political scientist. "Senate majority leader can be an obscure post … and people always think you should be able to do more than you actually can."

Reid, 66, agrees. "I understand my limitations," he said.

But those who have worked with Reid and watched him battle and cut deals say he should not be underestimated.

"He may have learned it in the ring, but he knows how to assess people," said former Sen. John B. Breaux, a centrist Louisiana Democrat. "You have to have a feel for it. You either have it or you don't. Harry has it."

The son of a hard-rock miner who killed himself and a mother who did the laundry for a bordello, Reid grew up in the tiny town of Searchlight, about 60 miles south of Las Vegas.

DOJ_NMG_0100363

His home, fashioned from railroad ties, lacked indoor plumbing. He hitchhiked 40 miles to get to high school. And he put himself through law school at George Washington University by working as a U.S. Capitol Police officer.

By the time he was 30, Reid — who became a Mormon as a young man — had been elected to the state Assembly and won his race for lieutenant governor.

In the late 1970s, he did a stint on Nevada's Gaming Commission and tangled with organized crime; at one point, the Reid family's station wagon was wired with a bomb that failed to go off.

He was elected to the U.S. House of Representatives in 1982 and, after serving four years, won a seat in the Senate.

As an abortion opponent and champion of mining interests and gun rights, Reid has broken from some of his party's core positions. And as a backer of development in his fast-growing state, he sometimes squares off against environmentalists.

Still, Reid's genuineness has won fans across the party's ideological spectrum. Sen. Barbara Boxer (D-Calif.), a liberal and fierce defender of abortion rights, calls Reid "my brother."

The Nevada senator rarely seems scripted, whether musing about Western writers with a visiting college professor or discussing the personal habits of Lyndon B. Johnson — "a horrible man," Reid said of the former president and Senate majority leader.

Reid also has proved adroit at the little things that cement loyalties, such as scheduling votes to accommodate members' schedules, arranging committee assignments, even helping to find extra office space.

"It all stems from relationships.... He was masterful," said former Sen. Tom Daschle, a South Dakota Democrat who as majority and minority leader worked with Reid.

Reid has developed a close relationship with Nevada's junior senator, Republican John Ensign. The two squared off in a bitter campaign in 1998, and Reid won reelection by fewer than 450 votes. Two years later, Ensign won the state's other Senate seat, and soon afterward they reached what they term a "nonaggression pact."

"There are a lot of people who try to get us to go at each other," Ensign said recently. But "it's developed into a friendship."

Still, since he took over as minority leader in 2004, Reid has proved a fierce partisan warrior.

That year's election devastated Democrats — President Bush swept to a second term, Republicans expanded their majorities in Congress, Daschle lost his reelection bid and Reid's party was left with fewer Senate seats than at any time since the early days of the Great Depression.

Reid quickly prepared to fight, setting up a war room on the Capitol's third floor — where young aides monitored a wall of televisions and pumped out news releases to counter Bush and his congressional allies.

When the president began a national tour to promote his plan to partially privatize Social Security, Reid traveled the country to speak against it. He and his leadership team gathered signatures from 42 Democratic senators opposing the plan — a key, early sign that it would lack essential bipartisan support.

"He rallied [his colleagues]. He held them.... He demonstrated that in unity there was strength," said Democratic political consultant Paul Begala. "That was the first big turning point for the Democrats" during Bush's second term.

Other victories followed as Reid gently prodded his caucus to block the Republican majority, mindful not to push his personal agenda too hard.

Reid stepped out of the way this fall to let more liberal Democrats rally the votes to stop a measure long sought by social conservatives that would have strengthened parental consent requirements for abortion. Reid voted for the GOP measure.

"You have to give people rein," Reid said as he discussed managing a notoriously fractious Democratic caucus.

At a recent coffee, Reid told the new Democratic senators much the same. But he asked for one thing in return.

"Be honest," he said, warning that he has never forgotten the one senator who lied to him about a vote. "Be careful when you tell us, 'I'm for you.' "

Reid has been speaking a lot about the need for bipartisanship. "I tried to set the right tone by not gloating" after the Democrats' midterm success, he said.

He expressed hope that the Democrats would be able to work with at least some Republicans to raise the federal minimum wage, increase oversight of the administration's war policies and pass other initiatives.

DOJ_NMG_0100364

But he clearly remains troubled about the prospects of working with Bush, whose commitment to changing course in Iraq Reid said he doubted.

"Certainly, I don't dislike him," Reid said of the president, whom he once called a liar. "It's just difficult, because I don't believe in what he's doing most of the time."

Newly Elected Muslim Lawmaker Under Fire (USAT)

By Andrea Stone

USA Today, December 1, 2006

WASHINGTON — The first Muslim elected to Congress hasn't been sworn into office yet, but his act of allegiance has already been criticized by a conservative commentator.

In a column posted Tuesday on the conservative website Townhall.com, Dennis Prager blasted Minnesota Democrat Keith Ellison's decision to take the oath of office Jan. 4 with his hand on a Quran, the Muslim holy book.

"He should not be allowed to do so," Prager wrote, "not because of any American hostility to the Koran, but because the act undermines American culture."

He said Ellison, a convert from Catholicism, should swear on a Christian Bible — which "America holds as its holiest book … If you are incapable of taking an oath on that book, don't serve in Congress."

The post generated nearly 800 comments on Townhall.com and sparked a tempest in the conservative blogosphere. Many who posted comments called the United States a Christian country and said Muslims are beginning to gain too much influence. Others wrote about the separation of church and state and said the Constitution protects all religions.

Dave Colling, Ellison's spokesman, said he was unavailable for comment. Earlier, Ellison told the online Minnesota Monitor, "The Constitution guarantees for everyone to take the oath of office on whichever book they prefer. And that's what the freedom of religion is all about."

Colling said Ellison's office has received hundreds of "very bigoted and racist" e-mails and phone calls since Prager's column appeared. "The vast majority said 'You should resign from office if you're not willing to use the book our country was founded on,' " Colling said.

"Requiring somebody to take an oath of office on a religious text that's not his" violates the Constitution, said Kevin Hasson, president of The Becket Fund for Religious Liberty.

Members of the House of Representatives traditionally raise their right hands and are sworn in together on the floor of the chamber. The ritual sometimes seen as the swearing-in is actually a ceremonial photo op with the speaker of the House that usually involves a Bible.

"They can bring in whatever they want," says Fred Beuttler, deputy historian of the House.

Prager, who is Jewish, wrote that no Mormon elected official has "demanded to put his hand on the Book of Mormon." But Republican Sen. Gordon Smith of Oregon, a Mormon, carried an expanded Bible that included the Book of Mormon at his swearing-in ceremony in 1997.

Lawmaker Intends To Take Oath Of Office On Quran (MCT)

By Rob Hotakainen

McClatchy Newspapers, December 1, 2006

WASHINGTON - As he prepares to become the first Muslim in Congress, Rep.-elect Keith Ellison says the Constitution gives him the right to take the oath of office on the Quran, and that's what he intends to do Jan. 4.

The Minnesota Democrat's decision is stirring a debate among academicians and conservatives, with some saying it's appropriate to take an oath of office only on the Bible.

"Mr. Ellison, America, not you, decides on what book its public servants take their oath," radio talk-show host and author Dennis Prager wrote in a column this week. He said American Jews routinely had taken their oaths on the Bible, even though they didn't believe in the New Testament, and that if Ellison refused to do so, "don't serve in Congress."

Eugene Volokh, a professor of law at the University of California at Los Angeles, said the Constitution authorized people not to swear their oaths at all, protecting atheists and agnostics.

DOJ_NMG_0100365

"Why would Muslims and others not be equally protected?" he wrote in National Review Online.

Ellison was attending meetings in Washington on Thursday and couldn't be reached for comment, according to Dave Colling, his spokesman.

But Ellison defended his plan to use the Quran, Islam's holy book, in an interview with Abdi Aynte, a reporter from Minneapolis who writes for Minnesota Monitor.

"The Constitution guarantees for everyone to take the oath of office on whichever book they prefer," Ellison was quoted as saying. "And that's what the freedom of religion is all about." Colling confirmed the quote.

Ellison's decision drew support from one prominent conservative firebrand, Colorado Republican Rep. Tom Tancredo, who champions a fence along the border with Mexico and thinks that unfettered immigration endangers American culture.

"He wants to take his oath on the Quran, that's fine," Tancredo said. "I think whatever you believe is necessary for you to uphold your obligations to the Constitution, that is fine with me."

In his weekly column, Prager said Ellison's decision is "an act of hubris that perfectly exemplifies multiculturalist activism."

"When all elected officials take their oaths of office with their hands on the very same book, they all affirm that some unifying value system underlies American civilization," Prager wrote. "If Keith Ellison is allowed to change that, he will be doing more damage to the unity of Americans and to the value system that has formed this country than the terrorists of 9/11."

In the National Review, Volokh noted that two former presidents - Franklin Pierce and Herbert Hoover - didn't swear their oaths but chose to affirm them.

He said the Supreme Court long had held that Americans had the right to be treated equally, regardless of their religion, and that forcing Ellison to use the Bible would violate his rights.

"Letting Christians swear the oath of office, while allowing members of other denominations only to swear what ends up being a mockery of an oath - a religious ceremony appealing to a religious belief system that they do not share - would be discriminatory," Volokh wrote.

Taking an oath on the Quran isn't unprecedented.

In 1999, the News-India Times reported that Osman Siddique, a Virginia businessman of Bangladeshi origin, used the Quran to take the oath when he became the U.S. ambassador to Fiji and three other Pacific nations: Nauru, Tonga and Tuvalu. He took the oath on the Bible and the Quran, with the Quran on top, the newspaper reported.

McClatchy Newspapers correspondent Lesley Clark contributed to this report.

Lawmaker To Take Oath On Koran, Faces Flak (WT)

By Eric Pfeiffer

The Washington Times, December 1, 2006

Rep.-elect Keith Ellison, the first Muslim elected to Congress, will take his oath of office on the Koran, not the Bible.

Although some have criticized the Minnesota Democrat's decision, his campaign manager cites historical precedent in describing it as a nonissue.

"Well, he will be the first to do it with the Koran," Dave Colling said. "But most members do not even take an individual oath with any book. Keith Ellison will be taking his oath in the chamber with the other members of Congress."

House members are sworn in en masse in the chamber, and no Bible or other religious document is used for the oath. However, several incoming House members use Bibles for their individual swearing-in, which is administered by the House speaker and takes place after the official group oath.

Mr. Ellison has been criticized by some Christian organizations and conservative radio host Dennis Prager, who say that even if the law allows him to take an oath on the Koran, he should adhere to what they call the historical tradition of taking the oath of office on the Bible.

"In your personal life, we will fight for your right to prefer any other book. We will even fight for your right to publish cartoons mocking our Bible. But, Mr. Ellison, America, not you, decides on what book its public servants take their oath," Mr. Prager, who is Jewish, wrote in an online column.

DOJ_NMG_0100366

The American Family Association (AFA) posted an "Action Alert" on its Web site requesting that supporters urge lawmakers to pass a law requiring that the Bible be used in congressional swearing-in ceremonies. "What book will America base its values on, the Bible or the Koran?" the AFA posting said.

"The premise of the attack is false," Mr. Colling said, adding that Mr. Ellison has not refused to take an oath on the Bible, because his refusal would imply that such a requirement exists.

According to the Library of Congress, Theodore Roosevelt became the first and only president to take an oath without a Bible in 1901. In 1961, John F. Kennedy took his oath on a Catholic (Douay) version of the Bible. Several Jewish members of Congress have taken their oath on the Torah. Article VI of the Constitution specifies that "... no religious Test shall ever be required as a Qualification to any Office or public Trust under the United States."

In 2005, a North Carolina judge refused to allow a Muslim woman to take her oath on the Koran before testifying. Guilford County Superior Judge W. Douglas Albright cited state law in the case, which reads that oaths are to be made upon "Holy Scriptures," which analysts agreed is a reference to the Bible.

However, in 1997, a federal judge hearing a terrorism case in Washington allowed witnesses to make such an oath to Allah.

"This is a tempest in an Internet teapot," said Ibrahim Hooper, spokesman for the Center for American-Islamic Relations. "With the rising level of Islamophobia in America, you have some people who see the empowerment of any Muslim as a threat to the Constitution. In reality, they should see the empowerment of such an individual as strengthening the Constitution."

Democratic Power Struggle (WP)

By E. J. Dionne Jr.

The Washington Post, December 1, 2006

The most important tension within the new Democratic majority in the House of Representatives is not between liberals and conservatives or free traders and fair traders. It is between older members who once enjoyed the power and perks of majority status, and their younger colleagues who will experience real power for the first time.

The older members -- many of whom will be taking over committee chairmanships -- came to political maturity in the pre-Clinton, pre-Gingrich era, before the full flowering of the permanent campaign. They governed from a House in which committee leaders typically had more power than the House speaker in shaping legislation.

But nearly two-thirds of the Democrats in the new House have been elected since 1994, meaning they have only known life in the opposition during a time when Republicans radically centralized control in their leadership. In their hunger to overturn the Republican majority, these younger Democrats honed their strategic shrewdness by taking the lesson from Bill Clinton and Newt Gingrich that politics and policy are inevitably linked.

The key to Nancy Pelosi's success as speaker will be to find a way to bring the old bulls and the Young Turks together.

Democratic optimists -- now that the party has again won an election the phrase is no longer an oxymoron -- think the management of the 2006 campaign is a signal that Pelosi will draw on the talents of both groups. She entrusted campaign strategy to Rep. Rahm Emanuel of Illinois, the quintessential Young Turk and Clinton administration veteran who out-toughed Karl Rove in a contest of political will.

Emanuel, who turned 47 on Wednesday, surrounded himself with a talented group of lieutenants, including Reps. Debbie Wasserman Schultz of Florida (she's 40 and was elected in 2004) and Chris Van Hollen of Maryland (47, elected in 2002). Such younger members are passionately devoted to the proposition that electoral victory is the precondition for accomplishing anything else.

And despite some moments of culture clash, the more senior Democrats largely went along with the program since they, too, had become desperate for power. For example, Rep. John Conyers (D-Mich.), incoming chairman of the Judiciary Committee, played down his proposal to open hearings on impeaching President Bush when Republicans tried to use his pledge to drown out stronger Democratic issues.

But now that Democrats have the majority, Pelosi will not have the authority Gingrich had to centralize power and override the wishes of the committee chairs, even when doing so might be politically useful. Because Gingrich was widely seen as the architect of the Republicans' 1994 victory, he in effect became leader of the entire party. Neither Pelosi nor, for that matter, any other speaker in the foreseeable future can hope for such dominance.

Moreover, one of the Democrats' core promises is to democratize the House by reinvigorating the committees and giving the Republican minority more rights than Democrats were granted under Republican rule.

The upshot is that Pelosi will be cajoling her committee leaders (the average age of the anticipated chairmen is close to 67) to keep their eyes on separate time frames: two years and, say, a decade. Democrats will need to be -- and also look-- effective enough to reelect their majority, and perhaps even win the presidency, in 2008. And they have to accept that many of the reforms they seek will take far more than a single congressional term to achieve.

There is also this: The basis for this new majority is very different from the one Democrats enjoyed between 1954 and 1994. The old majority depended heavily on representatives from the big cities of the North and rural areas in the South. The new majority, as Emanuel has been preaching, was built on gains in suburban and exurban areas and a new brand called "suburban populism," which he defines as "a revolt against Rovian polarization politics." The Democrats are increasingly the party of the metropolitan areas, suburban as well as urban, especially outside the South.

After a good election year, Pelosi has had a bumpy start with her unsuccessful intervention in the contest for majority leader and the controversy surrounding the chairmanship of the intelligence committee.

But the real test of her leadership is yet to come, and it involves squaring a series of circles: how to democratize the House without giving up the ability to coordinate its actions; how to emphasize the substance of policy without losing sight of the imperatives of the next election; and how to bring together the legislative experience of the old with the political energy of the young. Compared with Pelosi, Gingrich had it easy.

Legislative Shuffle Could Give D.C. Vote In Congress (USAT)

By Kathy Kiely

USA Today, December 1, 2006

WASHINGTON — For more than 200 years, residents of the District of Columbia have lived in the shadow of the U.S. Capitol without having a vote that counts there.

For the district's 550,000 residents, that may be about to change.

Monday, the Utah Legislature will set in motion a plan that would permanently increase the size of the U.S. House of Representatives for the first time since 1911.

Gov. Jon Huntsman summoned the lawmakers into a special session last week to approve a redistricting plan that would give the predominantly Republican state a fourth member of Congress. Utah came within a few hundred votes of qualifying for a fourth House member in the last Census. Mike Morrow, a spokesman for Huntsman, says the count failed to include Mormon missionaries who were out of the state at the time.

In return, Eleanor Holmes Norton, the longtime delegate for the predominantly Democratic District of Columbia, would win full voting privileges. That would increase the number of House members from 435 to 437.

Ray Smock, director of the Robert C. Byrd Legislative Research Center at Shepherd University and a former House historian, says it's about time. “This business of trying to squeeze the whole country into a 1911-sized bag is ridiculous,” he says.

The U.S. population has more than tripled since the 1910 Census, from 92.2 million to more than 300 million. That means there was one representative for every 212,000 Americans in 1911 compared with one for every 690,000 now.

Backers press for the House and Senate to approve legislation increasing the House's membership before this congressional term ends, as early as next week.

“This compromise is the closest the district has come to having a voice in Congress,” Mayor Anthony Williams says. “It's amazing to me that anyone can still argue that D.C. residents — who pay taxes, fight in wars and participate in every other way in our democracy — should in any way not be represented.”

The District of Columbia has petitioned for representation in Congress since 1801, when residents lost the right to vote for House and Senate members in Maryland and Virginia, the states that ceded land to create the federal city. The district's population is larger than that of Wyoming, which has two senators and one House member.

DOJ_NMG_0100368

“America is unique on Earth in not granting voting representation in the national Legislature to people who live in the capital city,” says Jamin Raskin, a constitutional law professor at American University.

Opponents of congressional representation for the District of Columbia say it's not constitutional. “The Constitution clearly provides how congressmen and senators are allocated to states,” says Rep. Patrick McHenry, R-N.C. “The federal city is not a state.”

Others see politics as the reason D.C. has been denied congressional representation. “The district is too Democrat and too black,” says Ron Walters, a political scientist at the University of Maryland.

Washington's population is 57% African-American; 73% of its voters are registered Democrat.

The Utah-District of Columbia representation deal, crafted by Norton and Rep. Tom Davis, R-Va., attempts to neutralize partisan opposition by balancing the federal city's gain with one for Utah, almost certain to elect another Republican. President Bush won the state in 2004 with 67% of the vote.

The district would get a House vote under the Davis-Norton bill but still be without representation in the Senate.

Bush has not said whether he would sign the legislation, but Norton says she's confident “he'll do the right thing.”

Davis urges fellow Republicans to support a House vote for the District of Columbia. “As American men and women are fighting for democracy in Baghdad,” he says, Congress should take “a momentous step toward bringing democracy to our nation's capital.”

D.C. Fights Clock, But Approval Of Voting Bill Stalls (WP)

By Mary Beth Sheridan And Yolanda Woodlee

The Washington Post, December 1, 2006

D.C. Mayor-elect Adrian M. Fenty went to Capitol Hill yesterday and Utah prepared to redraw its congressional districts as members of both parties said a plan to add House seats for the District and Utah had good prospects for approval next year.

Fenty and Del. Eleanor Holmes Norton met with House Speaker-elect Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) to push for passage next week of the voting rights bill, before the current session of Congress adjourns. That appears unlikely, according to congressional leaders. A more probable scenario, they said, has the bill reemerging early next year in a new, Democrat-controlled Congress.

"Early on, we should be able to get this through," said Norton (D), the District's nonvoting member of the House and a co-sponsor of the legislation. She said she remained hopeful for a vote next week, but "the enemy is time."

The bill would create two House seats -- one for the mostly Democratic District and the other for Utah, a Republican stronghold. Utah legislators are scheduled to vote Monday on boundaries for their proposed extra district. Congressional leaders in Washington had insisted on such a map before moving forward.

Fenty (D) and others hoped that the Utah action would propel Congress to act next week. But Republicans, who control the House, said they doubted the bill would get a vote in the session beginning Tuesday. A Democratic leadership aide, speaking on background, agreed.

In the Senate, Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.), the majority whip, said this week that he had heard no discussion about bringing the voting-rights bill to the floor in that chamber. And Amy Call, a spokeswoman for Senate Majority leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.), said yesterday that a vote was "probably unlikely at this point."

Fenty said yesterday that he is hopeful, too.

"We're taking every step possible to get it passed next week. A lot of people have worked hard. It's very possible it could pass," he said in an interview after the 15-minute meeting with Pelosi.

He acknowledged that there is only a short window to act in the lame-duck session. He said he is planning to contact McConnell as well as such prominent politicians as Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.) in the next few days to generate momentum. He said he has spoken to some key members of both parties, including Sen. Trent Lott (R-Miss.) and Sen. Mary Landrieu (D-La.).

The bill is considered the most promising effort in years to gain a full House seat for the District. In 1978, Congress approved a constitutional amendment to give the District two votes in the Senate and one vote in the House. The effort collapsed when it failed to win ratification by two-thirds of state legislatures.

President Bush has said he will review the bill, but he has not taken a stand on it.

DOJ_NMG_0100369

In their visit, Fenty and Norton also spoke to Pelosi about gaining more budget and legislative autonomy for the District. Pelosi, who was on the D.C. appropriations subcommittee at one time, agreed that Congress should interfere less in the city's affairs, according to a news release from Norton.

The voting-rights bill was overwhelmingly approved last spring by the House Committee on Government Reform, chaired by Rep. Thomas M. Davis III (R-Va.), who crafted the legislation.

But it became bogged down by details. Legislators have tried to draw the extra House district in Utah in a way that is constitutional and acceptable to Democrats, who fear losing the seat they hold in the state. Now that issue is nearing a resolution. A key legislative committee in Utah signed off on the boundaries Wednesday, and the full state legislature is scheduled to meet in a special session Monday to approve the new map.

Under the current law, the District's representative in Congress can sponsor legislation, belong to committees and take part in debates but is not entitled to a vote on the House floor. The bill would give the representative full voting rights. It would permanently expand the House from 435 to 437 members.

An aide to Davis agreed with Norton that the bill would probably pass early next year if Congress does not approve it next week. Pelosi predicted that initial action could be taken by the time of the State of the Union address in late January, Fenty said.

A spokesman for the California congresswoman, Drew Hammill, said Pelosi "indicated she is supportive of that legislation," which she co-sponsored.

Dave Marin, the Davis aide, said it would be the first piece of legislation that Davis would introduce in the new Congress.

"Whether it's next week or in February 2007, this will get done," he said.

Norton said the bill should pass easily because it has been debated in House committees and won support from members of both parties. However, she said, the Democratic leadership has issued a list of priorities it expects to tackle at the start of the new Congress, and it did not include the D.C. vote issue.

"They didn't expect the D.C. bill would still be pending," Norton said.

The Red State of the Holiday White House

George and Laura Bush hosted the first of 24 White House holiday-season parties last night (nah, we didn't get an invite, either), just hours after the first lady unveiled this year's decorations, inspired by the mansion's Red Room.

The look: Two 12-foot trees covered in poinsettias greeted guests in the Grand Foyer, along with vases of red carnations, lots of candy canes, cranberry topiaries and 4,638 shiny red balls on the trees and garlands. The 18-foot Douglas fir in the Blue Room is decorated in glass, crystal and that cottony kind of fake snow, as well as tiny red bows.

The showstopper: Because she hasn't found a replacement for pastry chef Thaddeus DuBois, the first lady persuaded his predecessor, Roland Mesnier, to make the 300-pound gingerbread White House on display in the State Dining Room. Tiny renderings of Barney and Miss Beazley sit in Santa's sleigh on the rooftop; Willie the cat lies under a small birdhouse; 800 icing snowflakes cover the house.

The menu: New executive chef Cristeta Comerford added some Bush favorites to the traditional holiday buffets -- mini-chicken-fried steaks with white onion gravy, sweet potato souffle and tamales, which the Texans always eat on Christmas Eve.

During a round of early-morning interviews, the first lady said the tree upstairs in the private residence is covered with family ornaments. No word whether the twins will be home for Christmas, but they'll open presents that morning. "George's family has a very strict rule that it's Christmas Day," she told ABC. "My family always opened on Christmas Eve. But he's the president, so he gets his way on Christmas Day."

Gearing Up for Honorable Mentions

It's time for the annual Hollywood-on-the-Potomac schmoozefest -- this weekend's Kennedy Center Honors, where a cluster of A-list stars will line up for Sunday's red-carpet tribute. It's always fun to guess which celebs will show up to salute the honorees -- this year, the awards go to Dolly Parton, Steven Spielberg, Smokey Robinson, Andrew Lloyd Webber and Zubin Mehta. The list of presenters is super-secret, but be on the lookout for Reese Witherspoon, Jessica Simpson, George Lucas, Berry Gordy, Barbara Cook, Sarah Brightman, Barbara Walters, Ron Silver, Arthur Mitchell and Christine Ebersole. (Alas, newly single Kid Rock, a member of the "artists committee" for the honors and a guest in previous years, is not scheduled to attend.)

Consumer Spending Advances At Cautious Pace (WSJ)

By Rafael Gerena-morales

The Wall Street Journal, December 1, 2006

Despite strong gains in wages and salaries, American consumers increased their spending at an unexpectedly modest pace in October, showing caution in the face of a struggling housing market.

Personal spending rose $16.9 billion in October, up 0.2% from the previous month, the Commerce Department reported. Spending had fallen 0.2% in September but was up 0.1% in August.

Adjusted for inflation, consumer spending rose 0.4% in October, helped by a decline in gasoline prices. Some economists had expected stronger spending in October, considering the sharp drops in gasoline prices in recent months. Gasoline fell to roughly $2.29 in late November from an average topping $3.08 a gallon in early August. Each one-cent decline in gasoline prices adds roughly $1 billion to consumers' spending power, at an annualized rate.

The modest gains in spending were especially surprising given that consumers' incomes grew at a healthy pace in October. Personal income advanced at a seasonally adjusted rate of 0.4%, following a 0.5% gain in each of the three preceding months, the Commerce Department said.

Wages and salaries, which account for a large share of personal income, climbed 0.6% in October, matching September's advance. Economists said wages are rising because companies are finding that they must compete for qualified workers in an increasingly tight labor market. The unemployment rate was 4.4% in October, a five-year low.

Nonetheless, analysts said some consumers remain guarded about spending because the struggling housing market makes them feel less wealthy and there's a concern that energy prices could escalate. "We hoped the drop-off in gas prices would have added more vigor" to consumer spending in October, said Stephen Gallagher, an economist at Société Générale SA in New York. "Maybe they're worried about their home values and gas prices."

Retailers have reported mixed results this holiday season. For November, Wal-Mart Stores Inc. posted its weakest monthly same-store sales in more than 10 years, and the giant discounter said it expects sales to rise 1% or less this month. Other large retailers, including Target Corp., reported healthy sales gains for last month. Overall, the National Retail Federation expec ts total retail sales in November and December -- excluding sales of cars and at restaurants and gas stations -- to rise a combined 5% to $457.4 billion, compared with the same period last year.

Still, economists expect uneven shopping patterns this holiday season. Although affluent shoppers are expected to spend briskly this quarter and boost total consumption, lower-wage earners remain price-sensitive and could cut back on spending as they cope with the lingering effect of this summer's high fuel prices, said Diane Swonk, chief economist at Mesirow Financial in Chicago.

Yesterday's data suggest that "consumers in the aggregate are fine," said Ms. Swonk. She projects that consumption will rise at a seasonally adjusted annual rate of 3% in the current quarter and slightly below that pace in the first half of next year. However, other recent data suggest that lower-wage earners "are still hurting a bit from high energy prices [last quarter]. There's not a consumer-spending collapse out there. But this holiday season won't be one to pop champagne corks over, either," she said.

The personal-income and spending data indicated that inflationary pressures persist. Excluding food and energy, prices rose 0.2% in October from September, and climbed 2.4% from October 2005, matching September's rates. Analysts had expected the core rate of the Commerce Department's inflation measure, known as the personal-consumption expenditures index, to rise a tad slower in October. Yesterday's report "doesn't give much peace" to Federal Reserve officials who this week warned that inflation is too high, said David Resler, chief economist at Nomura Securities International Inc. in New York.

A separate report yesterday confirmed that the housing market continues to cool. The Office of Federal Housing Enterprise Oversight reported that its home-price index rose at an annual rate of 3.45% in the third quarter, down from a 5.1% gain in the second quarter. The latest increase was the smallest since the second quarter of 1998, Ofheo said. The index showed price declines in five states during the latest quarter: Massachusetts, Michigan, New Hampshire, New York and Rhode Island. A version of the index based only on home purchases, stripping out values estimated during refinancings, rose at 1.5% annual rate in the third quarter.

Also yesterday, the Labor Department said initial claims for unemployment benefits rose by 34,000 to 357,000 in the week ended Saturday. The four-week moving average rose by 7,250 claims to 325,000, the highest level since June 3. A Labor Department official said the rise may be due to seasonal variations common to the holiday season.

Retailers Still Might Make Up For Holiday Season's Slow Start (WSJ)

By Stephanie Kang And Gary Mcwilliams

The Wall Street Journal, December 1, 2006

The nation's retailers remain largely upbeat about the holiday shopping season, despite their mixed performance in November and another warning from Wal-Mart Stores Inc. Procrastinating shoppers could still show up and lift overall holiday sales, industry experts said.

Some high-end department stores and specialty apparel chains reported strong November sales at stores open at least a year, buoyed by post-Thanksgiving Day shopping. But Wal-Mart reported a monthly drop in so-called same-store sales for the first time in nearly 14 years. The world's largest retailer sounded a cautionary note for December too, saying it expects the month's sales to be either flat or up by no more than 1%.

Take a look2 at how a dozen major retailers, including Wal-Mart and Gap, have done over the past year, and use tools to build your own charts. • See a sortable chart3 of results from about 20 retailers.

Analysts said Wal-Mart's disappointing results shouldn't be viewed as an industry indicator this season, but there were other disturbing signs. An index of about 40 major U.S. retailers compiled by New York investment firm Lazard Capital Markets showed that 60% of retailers missed expectations for November same-store sales, compared with 40% that missed those targets in previous months this year.

November was "softer than expected," said Lazard analyst Todd Slater, as warmer weather in certain parts of the country slowed sales of apparel like coats and scarves. "We believe a lot of business will be pushed to late December," he said, driven by chillier weather and procrastinating shoppers hunting for last-minute gifts.

"I think it's going to be a solid holiday," said Madison Riley, strategist and principal with retail consulting firm Kurt Salmon Associates. "Over the [Thanksgiving] weekend consumers decided to hold off and not fight the traditional weekend crowds. I think the spending will come" in the coming three weeks, he said.

Other analysts worried that a rush of late shoppers could provoke retailers into even deeper discounts than those offered after Thanksgiving. "The good news is that there's momentum for the holiday season," said Michael Niemira, chief economist at the International Council of Shopping Centers, a trade group based in New York. "The bad news is if we get the usual lull in the first couple weeks of December, we may see more promotional activity" later in the month, dragging down the month's same-store sales.

Wal-Mart's weak performance underscores its continuing difficulties in reversing its slump. The Bentonville, Ark., chain said same-store sales overall declined 0.1% in November. What's more, Wal-Mart said its woes spread from clothing, which had contributed to anemic sales all fall, to home furnishings and decor.

The discount retailer has struggled amid signs that its customers are rejecting a move into upscale fashions and lifestyle merchandising. In response, it has recently begun aggressively cutting prices on more than 10,000 items, including toys, electronics, appliances and food.

Wal-Mart said results were stronger in electronics, food and pharmacy. But the overall weaker-than-expected sales results signal that a turnaround at the retail behemoth is further off than expected, analysts said. Several of them have cut forecasts for fourth-quarter earnings.

Discount rival Target Corp. fared better, posting a same-store sales increase of 5.9%. The Minneapolis retailer, known for its trendy fashions and hip marketing, said the sales gain was driven by sales of consumer electronics and health-care products. Other discount chains fell short of analyst expectations. Costco Wholesale Corp., Issaquah, Wash., said same-store sales rose 5%. Analysts expected a 5.7% increase.

Jewelry, cashmere sweaters and designers handbags lured luxury shoppers into high-end department stores. Saks Inc., Birmingham, Ala., said same-store sales grew 7.2%. Federated Department Stores Inc., Cincinnati, was one of the standouts of the month, posting a same-store sales increase of 8.5% and raising its December sales forecast. Dallas-based luxury retailer Neiman Marcus Inc. said same-store sales rose 2.9%. Nordstrom Inc., Seattle, posted same-store sales of 5.4%. But J.C. Penney Co., Plano, Texas, had a same-store sales rise of 1.4%, badly missing analysts' expectations of a 3.7% increase.

Specialty apparel chain Limited Brands Inc., Columbus, Ohio, posted a 12% increase in same-store sales. Gap Inc., San Francisco, showed further signs of declining interest in its fashions at Old Navy, Banana Republic and its flagship chain. It said same-store sales fell 8%.

As Dollar Weakens, Paulson Faces Challenge Of Tempering Its Decline (WSJ)

By Michael M. Phillips In Washington, Joanna Slater In New York And Alistair Macdonald In London

The Wall Street Journal, December 1, 2006

The dollar's continued slide against the euro and British pound highlights the delicate task faced by Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson: allowing the U.S. currency to weaken slowly against other currencies without sending it into a plunge that would damage the nation's economy.

Mr. Paulson has chosen to follow in the footsteps of his predecessor, John Snow, by acquiescing as markets pull the dollar lower. Yesterday, the dollar hit a 20-month low against the euro and a 14-year low against the pound. Over the past year, it has dropped 6.7% against a Federal Reserve index of seven major currencies.

Though Bush administration economic officials are eager to avoid a market-rattling crash, a weaker dollar could help the U.S. deflate its ballooning trade deficit by making American goods cheaper abroad and foreign goods pricier for Americans. It also could help Mr. Paulson fend off what he considers an alarming rise in protectionist sentiment.

"The Treasury cannot help but be pleased to see a gradual decline in the dollar," says Robert Hormats, vice chairman of Goldman Sachs International.

DOJ_NMG_0100373

A Treasury spokeswoman refused to discuss the secretary's view of the dollar's recent movements, except to point to Mr. Paulson's repetition this week that "a strong dollar is clearly in our nation's interest, and I feel very good today about the strength of the U.S. economy."

Repeating that phrase, however, underscores the delicacy of Mr. Paulson's mission. Currency markets can respond instantly and forcefully when they sense a change in government policy or rhetoric. So even though Mr. Paulson has given no other hint that he wants the dollar to strengthen, he apparently feels obliged to repeat the strong-dollar mantra to avoid creating turmoil in the markets.

"It's very hard for the Treasury secretary to say anything about the dollar without getting into trouble," says Mr. Hormats. "It's very easy for him to do nothing about the dollar and stay out of trouble, and I think that's what they're going to do. You've got to talk the strong dollar -- and not do anything if the dollar weakens."

Frank Vargo, vice president for international economics at the National Association of Manufacturers, says the dollar's decline against the euro already is helping narrow the U.S. trade deficit with Europe in manufactured goods, which has grown wider every year for the past decade. NAM expects the gap to shrink to $95 billion this year, down from last year's $100 billion.

DOLLAR'S DECLINE

• Dollar's Decline Boosts Overseas Returns1

• Euro's Impact: Pain, Gain Across the Pond2

The narrowing also may have been caused at least in part by faster economic growth in Europe, which whets Europeans' appetite for U.S. goods, and slower growth in the U.S.

Major European currencies have been boosted lately by the strength of the region's economies and by market perceptions that European interest rates are more likely to keep rising than U.S. rates. Higher interest rates make a currency more attractive to investors because they provide a higher return.

In late New York trading yesterday, one euro bought $1.3244, up from $1.3146 Wednesday, continuing a rally that began last Friday when the European currency broke out of the $1.25 to $1.30 trading range it had occupied for about six months. The dollar has fallen more than 2% against the euro in the past week. The euro also has touched a new high against the Japanese yen.

Yesterday, the pound was lifted by news from British mortgage lender Nationwide Building Society that house prices in the United Kingdom rose 1.4% in November and are now up 9.6% for the year, their fastest growth since February 2005. The markets took that as a sign that the Bank of England might raise interest rates again as early as February. The pound surged to $1.9659 in late New York trading, up from $1.9449 late Wednesday and higher than at any time since September 1992, when it pulled out of the European Union's exchange-rate mechanism, the precursor of the euro.

Mr. Paulson has to tread carefully when it comes to the dollar, balancing competing domestic interests, the administration's own laissez-faire philosophy and the risk of a misstep that could roil financial markets. If he presses overtly for a broad decline in the dollar, he risks spooking financial markets and turning a gradual slide into a steep drop.

"Nobody wants a rout -- a disorderly, panicky decline in the dollar," says Princeton University economist Alan Blinder, a former vice chairman of the Federal Reserve Board. A sharp drop in the dollar probably would lead foreign investors, who lend heavily to the U.S., to demand much higher interest rates.

To fend off protectionist urges in Congress and hostility there toward China, Mr. Paulson has been lobbying Beijing to allow the yuan to rise and, by implication, the dollar to fall. U.S. manufacturers, their workers and their congressional representatives argue that China's policy of keeping its currency artificially weak gives Chinese products an unfair advantage in global markets.

Mr. Paulson is expected to renew his push for the Chinese government to relax its grip on the yuan when he leads a large, high-level U.S. delegation to China later this month.

"We want him to convince [China] to move" on its currency policy, says NAM's Mr. Vargo. "If it doesn't happen, you can believe there will be renewed efforts in Congress to pass legislation of some sort or other, and protectionism is going to rise."

The Chinese have been allowing the yuan to creep higher against the U.S. in the past few months, and the currency is now 5.7% stronger than it was in July 2005, when authorities initially allowed it to move.

DOJ_NMG_0100374

Some strategists, meanwhile, expect downward pressure on the dollar against European currencies to persist for the rest of the year as worries about the vigor of the U.S. economy mount. Yesterday's U.S. economic data, particularly a weak reading on the Chicago purchasing-managers index and a report showing a jump in the nation's number of job seekers, contributed to the dollar's decline.

"The risks for U.S. economic data in the very near term are on the downside, with recent numbers suggesting the expected recovery will be postponed to the first quarter of next year. By contrast, European data continue to come in strong," says David Woo, head of global foreign-exchange strategy at Barclays Capital in London.

Grant Aldonas, who was undersecretary of commerce for international trade earlier in the Bush administration, predicts that the dollar's droop will persist. "I think Treasury would be glad to see that happen because it would be in line with economic fundamentals," he says.

Despite a call by French Finance Minister Thierry Breton for collective vigilance on the exchange-rate front, markets see little sign that global governments intend to intervene to arrest the dollar's slide. "To date there hasn't been any unified protest over the weakness of the dollar," says David Gilmore at Foreign Exchange Analytics, a consulting firm. "That is a green light to dollar sellers.

Joseph Quinlan, chief market strategist at Bank of America Corp., says a weaker dollar wouldn't be welcome everywhere. "Such a move would undercut the primary source of growth of many nations: exports" to the U.S, he wrote in a recent report to clients. "The world just isn't ready for a weaker U.S. dollar."

Seasonal factors may be contributing to dollar weakness, perhaps as European companies and investors sell dollars to repatriate profits. A research note from Barclays Capital says the dollar has fallen against the euro in the first two weeks of December every year since the euro's birth in 1999.

Dollar Slides As US Business Slows (FT)

By Richard Beales In New York

Financial Times, December 1, 2006

The dollar suffered sharp falls on Thursday, hit by reports of weak US business activity and a benign inflation picture.

The euro rose 0.7 per cent against the dollar to $1.3247 by late afternoon in New York after data from Chicago purchasing managers indicated that business activity in the Midwest unexpectedly fell last month.

Sterling rose to its highest level against the dollar since its ejection from the European Exchange Rate Mechanism in September 1992 as UK house prices continued to show rapid growth. The pound rose to $1.9699 before edging back to $1.9658, almost 1 per cent up on the day. The yen also gained, up 0.5 per cent against the dollar to Y115.77.

A report revealed that inflation in US personal consumption expenditure excluding food and energy, the Federal Reserve's preferred inflation benchmark, held steady in October at 2.4 per cent year-on-year. Data suggested further inflation-fighting interest rate rises by the Fed, which could support the dollar, were even less likely to be needed.

The slide in the dollar was briefly arrested on Wednesday following an upward revision to official estimates of US third-quarter growth.

Michael Woolfolk, foreign exchange strategist at Bank of New York, said: "[The] personal income and spending report and Chicago PMI were the one-two punch that knocked the dollar back on the ropes, leaving little doubt over near-term direction in the beleaguered greenback."

The Chicago purchasing managers' index is regarded as a leading indicator of the national manufacturing index from the Institute for Supply Management, due today. The Chicago PMI index fell to 49.9 last month from 53.5 in October. Many economists had expected it to rise. The core personal consumption expenditure deflator, which excludes food and energy prices, rose 0.2 per cent, against a consensus forecast of 0.1 per cent.

Simon Hayley of Capital Economics said risk aversion could start playing a greater role in the dollar's decline, as traders shied away from the carry trade, in which traders borrow cheaply in yen and buy higher-yielding currencies: "The risk of short-term dollar weakness may now be greatest against the yen."

DOJ_NMG_0100375

But Alan Ruskin, chief international strategist at RBS Greenwich Capital, said: "Ultimately the lesson from recent days and many other past events is that a weaker US dollar is highly unlikely to turn into a freefall [and] tends not to have a lasting negative impact on US asset markets," he said.

Conflicting Signals Leave Stocks Mixed (USAT)

By Matt Krantz

USA Today, December 1, 2006

Stocks flip-flopped from losses to gains Thursday before settling mixed after the bulls were discouraged by a raft of negative news.

Another jump in the price of oil, a report showing weak manufacturing activity in the Midwest and a disappointing sales forecast from Wal-Mart were some of the headlines souring investors.

The Dow Jones industrial average closed 4.80 points lower at 12,221.93, knocking its year-to-date gain to 14%. Likewise, the tech-heavy Nasdaq composite index fell 0.46 points to 2431.77, reducing its 2006 gain to 10.3%.

The Standard & Poor's 500 resisted the gravitational pull and finished up 1.15 points to 1400.63. The index, though, had been up 6.82 points at its high during the day. Still, the S&P 500 has gained 12.2% this year largely thanks to strength of stocks in the steel, office real estate investment trust and metals and mining industries.

There were too many negatives for investors to overcome Thursday, says Chuck Stutenroth, portfolio manager at ZAR Fund Group. "There are so many undercurrents driving conflicting points of view," he says. "We're seeing markets swing on any piec e of news," he says.

Oil was a big factor. The price of a barrel of oil rose 67 cents to $63.13, creating a 7% increase in November.

But a weaker-than-expected reading of the Chicago Purchasing Managers index, which measures Midwest manufacturing, showing economic contraction didn't help. And the dollar fell to a 14-year low against the British pound.

There was some positive news, namely the Commerce Department saying consumer spending rose 0.2% in October. "Investors took some comfort they shouldn't count the consumer out quite yet," says Jack Ablin, chief investment officer at Harris Private Bank.

But investors are perplexed at all the mixed messages. For instance, the yield on the 10-year Treasury fell 0.06 point to 4.46%, suggesting some investors fear economic weakness, Ablin says.

"It's a market that's seemingly conflicted," he says.

Highlights:

ExxonMobil gained 78 cents to $76.81, and Chevron rose $1.27 to $72.32 in reaction to higher oil prices.

•Wal-Mart fell 79 cents to $46.10 on the retailer's warning that holiday sales would be disappointing. (Story, 3B.)

•Pfizer rose 42 cents to $27.49 after the drugmaker boosted its 2006 profit forecast by 2.5%.

Economic Storm Signals (NYT)

By Paul Krugman

The New York Times, December 1, 2006

"It's tough to make predictions," Yogi Berra is supposed to have said, "especially about the future." Actually, his remark makes perfect sense to economists, who sometimes have trouble making predictions about the present. And this is one of those times.

We're now two-thirds of the way through the fourth quarter of 2006, so you might think we'd already know how the quarter is going. Yet, economists' assessments of the current state of the U.S. economy, never mind the future, are all over the place.

And here's the bad news: this kind of confusion about what's going on is what typically happens when the economy is at a turning point, when an economic expansion is about to turn into a recession (or vice versa). At turning points, the various indicators that usually tell us which way the economic wind is blowing often point in different directions, so that both optimists and pessimists can find data to support their position.

The last time things were this confused was early in 2001, when most economists failed to realize that the United States was sliding into recession. If that sounds ominous, it should: the bond market, which has a pretty good record of forecasting recessions, is pointing toward a serious economic slowdown next year.

Before I explain what the bond market is telling us, let's talk about why the economy may be at a turning point.

Between mid-2003 and mid-2006, economic growth in the United States was fueled mainly by a huge housing boom, which created jobs directly and made it easy for consumers to spend freely by borrowing against their rising home equity.

That housing boom has now gone bust. But the optimists and pessimists disagree both about how bad the bust will get and about how much damage the housing slump will do to the economy as a whole.

The optimists include Alan Greenspan, whom some accuse of letting the housing bubble get out of hand in the first place. On Tuesday, he told investors at a conference that the worst of the housing slump is over, saying that "it looks as though sales figures have stabilized."

But the very next day the government released grim data on new home sales for October, and revised its estimates for earlier months downward. Most, though not all, of the other economic numbers that came out this week were also substantially weaker than expected.

Pessimists feel vindicated by the downbeat data. Nouriel Roubini of Roubini Global Economics, who has been forecasting a housing-led recession for some time, now believes that the economy has already stalled: he predicts zero growth for the current quarter. Economists at Deutsche Bank say the same thing.

But that's still a minority position; most forecasters are still telling us not to worry. So whom should you listen to? And how can you avoid believing what you want to believe?

Maybe the best answer is to look at what the financial markets say. Not the stock market, which is a notoriously bad indicator of the economy's direction, but the bond market. (Paul Samuelson, the Nobel Prize-winning M.I.T. economist, famously quipped that the stock market had predicted nine of the last five recessions).

Since last summer, when the housing bust became unmistakable, interest rates on long-term bonds have fallen sharply. They're now yielding much less than short-term bonds. The fact that investors are willing to buy those long-term bonds anyway tells us that these investors expect interest rates to fall. And that will happen only if the economy weakens, forcing the Federal Reserve to cut rates. So bond buyers are, in effect, betting on a future economic slowdown.

How serious a slump is the bond market predicting? Pretty serious. Right now, statistical models based on the historical correlation between interest rates and recessions give roughly even odds that we're about to experience a formal recession. And since even a slowdown that doesn't formally qualify as a recession can lead to a sharp rise in unemployment, the odds are very good — maybe 2 to 1 — that 2007 will be a very tough year.

Luckily, we've got good leadership for the coming economic storm: the White House is occupied by a man who's ideologically flexible, listens to a wide variety of views, and understands that policy has to be based on careful analysis, not gut instincts. Oh, wait.

GOP Chairman Urges Party To Get On Track (AP)

By Liz Sidoti

AP, December 1, 2006

The sting of Republican electoral defeats still fresh, the GOP chairman suggested Thursday the party has strayed and challenged it to refocus on core principles and reform.

"We work for the people," Ken Mehlman, the outgoing chairman of the Republican National Committee, said in a speech to a meeting of GOP governors. He reminded the crowd that "good policy makes good politics — and, for Republicans, this must be a time for self-examination when it comes to our policy."

In a disastrous midterm election year for the GOP, Republican candidates lost races across the country and at all levels of government, prompting party leaders to do some soul searching as they seek a winning strategy for 2008 and beyond.

Democrats captured control of the House and Senate, took a majority of governors' posts and gained a decisive edge in state legislatures as Republicans failed to withstand fallout from a sour national mood created by the war in Iraq and scandals in Washington.

"Our nation is stronger and better when Republicans are the party running the government. But, ladies and gentleman, our party should never be the party of government, of Washington, of earmarks, of bureaucracy," Mehlman said, implying that's what the GOP had become at times — or at least what voters perceived on Nov. 7.

Three weeks after the losses, about a dozen GOP governors gathered in this Miami suburb for their association's annual meeting. The 2008 election loomed large, given that the outgoing RGA chairman is Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney, who is considering running for president. Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee, also weighing a bid, attended the meeting.

Not to be forgotten, Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., who is widely considered the one to beat and has created a presidential exploratory committee, held a reception for those attending RGA events.

Despite the undercurrent of the presidential race, the focus remained on what went wrong in 2006 and how to ensure the GOP recovers.

"To some degree, we've lost our way," acknowledged Gov. Sonny Perdue of Georgia, the incoming RGA chairman, who said the party must ensure it implements policies that are in line with its principles.

Romney, for his part, suggested that lawmakers in Washington — not GOP governors — are the ones who need to get back on track, saying: "If the Republican Party, nationally, is looking for a place where it can gain a bit of a guiding post, it would by seeing the successes of Republican governors."

He also took a swipe at Republicans on Capitol Hill for promising to hold down spending but then beefing up budget bills with millions for pet projects. "There's nothing that's going to yield a bigger swat — or a thumping if you will — than saying one thing and doing another," Romney said at a news conference, using the spending issue as an example.

Mehlman, who will leave his post when his term ends in January, said the party's most important task in the coming two years will be to rekindle a spirit of reform — changing its governing while staying true to the party's long-standing ideals of limited government, individual freedom and a strong national defense.

"It must be our party that faces the new challenges of the 21st century head-on. It must be our party that recommits itself also to being the party of change. Because it's the Republicans who are the party of reform on all these issues — health care, job creation and the war on terror," he said.

Republicans, Mehlman said, must take power out of Washington and give it back to Americans, arguing that Democrats won't.

"They believe that government and Washington has the answer to every question, the solution to every problem," he said. "We, as Republicans, don't believe that. But, if you think about it, sometimes over the past two years, we've behaved as if we do."

GOP Must Correct Its Mistakes, Mehlman Says (WP)

By Shailagh Murray

The Washington Post, December 1, 2006

MIAMI, Nov. 30 -- Republican National Committee Chairman Ken Mehlman warned a somber and diminished gathering of GOP governors that the party will face years in the political wilderness unless it corrects the mistakes that led to last month's election losses.

"If we shrug our shoulders and say, 'It was just a fluke, a perfect storm of factors out of our control,' then we will lose again in 2008," Mehlman told the Republican Governors Association at its annual meeting, as he prepares to step down from the RNC at the end of the year.

"If that is the approach we take, then we are destined to spend far more than one term in the minority," Mehlman added. "And we as a party will deserve it."

On Nov. 7, Democrats captured a majority of governorships, as well as control of the House and the Senate, for the first time since the Republican revolution of 1994. The remaining GOP governors will assume a higher national profile while their party is out of power in Washington and may find themselves having to help lead the way for Republican initiatives and a political comeback.

"You're the greatest and most innovative think tank in politics," Mehlman told the governors. "And now, more than ever, our party and our nation need you to do what you do best . . . to change government for changing times."

Mehlman acknowledged voter anger about the Iraq war and a spate of GOP corruption scandals, but he pointed to a broader culprit: the erosion of the core conservative principles of small government and personal responsibility. As Republicans built up their Washington power base, he noted, the center of gravity shifted away from the statehouses that had been the traditional laboratories for policy ideas. The result was a vacuum that delivered little of interest to voters, while devaluing the national Republican brand.

For their part, the governors pointed to vivid images of federal incompetence that had dragged the party down, including the botched response to Hurricane Katrina and Congress's inability to curb spending or tackle issues that voters care about, such as illegal immigration. And they decried the ethics scandals that hurt the party, such as when then-Rep. Mark Foley (R-Fla.) resigned from Congress in September after revelations that he had sent sexually suggestive electronic messages to underage male pages and that House Republican leaders had known about his behavior but had not responded aggressively.

Outgoing Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee, trying to put the best face on the losses, compared the elections to a controlled forest fire. "We didn't burn down the overall infrastructure," said Huckabee, who is testing the waters for a possible 2008 presidential run, "but we sure did get rid of a lot of the unnecessary growth and brush that really choked us. It's an opportunity to rebuild." Huckabee's successor is a Democrat.

The good news, Republican pollster Neil Newhouse told the group, is that voters hold Democrats in only slightly higher esteem than they do Republicans, and that the GOP continues to score high marks on national security and issues involving traditional values.

Structurally, the party remains sound. As a result of strong fundraising and a superior GOP voter-identification and turnout operation, many vulnerable Republicans survived. Of the 22 House elections that were determined by margins of two percentage points or less, Republicans won 13, including at least 10 races determined by fewer than 5,000 votes. And although the GOP suffered heavy losses in New England congressional races, Republican governors were reelected in Rhode Island and Vermont, two of the country's most liberal states.

In Rhode Island, Gov. Donald Carcieri narrowly won reelection, while the more moderate Republican Sen. Lincoln D. Chafee was defeated. Vermont Gov. Jim Douglas easily won reelection, although the state sent Rep. Bernard Sanders (I), one of the most liberal members of the House, to the Senate.

In a trend more worrisome to the GOP, voters have grown skeptical that Republicans possess the fresh ideas needed to solve the country's problems. That is one reason many independent and Republican voters decided to take a chance on Democrats last month. "The message is, back to basics," Newhouse said.

Or, as Mehlman told the GOP governors, back to "good policy that makes good politics." He singled out an effort by outgoing Gov. Mitt Romney, another 2008 prospect, to expand health-care coverage to all Massachusetts residents. "That is the kind of innovation we need at the state level, and in Washington," Mehlman said.

Many speakers noted that 12 GOP House seats were lost as a result of ethics scandals, but Mehlman asserted that tightening the rules through legislation would not go far enough. He said the GOP must change its internal culture, which has protected its own. "Every single person in this room and in this party must be absolute and uncompromising in seeking out those who have done wrong, without regard to party or ideology," Mehlman said in his address.

The governors were scornful of Washington spending habits, in particular earmarks, or special provisions that lawmakers like to stuff into legislation to fund pet projects. Most states have strict rules that have forced governors from both parties to cut their budgets aggressively, including in high-priority areas such as low-income health-care coverage.

Romney, who is also being succeeded by a Democrat, bristled at the suggestion that the GOP had run off course. "Where we get in trouble is where we say one thing and do something else," he said. Gesturing at the dozen governors who had joined him at a news conference, he said: "You see governors getting the job done."

'08 Hopefuls Wine, Dine For Support (WT)

By Ralph Z. Hallow

The Washington Times, December 1, 2006

MIAMI -- Sen. John McCain of Arizona brought his prospective 2008 presidential bid to what amounts to the "home turf" of a rival, Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney, seeking to line up support among the nation's Republican governors.

Attendees at the annual conference of the Republican Governors Association (RGA) were wooed at dinners featuring the two men.

Mr. Romney, the outgoing RGA chairman, held two dinners here at the same time on the same night -- one in secret for governors and donors he wanted to recruit to his side for 2008 and the other a publicly scheduled dinner for the remainder of Republican governors, spouses and donors.

Mr. McCain's well-organized campaign, however, has been stalking Republican gatherings of every kind for more than a year. For this event, McCain partisans, despite initial objections from Mr. Romney's RGA, slipped invitations under Doral Hotel room doors Tuesday night, inviting Republicans to a reception the Arizona senator sponsored last night at Don Shula's, a fancy and famous restaurant here.

Historically, governors and ex-governors have had the advantage in presidential elections -- four of the past five presidents were governors first -- but some of Mr. Romney's fellow governors say that right now, the 2008 race is shaping up as a battle between senators, with Mr. McCain the leading prospect on the Republican side and Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York as the top hopeful for Democrats.

"That's a fair assessment," said Gov. Mark Sanford, a popular South Carolina conservative. "Right now, that's the way a lot of people see it."

Despite Mr. McCain's high ratings in public opinion polls, some conservative Republicans view him with suspicion because of his support for campaign-finance regulation, sponsorship of immigration legislation that would offer citizenship to illegal aliens and other maverick stances.

Mr. Romney, a multimillionaire from a legendary political family, is casting himself as a conservative who can coalesce the anti-McCain forces in the Republican party -- a role once considered perfect for Sen. George Allen of Virginia before his defeat last month. Another conservative, outgoing Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist of Tennessee, announced this week he would not seek the presidency in 2008.

In addition to Mr. McCain and Mr. Romney, the 2008 Republican presidential field also includes former New York Mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani, a popular figure but one whom most in the GOP see as too liberal on social issues to win in crucial primaries and caucuses.

Mr. Sanford, himself courted by some conservatives to make a 2008 run, mentioned Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee and Sen. Sam Brownback of Kansas as two other Republican alternatives to Mr. McCain.

"But what I consistently hear from the conservative base that I talk to is that they're still looking," said the South Carolina governor, who was re-elected with 55 percent of the vote this year in a state that hosts a key early presidential primary in 2008.

Georgia Gov. Sonny Perdue, the incoming RGA chairman who shouldered most of the hosting duties at the scheduled dinner, said the 2008 Republican nomination contest is still wide open.

This year's RGA conference was a considerably shrunken affair, with the Republican share of the nation's governors having steadily dwindled from a high of 38 in 1998 to the 22 governors it will have next year after the net loss of six governorships in last month's elections.

Texas Gov. Rick Perry attributed the party's gubernatorial losses to the same anti-Republican mood that cost the party the majority control in Congress.

"National issues, especially the war in Iraq, had a profound impact on state races, including campaigns for governor," he said."Immigration was another powerful issue."

The Texas governor said the party needs to stand up for its conservative principles.

"Nationally, if you don't act like a Republican, the chances are they won't send you back. If the voters want to elect a Democrat, they'll choose the real thing, not a counterfeit," Mr. Perry said.

DOJ_NMG_0100380

The McCain-Romney maneuverings created a stir at the RGA conference. Mr. McCain sent dinner invitations to uncommitted governors and other Republicans attending. But the night before, Mr. Romney secretly invited a few fellow Republican governors and wealthy donors to his own special event: a private dinner at a popular South Beach restaurant, Smith & Wolensky, held simultaneously as another dinner at the Pearl Restaurant, listed on the regular published conference schedule.

"Why did Governor Romney invite me?" one Republican governor wondered aloud in a background interview. "Because I'm not committed to him or McCain or anybody else, and so he wanted to recruit me, I suppose. I'm still not committed."

Mr. Romney shuttled back and fourth between the two dinners, held about four blocks apart.

McCain Courts Crucial Support Of Governors (NYT)

By Adam Nagourney

The New York Times, December 1, 2006

DORAL, Fla., Nov. 30 — Last anyone checked, Senator John McCain of Arizona is not — and has never been — a governor.

But no matter. Mr. McCain turned up on Thursday morning at the Doral Golf Resort and Spa here for a guerrillalike visit to the annual meeting of the Republican Governors Association. That is a group headed by Mitt Romney, the Massachusetts governor who is widely viewed as Mr. McCain's chief rival for their party's 2008 presidential nomination.

As Mr. Romney gamely presided over the morning session of the meeting, Mr. McCain commandeered a room at the Doral Resort for eight hours of meetings with nine Republican governors, including Gov.-elect Charlie Crist of Florida, according to Republicans familiar with his schedule.

On Thursday evening, many of those at the conference were bused to an elaborate reception, courtesy of Mr. McCain, at a resort hotel in Miami Lakes. Somehow, no reception rooms were available for him here.

Mr. Romney has hoped, like George W. Bush in 2000 and Bob Dole in 1996, to use the overwhelming support of the Republican governors as a springboard to the presidential nomination. Mr. McCain served notice with his incursion that Mr. Romney could not take them for granted.

That said, the fact that Mr. McCain decided to fly here for three days and spend $50,000 on a reception that lathered governors with platters of shrimp and three open bars suggests just how much Mr. Romney has complicated his efforts to position himself as the inevitable nominee.

Mr. Romney politely deferred questions about 2008 when he appeared at a news conference with about 12 other governors who spent much of the session analyzing the reasons for the Republican defeats on Nov. 7 and what needed to be done to get the party back on track.

"We're not getting into '08 considerations at this press briefing," he said.

But Mr. McCain's team was only too glad to oblige, saying they were scooping up tentative endorsements on Mr. Romney's watch.

"We have a number of governors who are committed to John, but we are not ready to announce them yet," said John Weaver, Mr. McCain's senior political adviser.

Mr. Weaver strode slowly and conspicuously through the Doral lobby, teeming with governors, aides and Washington Republican consultants.

Mr. Romney's aides disputed Mr. Weaver's statement, and indeed, it would not be out of character for Mr. Weaver to be exaggerating a bit as part of a strategy to persuade recalcitrant governors to jump on a departing train.

Mr. McCain, in an interview on Thursday evening, said he was in no way invading Mr. Romney's territory.

"I've known these guys for years," he said. "I've campaigned for these people. I don't see how that's anybody's territory."

All this provided a fair amount of entertainment and helped leaven a meeting that was otherwise filled with somber assessments of the recent election that saw Republicans swept out of power in Congress.

The Republican National Committee chairman, Ken Mehlman, warned against viewing the losses as a temporary setback created by a tough electoral environment.

DOJ_NMG_0100381

"We can't simply write this election off as preordained, as the natural order of things to be automatically rectified in two years," Mr. Mehlman said, warning that the party has to figure out ways to increase its appeal.

This very exclusive group that Mr. McCain and Mr. Romney are fighting over was also diminished in the election. There will be just 22 Republican governors next year, compared with 28 now.

Governors' support has historically proved important in primary battles and general elections. Besides the presumed prestige of endorsements, governors can deliver political machines, troves of contributors and control over state offices like boards of elections.

The success of Mr. Bush, then governor of Texas, at establishing himself as a front-runner early in the 2000 race developed in no small part because he became the favorite candidate of Republican governors.

"Often more than House members and senators, governors have state structures and can make significant impacts in their state," Mr. Weaver said.

Mr. McCain's schedule included meetings on Thursday and Friday morning with the governors of Alabama, Mississippi, Indiana, Kentucky, North and South Dakota, Texas and Vermont.

Gov. Tim Pawlenty of Minnesota drove to the evening reception with Mr. McCain and later said in an interview he intended to support Mr. McCain if he ran for president.

Still, several governors said in interviews they would not be making a decision this early.

"I don't know who a single governor is supporting," said Gov. Haley Barbour of Mississippi, a former chairman of the Republican National Committee.

Mr. Barbour did say, though, that Mr. Romney, whose duties as head of the Republican Governors Association included handing out checks to Republican candidates for governor, was popular with this group of Republicans.

"Everybody likes him, and he did a very good job," he said. "But look, nobody can assume anything."

The guest list for Mr. McCain's reception included Mr. Romney and his political team. They sent their regrets, saying they were too busy with the affairs of the conference.

Mr. Romney was in a bit of a tricky position. On one hand, aides said, he did not want to look as if he was commandeering the association as a campaign tool, particularly when some of Mr. McCain's supporters have been suggesting that he was guilty of precisely that.

That said, Mr. Romney's tenure as head of this group is one reason that he is viewed as being so strongly positioned for 2008. The post has allowed him to travel around the country, including visits to important states like Iowa, appearing before Republican activists and earning good will with the same candidates, elected officials and state party leaders who are going to be critical in winning battles.

A spokesman for Mr. Romney, Eric Fehrnstrom, said the governor was not available for comment on Mr. McCain's political activities.

"Governor Romney's focused on his speech, which looks at a new generation of challenges facing America and what we must do to meet them," Mr. Fehrnstrom said. "It makes sense for Senator McCain to be here honoring Republican governors, because as a group they are fiscally conservative and innovators in education and health care policy. The answers to many of the challenges facing our nation can be found in what they are doing every day."

McCain Rains On Romney's Parade (BOS)

The Boston Globe, December 1, 2006

MIAMI -- It's been Governor Mitt Romney's show here at the annual conference of the Republican Governors Association: He's led the program, been the sought-after VIP at swank dinners and parties, and drawn much of the national media spotlight.

Until John McCain showed up.

The Arizona senator, making a strike in what Romney had hoped would be exclusively his terrain for three days, came to town and flexed his political muscle by courting the very governors, GOP activists, and lobbyists who had flown in for Romney's big event at Doral Golf Resort & Spa.

DOJ_NMG_0100382

While Romney was holding political meetings and finalizing his speech for last night's RGA dinner, McCain huddled privately with Republican governors at the same resort. Later in the day, McCain's campaign bused RGA attendees from the Doral to a catered reception at a resort owned by former Miami Dolphins coach Don Shula.

"This is only natural," Governor Haley Barbour of Mississippi explained as he sipped a mixed drink at McCain's party, saying that the dogfight for the 2008 Republican presidential nomination was well underway.

To wit: Key Republican players such as Barbour and Governor-elect Charlie Crist of Florida found themselves praised publicly by Romney at a morning press conference, then later, invited on stage next to McCain as he delivered brief remarks at his reception.

The only wrinkle in McCain's plan was the Miami traffic, which delayed him an hour and a half for his own event, leaving guests confused as they picked over the shrimp cocktail, crawfish, and crab legs.

Once he arrived, McCain dismissed a suggestion that he was horning in on Romney's territory.

"This is Florida," McCain told reporters. "I used to be a resident of the state of Florida."

The Romney-McCain tussle occurred as Republican presidential hopefuls worked to take advantage of the sudden departure from the race of Senate majority leader Bill Frist of Tennessee, which opens a slate of donors.

For example, Zachariah P. Zachariah, a Fort Lauderdale cardiologist renowned for raising big money for Republican presidential candidates, backed Frist but is now in the market for a new candidate.

Several candidates have been aggressively courting Zachariah -- Romney met with him last week, he said -- since Frist dropped his candidacy Wednesday.

''I am just digesting all these things and trying to make the decision about which one would be the best president,'' said Zachariah, who plans to choose by the end of the year

Hire the military

Pete Metzger, former military assistant to President Reagan (yes, he carried the "nuclear football"), led an intriguing panel discussion yesterday at the Army Navy Club at Farragut Square on the transition from military officer to private-sector leader.

Having held a variety of military and intelligence posts, Mr. Metzger today is vice chairman of Christian & Timbers executive search firm, whose offices are just a few blocks from the White House.

He told the audience that included presidential great-grandson and lawyer William Howard Taft IV and Council on Competitiveness President Deborah Wince-Smith that too many employers today have "preconceived notions" about hiring retired military officers — negative perceptions that he called unwarranted.

A senior military officer doesn't reach his or her rank by accident, Mr. Metzger stressed. Rather they are "highly intelligent" and capable leaders — leadership, he said, that carries over into the private sector.

"One word comes to mind: responsibility," he said.

Another panelist, 41-year-old retired Naval officer Carl C. Liebert III, recalled: "Everything I needed to learn I learned on my first ship."

Just recently, Mr. Liebert became chief executive officer of 24 Hour Fitness Worldwide Inc., the world's largest fitness center company. He had been executive vice president of the Home Depot, responsible for sales, execution and operation across all 2,000-plus U.S. and Mexico stores, and Circuit City's senior vice president.

Hurricane haiku

Yesterday marked the official end of the 2006 Atlantic hurricane season. Talk about a dud.

Not a single major hurricane made landfall, despite dire predictions to the contrary.

"If we can't depend on hurricane forecasts made one to six months ahead of time, how can we expect to depend on predictions about the behavior of hurricanes decades from now," asks David Ridenour, vice president of the National Center for

DOJ_NMG_0100383

Public Policy Research. "Those who claim that rising global temperatures would definitely lead to more intense hurricanes appear to be relying upon political science, not climate science."

Meanwhile, global-warming skeptic Christopher C. Horner, a fellow at the Competitive Enterprise Institute, sends Inside the Beltway this Japanese haiku he penned:

Hurricane season

Mercifully has ended

Why can't I name one?

By the way, we see where Mr. Horner's much-anticipated book, "The Politically Incorrect Guide to Global Warming and Environmentalism," is now available on Amazon.com, although it's not expected until Feb. 25 — the same day former Vice President Al Gore stands to win best documentary Oscar for his horror flick, "An Inconvenient Truth."

Come and eat

"The event will begin at 5 p.m. and will be off the record, but open to the press."

So reporters were informed in writing before a reception that Arizona Sen. John McCain, a likely 2008 presidential contender, hosted last evening for the nation's Republican governors.

Deck the halls

It took exactly 1,089 feet of garland to deck the halls of the White House this Christmas season.

In addition, 45,000 holiday guests of the first family's will behold 17 Christmas trees, 269 wreaths, and 4,638 red ornament balls while nibbling on 20,000 Christmas cookies, 5,000 mini-tarts, 15,000 chocolate truffle and a 300-pound gingerbread White House.

Mailbag

The bulk of this week's mail addressed Inside the Beltway's item about the Oyster Bilingual School in Northwest posting a sign that said "Holiday Tree Sale" in English and "Venta de Arboles de Navidad" in Spanish — only saying "Christmas" in Spanish, in other words.

"This country has become way too [politically correct] in my opinion," writes Patrick Beckerdite of Des Moines, Iowa. "If someone wants to wish another person 'Merry Christmas,' or have a 'Christmas' pageant at school, we shouldn't feel like we need to make any apology for it."

As far as Ed Grimley of Worcester, Mass., is concerned, "one shouldn't be saying 'Christmas' now, anyway. ... This is only the first week of Advent. Christmas doesn't begin until sundown, December 24. Get it right or shut up!"

'Underdog' Vilsack Officially Launches Campaign (DMR)

By Thomas Beaumont

Des Moines Register, December 1, 2006

Mount Pleasant, Ia. — Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack today vowed to make small-town values and Midwestern ingenuity the key to returning the Democrats to the White House and improving the nation's standing in the world, as he launched his campaign for president.

The two-term governor acknowledged his bid's long odds to the audience of more than 800 supporters at Iowa Wesleyan College in the southeast Iowa town Mount Pleasant, where Vilsack served as mayor and represented in the Iowa Senate.

"I have always been the underdog and long shot," said Vilsack, who came from behind in 1998 to win his first term as governor. "And I have always been inspired by stories of ordinary people who struggled, worked hard, but ultimately succeeded."

Vilsack, the first Democrat to enter the 2008 race, was scheduled to leave Iowa early this afternoon for Concord, N.H., to meet with party activists in the lead-off primary state.

Vilsack was expected to visit his native Pittsburgh on Saturday before returning to Des Moines that night for his inaugural presidential fundraiser at the Temple for the Performing Arts. The final leg of the ceremonial campaign kick-off takes him to Nevada, the Southwest's first caucus state, on Sunday and South Carolina, scheduled to host the South's first primary, on Monday.

DOJ_NMG_0100384

Warming up the crowd was the Mount Pleasant High School band with the theme from the film "Rocky", among other numbers. The audience included Democrats from around the state, but mostly supporters from Mount Pleasant, population 9,000. Vilsack's wife Christie, who grew up in Mount Pleasant, introduced the governor, with their two adult sons alongside on-stage.

"By any measure or standard we are less safe today as a nation than we were six years ago," Vilsack said in his typically softspoken tone during the 20-minute speech. "Our country needs bold leadership guided by the right values and the right experience."

Supporters in the college gymnasium held a 15-foot banner that read "Main St. USA needs Vilsack", while others waved the blue and red campaign signs emblazoned with the campaign's trademark red "v" for Vilsack. At times they interrupted with chants of "Go Tom Go." After the speech, Vilsack hugged his wife as confetti shot into the air from off-stage.

National polls show Vilsack has the furthest to go among the large field of Democrats weighing 2008 campaigns, with about 1 percent of Democratic voters nationally saying they would support him for the nomination.

Far better-known figures such as New York Sen. Hillary Clinton, former Sen. John Edwards and newcomer Barack Obama, an Illinois senator, rank much higher in those surveys. All of them, as well as others, mostly U.S. senators, are eyeing the 2008 race.

Vilsack, 55, portrayed himself as a Washington outsider, although he only criticized the Bush administration and generally characterized federal as dysfunctional.

"Let us stop the endless debates. Let us stop the empty talk. Let's have a campaign about serious thought, about serious problems," he said.

Vilsack seized immediately on gains Democrats made nationally and in Iowa during the Nov. 7 midterm elections, filing papers two days later forming a federal campaign committee and opening a campaign headquarters in Des Moines.

He has said he plans to attack the doubts of skeptics who say a small-state governor cannot compete for the job of commander in chief during a time of international tension and U.S. fighting overseas.

Pursuing renewable sources of energy nationally, as Vilsack takes credit for achieving in Iowa, will strengthen America's position in Middle East relations, he said.

"Let us embrace a new foreign policy, one that allows us to renew our friendships, strengthen our alliances and isolate our enemies," he said. Although Obama has not said yet he will run, Vilsack joins the junior senator from Illinois as a presidential prospect who has called for withdrawing troops from Iraq.

Vilsack has called for leaving a U.S. military presence in the country to thwart incursions from Iran and Turkey.

"Specifically in Iraq, we must act and we must act now," he said. "We must take our troops out of harm's way and say to the Iraqis, 'It is your responsibility to protect your families."

Vilsack Begins Campaign For Presidency (MGG)

By Todd Dorman

Mason City Globe Gazette, December 1, 2006

MOUNT PLEASANT – Gov. Tom Vilsack formally entered the race for the United States presidency this morning by challenging Americans to have the courage to “create change” in uncertain times at home and abroad.

Vilsack started a quest even he concedes is uphill in the same small town where he entered politics nearly 20 years ago. The two-term Democratic governor delivered his announcement to a crowd in a college gymnasium just blocks from his family’s home on Main Street.

“America needs a president who builds and creates, who makes our country more secure, who is bold and has the courage to create change,” Vilsack said in a prepared text released before his 9:30 a.m. speech. “I will be that president.”

“So today, in front of the family and friends I love and here in the community I call home, I announce my candidacy to be the next President of the United States,” Vilsack said in the text.

Vilsack argued that the country is less safe, health care costs are skyrocketing and Americans are struggling to buy homes and pay for college. He vowed to address those problems as president.

DOJ_NMG_0100385

He called for a new foreign policy that that “renews friendships, develops alliances and isolates enemies.” He called for taking U.S. troops “out of harm’s way” in Iraq while shifting the security burden to Iraqis.

“Let us have the courage to create the bold change we need. Let us stop the endless debates and empty talk,” Vilsack said.

Supporters undaunted by the ice-glazed remnants of a winter storm filled the Howe Center at Iowa Wesleyan College.

Although he is the first Democrat to formally enter the race, he is sure to face a long list of better-known, better-financed opponents. And some of those rivals are preparing to challenge Vilsack on his home turf in Iowa’s first-in-the-nation presidential caucuses in 2008.

Vilsack barely registers on early national polls charting the Democratic race. But his supporters insist it’s early and the governor says he’s not worried.

“I’ve never started out a race for any position other than being the underdog. I’m used to it. I’m comfortable with it,” Vilsack told reporters at a community potluck for supporters Wednesday night.

Vilsack turned to one of his most formidable attributes Thursday – his personal history. He told again of how his orphaned childhood began “in the arms of a stranger.” His adopted mother battled substance abuse while his father struggled to keep his business afloat.

“The deepest hole anyone can dig is addiction and dependency. My mother dug that hole, but she dug herself out,” Vilsack said. “In doing so she taught me a valuable lesson – that the courage to create change can overcome anything and that community can give you the support and confidence to succeed.”

Vilsack Is First Democrat In Presidential Derby (LAT)

By Mark Barabak

The Los Angeles Times, December 1, 2006

MOUNT PLEASANT, Iowa — With a call for change at home and abroad, Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack today became the first Democrat to formally declare his candidacy for president.

In remarks delivered in the small town where tragedy first propelled him into politics, Vilsack criticized President Bush for a "divide and conquer" approach to governing and declared, "We are less safe and less secure than we were six years ago."

"Our way of life, our quality of life and our national security have been compromised and put at risk by a national government that has been fiscally irresponsible and by a country that has grown far too dependent on oil," Vilsack said. "Foreign oil from foreign countries, some of which despise us, harbor terrorists, but gladly take our money."

His remarks were broad in sweep and stinting in details. Vilsack called for expanded access to health care, improvements to education and greater energy independence.

On Iraq, Vilsack called for "a new foreign policy, one that allows us to renew our friendships, strengthen our alliances and isolate our enemies… We must take our troops out of harm's way and say to the Iraqis, 'It is your responsibility to protect your families and your communities.'"

Strategists for Vilsack see his life story as a major selling point and he told parts of it in his remarks.

Abandoned on the steps of a Pittsburgh orphanage, he was taken into a home blighted by alcoholism, financial hardship and physical abuse. "I know what it's like to be alone and to feel as if you don't belong," he said of his rough childhood and its cycle of maternal binges and beatings with a metal belt buckle.

He met his wife at Hamilton College and after graduation moved to her hometown, Mount Pleasant, Iowa, to practice law with his father-in-law. Active in the community -- Vilsack served as head of the Rotary Club and Chamber of Commerce, among other volunteer duties -- he was recruited to run for mayor in 1986 when the incumbent was murdered by a man angry over a sewage problem.

After two terms as mayor, Vilsack tried to quit. But residents of the heavily Republican community wrote in his name and elected him a third time. He went on to serve in the state Legislature and in 1998 was elected to the first of two terms as governor. Vilsack has abided by a pledge to step down rather than seek a third term. He leaves office in January.

A run for the White House will be a steep climb, by Vilsack's own admission. "I've always been the underdog and a long shot," he said in launching his candidacy.

Vilsack, 55, registers barely a blip in national opinion surveys and finished fourth in a home-state presidential poll taken last summer by the Des Moines Register. Although the first test of 2008 will be in Iowa -- the precinct caucuses in January 2008 -- none of the other Democrats expected to enter the race in the next few months appear ready to cede the state to Vilsack.

Vilsack plans visits to New Hampshire -- host of the first presidential primary -- and stops in Nevada and South Carolina, two states added to the early voting lineup to spread the candidate selection process more evenly throughout the country.

Vilsack Announces Presidential Bid, Promises Change (CRG)

By James Q. Lynch

Cedar Rapids Gazette, December 1, 2006

MOUNT PLEASANT, IA - America needs a president who is bold and has the courage to create change, and Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack pledged this morning to be that president.

In his adopted hometown of Mount Pleasant and with his wife, Christie, at his side, the outgoing two-term Democrat formally announced he is running for president.

His campaign, which will take him to New Hampshire, South Carolina and Nevada -- states that are early stops on the road to the Democratic nomination -- as well as his native Pittsburgh, will continue the change American voted for earlier this month, Vilsack said in announcing his candidacy at Iowa Wesleyan College in Mount Pleasant.

"We sent a clear message that we wanted our country led in a new and better direction," he said in remarks prepared for broadcast today, promising to be an agent of "even bolder change (to) build an even stronger future for our great nation."

DOJ_NMG_0100387

Courage to create change" is the theme of the Vilsack campaign, and the 55-year-old attorney said it's time to "stop the endless debates and empty talk" and act boldly.

"Most of all, I am running for president to replace the anxiety of today with the hope of tomorrow and to guarantee every American their birthright: Opportunity," Vilsack said. "It will take courage to create this change. But by restoring America's community, optimism and can-do spirit, we will succeed."

The blueprint for the change already exists, he said.

"In the past eight years, Iowa successfully changed farm fields into energy fields. We changed the traditional idea of agriculture and became the national leader in renewable fuel and energy production. As a state, we became more economically, environmentally and energy secure," Vilsack told his local audience as well as members of the national media on hand for the campaign kick-off that was preceded by a community potluck supper Wednesday night.

"If you drive around Iowa today, you will see a changing landscape marked by new ethanol and bio-fuel production plants and wind farms. We had the courage to create change in education, health care and government itself," Vilsack continued. "And by having the courage to create change, we provided greater security and opportunity to our people."

He wants to continue that work on a national stage -- "to continue our work, and to bring the courage to create change to America."

Vilsack acknowledged the long-shot nature of his campaign.

"I have always been the underdog and long shot," Vilsack said. "And I have always been inspired by stories of ordinary people who struggled, but ultimately succeeded."

Creating change in America not only will take leadership, but "an active sense of community," Vilsack said.

Community is not something found only behind the white picket fences of Mount Pleasant, Vilsack said. In fact, some of the nation's strongest communities have neither picket fences nor yards.

"In these communities there are countless American success stories immigrants from every continent who traveled here to farm field, work in factories and pursue the American Dream,'' he said. "Our country must always remain a destination for those in pursuit of that dream, for a better life for their family and to live in freedom. That too is why I am here,'' Vilsack said.

As a community with courage, he said, the nation can create a health care system that prevents illness and saves lives without bankrupting health care consumers; create n education system to help every child be as "inquisitive and create as God intended them to be," and build a 21st century economy of cutting-edge companies and technologies that lead to energy security.

And, he said, with courage, the nation can embrace a new foreign policy "that renews friendships, develops alliances and isolates enemies."

In Iraq, the U.S. must act to take troops out of "harm's way and allow Iraqis to begin providing for their own security."

Vilsack said he is running for president because every American has the right to pursue changes that will improve their life, to pursue the American dream.

"I am running for president because every community should contribute to our success," he said. "Americans who live in cities, barrios, suburbs and small towns all deserve a president who works for and remembers them.

"America needs a president who builds and create, who makes our country more secure, who is bold and has the courage to create change," Vilsack said. "I will be that president."

Dem Vilsack Enters 2008 White House Race (AP)

By Mike Glover

AP, December 1, 2006

Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack announced his candidacy for the Democratic presidential nomination Thursday, positioning himself as a Washington outsider with heartland appeal.

Vilsack also emphasized the nexus between oil dependence, national security and the economy, saying he would give high priority to weaning the nation off foreign oil and promoting alternative energy.

DOJ_NMG_0100388

"Energy security will revitalize rural America," Vilsack told more than 500 cheering backers in the small town where he began his political career as mayor. "Energy security will allow us once and for all to remove and reduce our dependency on foreign oil from foreign countries that do not like us."

Taking aim at President Bush, Vilsack said: "We have in the White House a president whose first impulse is to divide and to conquer, who preys on our insecurities and fears for partisan gain ... "

Instead, Vilsack, the first Democrat to formally enter the race, vowed to have "the courage to create change" and resist the "endless partisan debates."

In an era when voter unhappiness with corruption and partisan wrangling in Washington is especially high, political analysts said Vilsack is particularly well-positioned as a Midwestern governor to run for the White House as an outsider.

Nevertheless, Vilsack has a low profile outside Iowa and even he acknowledges his candidacy is a long shot.

Vilsack, who is finishing his second term, headed out quickly after his announcement for events in New Hampshire, South Carolina, Nevada and other states holding early tests of strength in the nomination contest.

During his tenure as governor, Vilsack has pushed for developing alternative energy sources such as ethanol, biodiesel and wind power.

"In the past eight years, I have helped lead our state, Iowa, to successfully changing by making our farm fields into energy fields," said Vilsack. "We became the renewable fuel leader and producer in the country. It helped us to become more economically, environmentally and energy secure."

As governor, Vilsack, 55, has carved out a reputation as a political centrist. He balanced Iowa's budget and resisted raising taxes, but was willing to spend money on such priorities as education and health.

Ticking off some of his accomplishments, Vilsack said the state has the best air quality in the nation, the lowest dropout rate and the second best record for health insurance coverage.

He argued that pushing alternative energy sources is key to bolstering rural sections of the nation that are struggling economically and with vanishing populations.

"If you drive around Iowa today, you will see a changing landscape marked by new ethanol and biofuel production plants and wind farms," Vilsack said.

Promoting alternative energy sources is an issue with broad public appeal. It also has special appeal in some key early voting states, such as Nevada, with its abundant sunshine and geothermal resources.

A national poll last February by the Pew Research Center for People and the Press found overwhelming bipartisan support for promoting alternative energy, including 82 percent in favor of increased federal funding for alternative energy research.

Vilsack signaled a key element of his campaign will be his compelling personal story. Born in Pittsburgh, Vilsack was adopted and speaks often of his adoptive mother's struggle with alcoholism and his adoptive father's financial struggles.

"I began life in an orphanage in the hands of a stranger. I was adopted into a loving but troubled home," Vilsack said. "I know what it is like to feel alone and to feel as if you do not belong."

While Vilsack remains popular with Iowa Democrats, he doesn't start off as the favorite to win the state's leadoff caucuses. Other potential Democratic candidates are already at work in the state.

Former North Carolina Sen. John Edwards was in Iowa Wednesday, and Indiana Sen. Evan Bayh is scheduled to visit next week. Other potential contenders include Sens. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York and Barack Obama of Illinois, and New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson.

Among Republicans, Sen. John McCain of Arizona, Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney and former New York City Mayor Rudy Giuliani are the most prominent.

Another hurdle for Vilsack is fundraising. Coming from a small population state and without a national money niche to call his own, it remains to be seen whether Vilsack can raise the $20 million political experts estimate he needs to have in hand by June.

Vilsack dismissed those shortcomings.

"I have always been the underdog and long shot," said Vilsack. "And I have always been inspired by stories of ordinary people who struggled, but ultimately succeeded."

Iowa Governor Begins His Bid For President (WP)

By Dan Balz

The Washington Post, December 1, 2006

MOUNT PLEASANT, Iowa, Nov. 30 -- Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack (D) launched his campaign for president here Thursday with a jab at President Bush's leadership, a warning that America's way of life is threatened, and a pledge to overcome the country's challenges with big ideas on energy, education, the economy and health care.

"America needs a president who builds and creates, who makes our country more secure, who is bold and has the courage to create change," Vilsack told a crowd in his adopted hometown. "I will be that president."

Vilsack, who is stepping down in January after two terms in office, begins his bid for the 2008 Democratic nomination overshadowed by such possible rivals as Sens. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York and Barack Obama of Illinois . He brings to the contest the credentials of a Washington outsider and success as an underdog who appears undaunted by his lesser-known status.

Speaking to several hundred supporters on the campus of Iowa Wesleyan College here, Vilsack talked forthrightly about his standing in the field of candidates. "You know, I've always been an underdog and a long shot," he said. "I've always been inspired by the stories of ordinary citizens who worked hard, overcame adversity and succeeded."

In an interview shortly before leaving Iowa for a campaign swing to New Hampshire and other states with early caucuses and primaries, Vilsack expanded on that theme, predicting that, as people get to know him and his record, he will hold up well against his rivals. "I just want to be on the stage," he said. "If I'm on the stage, I'll take my chances. I'll take my shot with anybody."

Vilsack is the first official candidate for president in 2008, but his announcement comes at a time of accelerating activity among a large cast of characters in what will be one of the most wide-open campaigns in modern history.

Outgoing Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney (R) announced additions to his staff this week as he continues aggressive preparations for a likely run for his party's nomination.

Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) set up a presidential exploratory committee last month and delivered a pair of speeches to conservatives outlining his vision for rebuilding a fractured Republican Party. Both he and Romney were in Miami on Thursday courting Republican governors.

Former New York mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani (R) has also established an exploratory committee.

Among Democrats, Obama has been seeking advice in advance of his decision, which aides have said will not come before the end of the year. He has had conversations with prominent Iowa Democrats, and he plans a trip to New Hampshire on Dec. 10. Clinton is quietly weighing her options, and Democrats say her advisers are closely monitoring the groundswell around Obama.

Vilsack did not have his state to himself as he launched his candidacy. On Wednesday, former senator John Edwards (D-N.C.) drew a big crowd at a book signing in Des Moines. Sen. Evan Bayh (D-Ind.) will be in Iowa on Monday -- it will be his 12th such visit to the state, which will hold the first presidential caucuses in 2008.

Vilsack's first challenge will be to win those caucuses, scheduled for January 2008. A Des Moines Register poll of Democratic activists earlier this year showed him running behind Edwards. Vilsack said Thursday that he welcomes all challengers in the state.

"I'm confident that by the end of the process, we will have convinced a lot of Iowans that I have the capacity and the capability to do this job and I deserve to be on that stage, and I think that they will support me," he said in the interview.

He also said he will attempt to force a competition of ideas with his rivals. "There may be people with better ideas, and if they have better ideas then they deserve to win," he said.

Experience as a governor has shown to be a surer route to the White House than experience in the Senate has been. And Vilsack's advisers believe that, in addition to his record as governor, his personal story will prove compelling.

Orphaned as an infant, he was adopted into the home of a mother who battled alcohol and drug addiction and eventually abandoned her family. His mother later overcame her addictions, and the family reunited.

DOJ_NMG_0100390

"She relied on her faith and her family and her friends," he said. "And in doing so, she taught me a very valuable lesson. And that is that the courage to create change can overcome the largest of obstacles, and that community can give you the confidence and the support to try and to succeed."

Vilsack, who turns 56 this month, was born in Pittsburgh and came to Iowa through marriage. He and his wife, Christie Vilsack, settled in this small town (population about 8,700), where she was raised, and he practiced law with his father-in-law. He served as the town's mayor and later as a state senator.

In 1998 Vilsack ran for governor, won the primary in an upset and entered the general election as an underdog. He overcame a substantial deficit in the polls and was elected as Iowa's first Democratic governor in three decades. He will leave office with Democrats holding the governor's office and both houses of the state legislature for the first time in four decades.

Vilsack also has played on the national stage. He served as chairman of the Democratic Governors Association, earning a reputation as a serious student of public policy and a hard-charging politician. He is the current chairman of the Democratic Leadership Council, where he has helped to bridge the gap between the centrist and labor wings of the Democratic Party.

Vilsack brings limited national security experience to the presidential campaign but has said he believes that his executive experience and his ability to make good decisions outweigh that gap in his rÃ©sumÃ©.

Vilsack opened his speech Thursday with a rebuke of the Bush presidency, saying, "We have in the White House a president whose first impulse is to divide and to conquer, who preys on our insecurities and fears for partisan gain, who has robbed us of the assets that have made this country great: our collective sense of community, optimism and the can-do spirit that has built tomorrow's hopes and dreams."

He charged that the country is less safe today than it was six years ago. "Our way of life, our quality of life, our national security has been compromised and put at risk by a national government that's been fiscally irresponsible and by a country that has grown far too dependent on oil, foreign oil from foreign countries, some of which despise us, harbor terrorists, but gladly take our money," he said.

He called energy security a critical challenge in the fight against terrorism and global economic competition. "Energy security will revitalize rural America, reestablish our moral leadership on global warming," he said.

On Iraq, he said it is time to begin to withdraw U.S. troops while redoubling reconstruction efforts. He said the next president must rebuild U.S. alliances around the world to combat the threat of terrorism and isolate enemies.

Iowa Governor Vilsack Launches His Campaign (MINNST)

By Thomas Fitzgerald

Minneapolis Star Tribune, December 1, 2006

MOUNT PLEASANT, IOWA - Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack became the first Democrat to formally launch his 2008 campaign for president Thursday, attacking the "divide and conquer" leadership of President Bush and promising to restore a sense of community to the nation.

"Our country needs a president that builds and creates," Vilsack said during a rally at Iowa Wesleyan College in his adopted hometown. "Our country needs a president that makes us more secure by confronting our problems ... who will lead bold change."

Vilsack, 55, is a centrist who heads the Democratic Leadership Council. His strategists believe that his profile fits the times, after a midterm election that gave Democrats control of Congress largely because moderate swing voters rebelled against Republican rule.

After all, the profile -- obscure governor from a small state with a head for policy -- worked for Bill Clinton (Arkansas) and Jimmy Carter (Georgia), who happen to be the last two Democratic presidents.

Still, Vilsack faces formidable odds, overshadowed by potential superstar rivals in New York Sen. Hillary Clinton and Illinois Sen. Barack Obama.

Both members of the party's 2004 ticket, Sen. John Kerry of Massachusetts and former Sen. John Edwards of North Carolina, are thinking of running. And there's potential competition from two centrists with gubernatorial experience: Sen. Evan Bayh of Indiana, a former governor, and Gov. Bill Richardson of New Mexico.

DOJ_NMG_0100391

His speech was long on vision but short on specific policy prescriptions. Vilsack called for energy independence -- as governor, he has pushed ethanol and biodiesel -- greater access to health care and improvements in education that are deeper than scores on standardized tests.

He also advocated "a new foreign policy, one that allows us to renew our friendships, strengthen our alliances and isolate our enemies." In Iraq, Vilsack said, "We must act and we must act now. We must take our troops out of harm's way and say to the Iraqis, 'It is your responsibility to protect your families and your communities.' "

Iowa Gov. Vilsack Will Seek Democratic Presidential Nomination (CQ)

By David Miller

Congressional Quarterly, December 1, 2006

Democratic Gov. Tom Vilsack of Iowa kicked off his 2008 presidential campaign Thursday with a speech in Mount Pleasant, Iowa, acknowledging his underdog status while pledging to compete hard for the job.

"Let us have the courage, let us have the courage to create the bold change this country needs," he said. "Let us stop the endless partisan debates. Let us stop the empty talk. Let's have a campaign of serious thought about serious problems that our nation faces."

Vilsack has been popular throughout his two terms as governor in Iowa, which hosts the nation's first presidential nominating contest in 2008. Democrats take note that he was the state's first governor from their party in 32 years. In recent years he has worked hard to broaden his portfolio with a heartland-focused message assailing Washington's pork barrel spending and arguing for an end to what he derides as corporate giveaways in federal budget and tax policies.

He has raised more than $2 million for his current political action committee, but that pales in comparison to the fundraising capabilities of some other Democratic hopefuls, including Sens. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York and Barack Obama of Illinois.

Vilsack has also ranked near or at the bottom of polls asking who voters would support in a race for the Democratic nomination.

While governors tend to fare well in presidential races, it is not a safe bet that Vilsack's popularity in Iowa will catapult him to success nationwide: In 1992, Democratic Sen. Tom Harkin's presidential bid quickly lost steam after his win in the Iowa caucuses.

First Governor Says He'll Run For President (USAT)

By Jill Lawrence

USA Today, December 1, 2006

Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack on Thursday became the first of several governors expected to test their traditional strength as presidential candidates at a time when campaigns are shadowed by terrorism and the Iraq war.

Former governors have occupied the White House for 26 of the past 30 years, propelled by their experience running states and the absence of voting records ripe for dissection. But in the post-9/11 era, with violence gripping Iraq, they face a special challenge in convincing voters they can keep the country safe.

"For governors, there is always that question, particularly in light of Iraq," says former Virginia governor Mark Warner, who recently decided against a presidential bid.

Former Massachusetts governor Michael Dukakis, the 1988 Democratic presidential nominee, lost to then-Vice President George H.W. Bush, a former diplomat and CIA director, during the Cold War. However, Dukakis says governors can win the presidency in tense times, citing the Cold-War-era victories of former governors Ronald Reagan and Jimmy Carter.

What's more, Dukakis says, Reagan, Carter and Bill Clinton had honed consensus-building skills that helped them succeed on the world stage. "All in their own way proved themselves to be very adept international negotiators," he says.

In 2004, the only governor to run — former Vermont governor Howard Dean — lost the Democratic nomination to Massachusetts Sen. John Kerry, a military veteran long on foreign policy experience. Like other senators before him, dogged by long paper trails and Senate habits such as speaking at length, Kerry went on to lose.

"Senators are difficult candidates," says Karen Hult, a presidential studies professor at Virginia Tech. "There are always some votes that can be singled out and criticized. And senators haven't demonstrated expertise in running large organizations."

Vilsack kicked off a five-day, five-state tour Thursday in Mount Pleasant, Iowa, with a short announcement speech centered largely on his background and accomplishments: an orphan adopted by a woman who conquered alcoholism and prescription drug addiction, a two-term governor who turned "farm fields into energy fields" dotted with wind farms and ethanol and biofuel plants.

Vilsack, chairman of the centrist Democratic Leadership Council, devoted two paragraphs to world affairs. He called for "a new foreign policy that renews friendships, develops alliances and isolates enemies," and said U.S. troops in Iraq must be moved "out of harm's way." He also promoted energy independence, saying the United States must stop sending money to countries that "despise us and harbor terrorists."

Democrats have two other prospects with gubernatorial experience: Sen. Evan Bayh of Indiana, a two-term governor who has gained exposure to foreign affairs in the Senate; and New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson, who earlier served as U.N. ambassador, U.S. Energy secretary and in Congress and just won his second term in a landslide.

Republican governors Mitt Romney of Massachusetts, Mike Huckabee of Arkansas and George Pataki of New York also are contemplating campaigns, as is former Republican governor Tommy Thompson of Wisconsin. They are known mostly for achievements in areas such as health and welfare.

"If the war on terror is the issue, governors are not the answer," says GOP consultant Mark McKinnon, who helped elect President Bush. He has a dog in the fight: He is an adviser to Arizona Sen. John McCain, a former Navy pilot and Vietnam prisoner of war who has helped shape national defense and foreign policy for years.

The flip side of McKinnon's argument is that governors were not involved in the authorization, management or oversight of the unpopular Iraq war. "It works to their benefit," says Republican strategist Rich Galen, because they can propose solutions without contradicting their past votes or views.

Governors often have some types of security and international experience. They are responsible for National Guard troops, some aspects of homeland security and promoting their states' products abroad. Governors of border states also work with officials from Mexico and Canada on issues such as immigration and drug trafficking.

Had he run, Warner says, he would have highlighted his "ultimate responsibility" for protecting his state after the Sept. 11 attack on the Pentagon. For governors, as opposed to legislators, he says, "the buck stops here."

Vilsack has "done a lot of thinking about agriculture and food security because that's the lifeblood of the state," says Leslie Gelb, former president of the Council on Foreign Relations. Vilsack also has taken advantage of his job to learn his way around the globe.

He recently told the Asia Society he had visited China, Taiwan, Japan, South Korea, Iraq, Afghanistan and India. "Part of it obviously is a result of trade, part obviously a result of visiting troops and having a chance to meet with prime ministers and presidents and foreign ministers," he said. "The job of governor is different than it used to be."

Iowa Governor Is First Democrat To Start Presidential Run (NYT)

By Jeff Zeleny

The New York Times, December 1, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 30 — Gov. Tom Vilsack of Iowa formally opened his campaign for the Democratic presidential nomination on Thursday, billing himself as the not-from-Washington candidate who would strive to renew a forgotten sense of community across America and offer common-sense judgment in foreign policy.

Mr. Vilsack, who is stepping down in January after two terms as governor, was the first Democrat to declare his presidential intentions officially. He staged a rally in his adopted hometown, Mount Pleasant, Iowa, before setting off on a five-day tour to the early primary states of New Hampshire and South Carolina, as well as his native Pennsylvania.

"I have always been an underdog and a long shot," Mr. Vilsack said, addressing one of the biggest challenges he faces in a fiercely competitive 2008 campaign. "I've always been inspired by the stories of ordinary citizens who worked hard, overcame adversity and succeeded."

Mr. Vilsack, who turns 56 in December, will not have the Democratic presidential race to himself for long. Senators Evan Bayh of Indiana, Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York and Barack Obama of Illinois are among those quietly making preparations for possible campaigns, as is former Senator John Edwards of North Carolina.

But Mr. Vilsack, who opened a presidential campaign account two days after Election Day, was seeking to gain advantages by jumping in first. In a telephone interview from Iowa before boarding a chartered plane to Concord, N.H., he conceded that he lagged behind prospective rivals in name recognition and fund-raising strength, but he said he intended to highlight the centrist record he had built as Iowa's first Democratic governor in 30 years.

"I have to meet as many people as possible and make the case that I have a vision for the future of the country," he said. "We're going to have to work every single day, one contribution at a time. We don't start with an advantage over anyone."

Prospective presidential candidates of both parties are devising strategies to raise about $20 million by the middle of next year. Mr. Vilsack is among those who must start from scratch, because campaign laws do not allow candidates for federal office to transfer money from state accounts or political action committees.

The presidential nominating season traditionally begins with the Iowa caucuses. Rivals say they have no plans to steer clear of the state, as Bill Clinton and others did in 1992 when Senator Tom Harkin of Iowa ran for president. (Mr. Edwards, in fact, was campaigning in Des Moines on the eve of Mr. Vilsack's speech, and Mr. Bayh had plans to head to Iowa Monday.)

In his speech on Thursday, Mr. Vilsack directly criticized the Bush administration, saying the president's "first impulse is to divide and to conquer." He said the United States was "less safe today as a nation than we were six years ago."

While governors have historically made stronger presidential candidates than members of Congress have, a lack of foreign policy experience is among Mr. Vilsack's obvious challenges. In an interview, he said sound judgment was just as critical as foreign policy experience. He said he had conducted trade missions in 22 countries as governor, including a trip to Taiwan, where he was shaken by an earthquake, and had traveled to Iraq and Afghanistan.

Mr. Vilsack did not lay out detailed policies in his announcement, but instead sought to introduce himself through an abbreviated version of his life story: orphaned as an infant in Pittsburgh, adopted by an abusive mother who battled addictions, arrived in Iowa to live in the hometown of his college sweetheart-turned-wife, Christie Vilsack.

His career in politics was unexpectedly born in 1986 when a disgruntled resident of Mount Pleasant barged into a City Council meeting and killed the mayor. Mr. Vilsack, a lawyer, stepped in to serve as mayor. He later ran for the State Senate and in 1998 was elected governor in a campaign that even his closest friends did not believe he could win.

When he hands off the governor's office next month to the recently elected Chet Culver, Democrats will control both chambers of the legislature and the governor's office for the first time in four decades, a legacy that Mr. Vilsack hopes will help his uphill climb for the presidential nomination.

"Iowans are not going to give me a free pass," Mr. Vilsack said in an interview, assessing his chances in the caucuses to be held in 13 months. "And they shouldn't."

Why Tom Vilsack Is Starting So Early (TIME)

By Perry Bacon Jr.

Time, December 1, 2006

If you're thinking about winning the Democratic presidential nomination and you're not already on a first (Hillary) or last name (Obama) basis with millions of Americans, it won't be easy. You have to find a compelling personal story or policy idea to distinguish yourself from at least a half dozen other similar politicians. Then, you need to sell that story convincingly to the news media, to experienced political talent you want on your staff and most importantly, to the deep-pocketed money men or the emerging Netroots who can help you raise upwards of $20 million to run a competitive race. Worse yet, you have to try to do this while all of those groups are to one degree or another sitting on their hands, eagerly anticipating a candidacy from Hillary or Obama. Then, as Howard Dean learned in 2004, you have to turn all that money, buzz and potential into an actual win in Iowa-or at least a close second.

So Tom Vilsack is smart to get started early. The outgoing Iowa Governor declared he was running for president only two days after the mid-term elections and this week kicks off a five-day announcement tour through all the states that have early primaries — Iowa, New Hampshire, South Carolina and Nevada, along with his native Pennsylvania. In announcing his candidacy, Vilsack acknowledged the long odds, telling a crowd in Mount Pleasant Iowa, that "I have always been an underdog and a long shot." He cast himself as a candidate with "the courage to create change", a phrase he invoked repeatedly in calling for an improved health care system, the end of bickering in Washington, an energy policy less dependent on foreign oil and pushing Iraqis to take control of their own security. "He may not be as well-known, he may not be as well-funded, so it's important for him to get out as early as possible," said Gordon Fischer, the former head of the Iowa Democratic Party and a Vilsack backer.

For all the obstacles he faces, Vilsack has several strengths as a candidate. Orphaned at birth in Pittsburgh and adopted and raised by an alcoholic mother, he offers just the kind of unique personal narrative that could help him connect with voters. He's been a popular governor, coming back from a 20-point deficit to win an upset victory in the gubernatorial race in 1998 — in the process becoming the first Democrat in 30 years to take the statehouse. He captured 53% of the vote in 2002 only two years before John Kerry narrowly lost the state to President Bush. He's had some major successes, particularly in increasing the number of children in the state who have health insurance.

Being from Iowa would seem an obvious advantage too, but so far, it doesn't look that way. A June Des Moines Register poll put him only in fourth place in Iowa among Democratic primary voters, lagging behind Clinton, John Kerry and John Edwards. While much of the state's Democratic establishment is backing Vilsack, many elected officials and key activists in the state are considering or have already signed on with other candidates. It's a sharp contrast to 1992, when Iowa Senator Tom Harkin ran for president, and the other contenders essentially conceded the state to him. Edwards has been in Iowa so much he's essentially the second presidential candidate who lives in the state. On the day Vilsack announced, Edwards was in Des Moines to sign copies of his new book. Senators Evan Bayh, Chris Dodd and Joe Biden, all considering presidential runs, have already been in the state, as has Obama. And that's just his challenge in Iowa. As the Washington Post reported this week, Vilsack isn't even guaranteed the support from people who have been close advisers in his earlier runs for office. One former top adviser, Chicago-based strategist David Axelrod, is likely to join Obama's team if he runs.

Vilsack will run as centrist with a record of success in a red state, the exact same message that Bayh has — except the Indiana Senator and former governor can also point to his years in the Senate for the foreign policy experience that Vilsack lacks. And in terms of offering a different vision for the country, it will be difficult for Vilsack or any of the candidates to stand out, because all of them largely agree on the issues. In 1991-1992, Bill Clinton could run as a different, new kind of Democrat because many in the party didn't back him on such policies as reforming welfare and supporting a free trade agreement with Mexico. Three years ago, Howard Dean fundamentally disagreed with much of the Democratic field on the Iraq war. Vilsack says he would like to see troops out of harm's way In Iraq and Iraqis take more responsibility for their own country, a position shared by nearly everyone in America except John McCain and a few others who want to send in more troops. While Vilsack has been a leader in the centrist Democratic Leadership Council, the middle class tax cuts and push toward a balanced budget that the DLC pushes have become so mainstream and embraced by so many Democrats that those ideas were part of the six-part "New Direction" that congressional Democrats will act on when they take control in January.

But don't count out Vilsack just yet. The last two Democratic presidents, Clinton and Jimmy Carter, both started as relatively unknown governors who initially polled in the single digits too, and recent history has shown that Senators have a hard time portraying themselves as outsiders capable of bringing change to Washington. Neither Obama nor Clinton has declared they are running and if only one of them does, there's a lot of room for another major challenger to emerge. Aides to other Democratic candidates are already starting to quietly knock the big two, saying Hillary can't win the general election and Obama is too green to be elected president. Tom Vilsack won't come out and say anything that blunt, but he is likely to talk about his own history of success in a swing state. By next June, when Democratic donors start cutting their checks, we'll have a pretty good idea if he can repeat any of that history on a much bigger stage.

For Democrats, 'Not-Hillary' Field Takes Shape (WSJ)

By John Harwood

The Wall Street Journal, December 1, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0100395

MOUNT PLEASANT, Iowa -- For two years, the Democratic Party's 2008 presidential field has held an unusually well-defined shape: Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton and everyone else. Yesterday, Tom Vilsack opened the effort to shake things up.

From a small college gymnasium here, in the town where he once served as mayor, the outgoing Iowa governor declared his candidacy with a call for "the courage to change" by improving health care and education, moving U.S. troops "out of harm's way" in Iraq and delivering "energy security" through development of renewable alternatives to Middle East oil. Policy aside, Mr. Vilsack boasts a home base in this critical swing state and an up-from-an-orphanage personal success story.

Still, he faces the same challenge as the rest of the Democratic field: How to stop a front-runner with opening strength to rival that of Walter Mondale in 1984 and then-Vice President Al Gore in 2000. Sen. Clinton's formidable assets include universal name recognition, unrivaled fund-raising capacity and strong ties to Democratic constituencies -- and the most-talented political spouse in American history.

Those represent high barriers even for the array of experienced candidates who might also jump in, from Mr. Gore to 2004 nominee John Kerry to Mr. Kerry's former running mate, John Edwards. Yet a rising sense of Democratic possibility, fueled by the party's sweep of congressional elections last month, has set off a rush to begin testing the vulnerability of Mrs. Clinton -- who so far hasn't declared herself a candidate.

All of her potential challengers have significant flaws. Mr. Gore has delivered hot rhetoric on everything from the war in Iraq to President Bush's overall performance in the six years since his near-miss in 2000. That may have turned him into an even more polarizing Democratic candidate than Mrs. Clinton, who as first lady condemned a "vast right-wing conspiracy" to undermine her husband.

Gore confidantes have said he doesn't plan to run, yet some prominent Democratic strategists discount that. The former vice president's network of political and financial supporters would allow him to bolt into the race on short notice. And the success of his recent documentary, "An Inconvenient Truth," has bolstered the perception that Mr. Gore's emphasis on climate change marks the leading edge of a rising political issue.

As for Mr. Kerry, his self-described "botched joke" on the military this fall may have renewed doubts about his political skills, but the Massachusetts senator hasn't abandoned hopes of reprising his candidacy. Nor has former Sen. Edwards, who has spent the last two years emphasizing his commitment to reducing poverty, recanting his vote to authorize the Iraq war and laying the groundwork for another run. Some Democratic veterans believe his efforts have been successful, though Mr. Edwards, who served one term in the Senate, has a limited record in public life, and in particular on national-security issues.

Potential candidates from the tier of less-familiar faces have the burden of showing they can command the attention and money to compete. Donna Brazile, Mr. Gore's 2000 campaign manager, estimates that any viable candidate must raise at least $40 million in 2007, when campaigning for the presidential race kicks off in earnest.

Among other contenders, centrist Sen. Evan Bayh of Indiana would bring Midwestern appeal; Delaware's Sen. Joseph Biden has foreign-policy credibility and experience from a brief 1988 run; and Gov. Bill Richardson of New Mexico boasts executive credentials, diplomatic service as President Clinton's United Nations ambassador and Hispanic heritage at a time when that constituency is increasingly pivotal.

The person with the greatest chance of altering the race appears to be Sen. Barack Obama, an African-American just two years removed from service in the Illinois state senate, whose message of hope and optimism has created a political sensation. Since disclosing weeks ago that he is reconsidering his previous commitment not to run in 2008, he has shot past all other would-be rivals save Mrs. Clinton; in a Pew Research Center poll last month, she led with 39% support among Democrats to Mr. Obama's 23%.

"Barack Obama is the Robert Kennedy of American politics for 2008," said Democratic pollster Peter Hart. "He generates more passion and more interest ... than any candidate I've seen over the course of the last two generations."

But "whether (he) can demonstrate that he's got the experience and he's got the background and can handle the job, I don't know," Mr. Hart said. "To be able to show that you have the wherewithal to govern in a post-9/11 world is going to be exceptionally important."

The increased premium on command of the national-security realm makes it more difficult for a 2008 long shot to repeat the breakthroughs achieved by small-state governors Jimmy Carter of Georgia in 1976 and Bill Clinton of Arkansas in 1992.

DOJ_NMG_0100396

Former Gov. Mark Warner of Virginia, once considered the hottest not-Hillary candidate, bowed out of the race to spend time with his family and perhaps await a vice-presidential nod.

Yet Howard Dean from tiny Vermont managed to achieve a meteoric rise in the 2004 Democratic race. That promise of unpredictability -- the hope of every dark horse -- is what Mr. Vilsack is banking on. It doesn't hurt that he has twice won statewide office in the state that opens the delegate-selection process, and that rivals aren't devaluing the state by ceding it the way Mr. Clinton and other Democrats abandoned Iowa in the face of Sen. Tom Harkin's favorite-son candidacy in 1992. Mr. Bayh is visiting Iowa next week, and Mr. Edwards's campaign is staking its strategy on an early Iowa win.

Mr. Vilsack acknowledged that his road won't be easy. But "I have always been the underdog and long shot," said the former mayor, who overcame a deficit in the polls in the campaign homestretch before winning the Iowa governorship in 1998.

Faith Groups Urge Cuts To AIDS Fund (BOS)

By John Donnelly

The Boston Globe, December 1, 2006

LAKE FOREST, Calif. -- Some leading Christian conservatives, angry over the Global Fund to Fight AIDS's promotion of condoms and its perceived lack of support for faith-based programs, are pushing Congress to cut US support for the AIDS initiative, which was initiated by President Bush in a Rose Garden ceremony five years ago with a $200 million commitment.

The fund -- whose full name is the Global Fund to Fight AIDS, Tuberculosis, and Malaria -- has become one of the pillars of the international effort to fight infectious diseases, growing into a $6.6 billion organization that supports programs in 136 countries.

It is a primary vehicle for the AIDS-fighting efforts of the Bill & Melinda Gates Foundation. The only larger HIV and AIDS program in the world is the president's $15 billion, five-year plan.

But the Global Fund, which works closely with foreign governments, is not nearly as popular among conservative Christians in the United States. Some take issue with the Global Fund's policies, which include buying clean needles for drug users, and many are furious that just 6 percent of its program dollars goes to faith-based groups.

"There's cancer in the fund," said Peter L. Brandt, senior director of government and public policy at the Christian group Focus on the Family. "It does such an unbelievable job in discriminating against faith-based organizations."

Fund officials, worried about the religious right's influence in Congress, are pledging to try to give more money to religious charities. The executive director of the fund, Richard G.A. Feachem , yesterday told 2,000 people at an AIDS conference organized by the influential Saddleback Church in Lake Forest that the battle against the virus "will only succeed if the great faiths of the world become totally mobilized."

Feachem, in an interview, said the fund "wants to see many more programs" run by faith groups, though most funding decisions are made by local boards.

Feachem's visit to the church-organized conference occurred as the Senate is considering a proposal to more than double the Bush administration's $300 million budget request for the fund, to $700 million next year; the House wants to spend $445 million. This year, Congress sent $545 million to the fund, $245 million more than Bush requested.

Nonetheless, Brandt said he wants the government to eliminate all spending on the Global Fund's HIV programs because it is not providing sufficient money to faith groups and has given little support to abstinence messages. Brandt said the government could continue to support the fund's tuberculosis and malaria programs.

Some other Christian activists, such as Raymond Ruddy , president of the Gerard Health Foundation in South Natick, which gives about $2 million annually to anti abortion and abstinence programs worldwide, want all US money cut from the fund .

"I see a direct correlation of dollars given to the Global Fund and dollars taken away from" the Bush administration's AIDS efforts, Ruddy said. "The Global Fund is systematically excluding faith-based groups from getting money, and that's not right."

The Bush administration, for its part, has taken something of a middle ground, favoring spending of no more than $300 million on the fund this year.

DOJ_NMG_0100397

"The Global Fund has to work; it has to be an integral part of the global response to AIDS," Ambassador Mark R. Dybul , US global AIDS coordinator, said in an interview in his Washington office. But Dybul said he wants the majority of government funds directed to the president's program because he believes it is "right now our most rapid response" to the AIDS pandemic.

Christian health associations deliver at least 40 percent of healthcare in several African countries, including Lesotho, Zimbabwe, Tanzania, Liberia, and Kenya, according to UN figures. In the past year, the US program spent 24 percent of its funds on faith-based groups.

Christoph Benn , director of external relations for the Global Fund, said 6 percent of the fund's principal recipients are religious groups, but money also flows to faith-based subcontractors, although the organization does not track the spending.

He said its system makes it difficult to earmark contracts to faith-based groups. Country oversight boards, consisting largely of government officials and community activists, put together proposals and a Geneva-based technical advisory panel selects recipients only among submitted plans. Faith-based groups hold 4 percent of seats on the country boards, according to fund documents.

Benn objected to several other allegations US Christians made , saying that many programs support abstinence-only messages for young people and also emphasize marital fidelity.

Some US Christian leaders support the fund. Rick Warren , head of Saddleback Church and author of the bestseller "The Purpose Driven Life ," gave Feachem, the Global Fund's director, a bear hug yesterday and pledged that he would work with the fund.

The battle over the fund, though, only is expected to intensify in the weeks leading up to the vote by Congress, expected early next year.

Shepherd Smith , who was instrumental in persuading Congress to set aside 33 percent of US AIDS prevention funds to support abstinence messages, said he and Ruddy tried a year ago to persuade the fund's board to increase spending on faith-based groups. "We were just blown off," he said.

Some Christians' objections also are personal. A letter written earlier this year to members of Congress and signed by Ruddy and Focus on the Family decried the election of Asia Russell , a longtime AIDS activist, to the fund's board.

"She served as spokeswoman for the group who tried to strip naked at the [2004 Republican National] Convention as a protest against Bush administration policies," the letter said, adding, "The fact that the fund would elect a woman with zero qualifications to its board sends a clear message that this is not a serious healthcare organization but, rather, a group dedicated to pursuing a social agenda opposed to US policy."

Bernard Rivers , editor of the Global Fund Observer , an independent newsletter that reports on the fund, defended Russell's election, calling her "phenomenally talented and hard - working."

Russell said in an interview that "my qualifications are not the issue. The issue is the extreme, radical religious right attacking the Global Fund and its supporters because the fund is driven by what countries actually want and doesn't fund unscientifically and technically unsound approaches." She was referring to abstinence-only programs.

A Circle Of Strength (WP)

By Jose Antonio Vargas

The Washington Post, December 1, 2006

Every Wednesday the men come to see Gary Isler.

Like him, they are recovering addicts and ex-convicts. Unlike him, they are living with "the sauce," "the alphabets." HIV.

And each week they come to the fluorescent-flooded room in Southeast Washington and sit in the circle of plastic chairs that Isler has arranged for them. Sometimes there are five men, sometimes a dozen. Isler thinks there could be more.

Each week he knocks on doors, calls and calls, fishing for those who live on the margins of the marginalized. It is one thing to be poor in the District of Columbia, Isler explains. It is another to be poor and battling drug addiction. Add to that being an ex-convict trying to reintegrate yourself into a community, often the same one where you once stole and robbed, or worse. Now add HIV, and it becomes a world few see, unless you are a worker like Isler, or living inside it.

"They're like castaways," Isler says, "and they need a place to work on themselves."

DOJ_NMG_0100398

About a year ago, he started Project Ujima, as the Wednesday group is called. It is, local AIDS workers say, the only one of its kind in the city. Theirs is not just a place in which poverty, prison, addiction and HIV intersect, the Ujima men say, but a place to heal. An unbroken circle where men with broken lives try to rebuild.

With a few exceptions, most allowed only their first names to be published. What they did share, over the course of six months, is what it feels like to inch toward success, or to hit a wall. To struggle toward a GED, or fall back into addiction. To find a job, or find yourself getting sicker.

At the D.C. jail, some 19,000 people, 90 percent male and black, are incarcerated each year, a third on drug charges. Some get infected while imprisoned. Others have no idea when they became ill. What's certain is, once they are released, if there is no support system -- a place to live, a family member to turn to -- then life is one precarious day after the next.

This summer, the jail became the first in the country to test all new inmates for HIV, says D.C. Department of Corrections chief Devon Brown. Currently 142 of 3,521 inmates in the city's custody have HIV, the agency says.

"The jail is like the city itself," says Marsha Martin, head of the District's AIDS office. "Both are still trying to figure out the reach of this epidemic. And it's less about the individual who goes to jail and more about the confining reality of the correctional system. We know that inmates are having sex inside. We know they're sharing needles. For drugs. For tattoos. And we know that when they get out of jail, they go back to our neighborhoods."

Then what?

If they are fortunate, Gary Isler knocks on their door.

For more than a year, Isler has worked as an outreach coordinator for Family and Medical Counseling Service Inc. When HIV-positive inmates are released from the D.C. jail, it is Isler's job to make sure they get medical help if they want it.

Sometimes they don't. Sometimes, it's too late. By the time Isler reached one guy this summer, the man was using illegal drugs again. Four others were back behind bars. Another prospective client relapsed, ended up in a nursing home and died.

The stories haunt him.

A man needs more than medicine to heal, Isler says. Which is why he started the project and called it Ujima, also known as the Courage to Change group.

In Swahili, "ujima" means "collective responsibility."

Just getting to the weekly meeting -- on the second floor of an office building at 2041 Martin Luther King Jr. Ave. SE, from 3:30 to 5 p.m. -- is an accomplishment.

Lee, who has spent nearly half his life behind bars, usually arrives first. He and Isler go way back, to when they were locked up in neighboring buildings in the now-defunct Lorton prison complex in Virginia. Lee's four kids, ages 12 to 27, don't know he's HIV-positive, he says.

Kevin Robinson is usually the second to show. In a bad drug deal 10 years ago, he got whacked in the head with a baseball bat and was pronounced dead at the hospital, he says. Except that he wasn't. Three years later, he contracted HIV.

Russell is a chatty, barrel-chested sports fanatic who'll talk field goals and three-pointers to anyone who'll listen.

Often the guy who's listening most intently is Stanley Richmond. He's so good at listening that the others sometimes wonder if he talks at all.

Then there's Isler, a compact 51-year-old with graying stubble, a quick wit and an air of understanding. He knows where these men have been, because he's been there. Knows what it's like to count every single dime. Which is why each week he gives the men bus tokens for attending. And every third Wednesday, he passes out $10 gift cards from Giant or Safeway.

Lee, Kevin, Russell and Stanley have become Ujima's core. You could fill half a century with the combined number of years they've spent locked up. But in the short time they've known each other, they have learned to see themselves in each other's stories and their new goals.

Kevin, 37, is practicing his multiplication tables to earn his GED.

Russell, 49, is looking for a job: "No one's in a rush of hiring an HIV-positive ex-con."

DOJ_NMG_0100399

For Lee, 51, who's on parole until 2011, it's a slow climb to routine daily life, where getting his first credit card application in the mail is a major event. Bank of America is offering a $200 credit line. "I couldn't believe it," he says.

And here are some more numbers:

Four hundred and three dollars. Kevin's monthly income.

Twenty-five. The number of years Stanley, 50, has lived with HIV.

Ten. The number of relatives Ujima men have lost to AIDS complications. A mother, cousins, sisters and brothers.

After walking out of Lorton on April 19, 1988, Gary Isler tried to do the right thing. He's held on to a job. He's been with the same woman for 15 years. He's stayed clean.

Still, adjusting is hard, he says, recalling several years ago when he bought a used black Mazda MX-3. He was sure someone was going to pull his criminal record and take the car back as he tried to drive it off the lot.

His life still amazes him, and he often wonders how it is that he survived all the dirty needles and unprotected sex with women, without contracting HIV.

"Only by the grace of God," he says. He's lost so many friends to AIDS that he's stopped counting.

"Where have you been most broken?" Isler asks in the circle one afternoon in mid-July.

The men are silent, then Russell clears his throat.

"I was applying for a job downtown. Administrative aide, something like that," he says. "I was filling out some forms. And I just thought, 'Am I good enough for this? Do I even have a . . .' "

Lee interrupts. "See, you have to have a different mind-set," he says. "You have to think, 'I can get it, I can do this.' "

A few weeks later, it is Lee who revisits the question about being broken. He talks about, of all things, a Curious George doll he picked up at a dollar store.

"I put it underneath my arm the other night, sat on the bed, and broke down like a child. My old lady came around the bed and said, 'What's wrong with you?' . . . And I just told her, 'I miss everybody. They're all gone.' It just hit me all [at] one time."

Someone new always shows up. This time it's a 44-year-old named Michael, who excuses himself to go to the bathroom three times in 15 minutes, then tells the circle that he remains deep in a crack cocaine addiction.

"I always wanted to be a grown-up when I was kid," he says, "and now I'm a man and I'm acting like a boy."

And someone is always missing.

"Where's Drew?" asks Isler.

Drew accepted a role in a skit the men have been practicing, planning to perform it for Ujima's first anniversary celebration. In it, Lee plays an addict who gets jailed for stealing. Kevin plays a dealer. Stanley's the narrator. Russell, not much into acting, sits out. Last week, Drew, 53, was the arresting officer.

Isler turns to Michael. "Are you going to be here next week? I can tell in your face that you're going to be here. Can you play the part?"

"Nah, man," Michael says. "I got a lot on my mind."

"What's on your mind?" Isler asks.

"I think my parole officer is going to lock me up. . . . I don't want to be locked up . . . but I done enough things to get locked up," Michael says, his face in his hands.

Every meeting ends the same, the men reciting a creed: "We the men of the Courage to Change group are dedicated to resolve our issues, eliminate our pains and improve our circumstances for the better."

"How do I tell a woman that I'm positive? When do I tell her?" asks Drew. He tested positive three years ago. His three brothers -- Joe, William and Robert -- all intravenous drug users, died of AIDS complications.

Stanley shrugs.

Russell sighs.

"That's a real tough thing." Kevin says. "I gotta tell you, I'm at a point now where I'm cool with telling . . ."

DOJ_NMG_0100400

Lee cuts Kevin off.

"Whatever you do, just make sure you tell her before you sleep with her," Lee says. "You don't want that guilt hanging over your head."

Lee learned he was positive in 1993, three days before he was released from a federal prison in New Jersey. He's not sure when he got infected.

"I was in denial about [HIV], didn't want to deal with it," Lee says. For four years, he kept using cocaine and heroin, kept sleeping around with "a lot of women." They didn't ask if he was positive, and he never said anything. "That was the lifestyle I was living."

Adds Kevin: "I'm not ashamed of this thing" anymore. "Any lady I get in contact with, believe me, she knows what I'm dealing with. . . . I don't ever want to give nobody this."

He is one of the few men to give his full name. One of the few who talks about what it has been like in his neighborhood, where the teenagers who once hung out at his place to watch movies, or a game, don't come around much anymore.

"Viracept," the name of an HIV medication, is printed on his backpack.

Lee is nervous, and Isler is nervous for him.

The audience consists of employees of Family and Medical Counseling Service, the men of Ujima and members of another support group, this one for HIV-positive women. The group of 25 or so is cramped in a windowless basement in late August. On a table in the back is a chocolate cake with yellow icing that reads: "Happy 1 Year Anniversary!"

Isler is explaining the skit he wrote, a moment that the men in Ujima all know: detoxing, alone, in a cell. There is hope, too, he adds, "because we all need some hope."

Lee's character is on his back on the floor, clutching his stomach, screaming:

"Lord! Oh Lord! Oh Lord!"

Isler pushes a button on the CD player and James Brown's "King Heroin" fills the room.

I came to this country without a passport . . .

I can make a mere schoolboy forget his books

I can make a good man forsake his wife

Send a greedy man to prison for the rest of his life

A year passes and the men of Ujima can measure their lives beyond Wednesdays now.

Kevin is planning to take his GED exam in June.

Stanley won a scholarship to attend next week's "Staying Alive" summit in New Orleans hosted by the National Association of People With AIDS.

A job cleaning Metrobuses didn't come through for Lee, but he recently started a 15-week class for a commercial driver's license. He tore up the credit card application, decided it was too soon.

Isler, himself a man of unfinished business, is taking a class to earn his high school diploma.

Drew hasn't been seen much lately. Neither has Russell.

But Russell landed a telemarketing job that pays $13 an hour, and moved into his own apartment. It's been three months now and counting.

Clinton Helps Broker Deal For Medicine To Treat AIDS (NYT)

By Celia W. Dugger

The New York Times, December 1, 2006

With the financial backing of a group of nations led by France, former President Bill Clinton announced Thursday that his foundation had negotiated deeply reduced prices for 19 AIDS drugs to treat children, halving the cost of the simplest-to-use therapy — three drugs combined in a single pill — to less than $60 a year for each boy and girl.

DOJ_NMG_0100401

The countries, France, Brazil, Britain, Norway and Chile, are putting up $35 million to buy antiretroviral drugs and diagnostic tests to treat 100,000 more children in 40 nations next year. Most of the money was raised through taxes on airline tickets, a dedicated revenue source suited to ensuring the lifelong treatment of children with AIDS.

The Clinton Foundation, which has established a record of lowering AIDS drug prices in recent years, negotiated on the countries' behalf, using their pooled purchasing power to get volume discounts on the drugs.

The countries formed a new Geneva-based organization called Unitaid earlier this year to buy AIDS, tuberculosis and malaria drugs.

Only about 80,000 of the 660,000 children with AIDS who need treatment now get it, the United Nations AIDS agency estimates, and half the children who do not get the drugs die by the time they turn 2 years old. The United Nations Children's Fund, or Unicef, has described children as the invisible face of the AIDS pandemic because they are so much less likely than adults to get life-saving medicines.

"Providing drugs of this quality at these prices makes it even easier to scale up treatment," said Peter McDermott, who runs Unicef's AIDS program. "Unicef is extremely excited by this."

In addition to the Unitaid money to buy the drugs, the Clinton Foundation has raised $15 million to train doctors, upgrade pediatric wards and provide other assistance that the countries in Africa, Asia, Latin America and the Caribbean will need to treat the additional 100,000 children next year.

Cipla and Ranbaxy Laboratories, Indian generic drug manufacturers, will be providing pills that combine three antiretroviral drugs into a single tablet, a formulation that is easier to transport, store and use than multiple pills and syrups. The combination tablets also need no refrigeration, an important advantage in poor countries lacking electricity, and can be dissolved in water for babies and infants too young to swallow pills.

Sandeep Juneja, the H.I.V. project head for Ranbaxy, said in a telephone interview that the company was able to provide the lower prices because of the larger volume of sales and because the Clinton Foundation, buying on Unitaid's behalf, would consolidate many small purchases. He explained that the market for pediatric AIDS drugs was relatively small, fragmented and spread thinly across many countries.

"It would be a nightmare handling those small orders," he said. "Imagine 40 to 60 countries buying a few hundred bottles individually, with no way to predict how many bottles would be needed."

The new prices for 19 pediatric AIDS drugs are on average 45 percent less than the lowest rates offered to poor countries in Doctors without Borders' listing of AIDS drug prices, and were more than 60 percent lower than the prices the World Health Organization reported were actually paid by developing countries, the foundation said.

Mr. Clinton announced the price reductions yesterday at a children's hospital in New Delhi with Sonia Gandhi, the leader of the Congress Party, which is the chief member of India's coalition government. India is among the nation's benefiting from Unitaid's contributions.

Where AIDS Efforts Lag (WP)

By Lola Dare, Jim Yong Kim And Paul Farmer

The Washington Post, December 1, 2006

President Bush made a historic pledge in his 2003 State of the Union address: to get urgently needed AIDS treatment to 2 million people living with HIV in impoverished countries by 2008. Congress concurred and launched a major initiative to fight AIDS focusing on 15 developing nations. At a U.N. General Assembly conference on AIDS this year, the United States went further and committed, along with other countries, to come as close as possible to universal access to HIV treatment by 2010.

We have come a long way since 2000, when AIDS treatment was available to only the fortunate few. Activists campaigned successfully to drive down the cost of treatment with affordable off-patent AIDS medicines that are now available in most developing countries. After initial objections, the U.S. government became a major purchaser of generic drugs.

But now that donor governments are providing more funding and medicines are becoming available, a new bottleneck threatens the success and sustainability of the effort. People with AIDS in Africa are dying simply because there aren't enough nurses, doctors and pharmacists to administer treatment. Without a new effort to train, retain and support health workers in numbers sufficient to meet basic needs, the United States will not be able to keep the deal it made with Africa in 2003.

It takes years to graduate a new doctor or nurse, and most of them prefer to build a career in a major city with well-equipped hospitals. But with modest investments, donor governments can quickly empower and mobilize an army of health workers made up of the hundreds of thousands of unemployed or underemployed people living in the very settings where HIV's toll is heaviest. Women in particular are often already serving as caregivers at the community level, usually without training or compensation.

Starting in Haiti's central plateau, the organization Partners in Health has trained and employed hundreds of accompagnateurs, or health companions, across the group's projects in five countries, including the United States. Accompagnateurs are paid a stipend to provide a broad range of services, including drug distribution, disease observation and reporting, clinical referrals, and the social support that people with chronic illness so often need. This modest investment is, we believe, one of the chief reasons that adherence to AIDS therapy is so high within our projects -- and why death rates are so low.

Community health workers are lay people on the front lines who provide effective health services and support in countries reeling from AIDS. These nonprofessionals -- often living with HIV themselves -- are rooted in their communities, can be trained quickly and are less likely to emigrate in search of better wages and working conditions. They have deep knowledge of their communities, where they are familiar and trusted neighbors. With continuing training and support, they can rapidly form a strong and active force filling deadly gaps in health personnel and services.

Many programs have sought to rely on "volunteers" and deny these laborers pay for their services -- a model conceived in wealthy countries. But in poor countries this amounts to exploitation of the poorest to treat the sickest. It should be replaced by programs that ensure living wages, continuing training and a career path.

Community health workers cannot succeed alone; they are not an excuse to cut corners. Professional backup from doctors, nurses and medical officers is necessary to provide supervision and to treat referrals. But the pool of available health professionals in many African countries is too small to address basic primary-care needs and far from adequate to supply new donor-sponsored global health programs.

Unintentionally, the laudable U.S. efforts to fight AIDS and malaria in Africa can end up weakening primary health systems that are already crumbling by hiring doctors and nurses away from public clinics and hospitals where they are also desperately needed. When primary public health systems fail, disease-specific initiatives will also fail. The United States must get serious about increasing the overall supply and retention rates for health professionals in sub-Saharan Africa.

According to World Health Organization estimates, the U.S. share of the global cost of training and supporting a healthy workforce sufficient to meet internationally agreed-upon targets in sub-Saharan Africa is roughly $8 billion over five years.

On this World AIDS Day, we must match the audacity of President Bush's 2003 pledge with a complementary initiative for training and keeping enough new health professionals and community-level workers to fulfill the promises the United States has made.

Lola Dare is executive secretary of the African Council for Sustainable Health Development International. Jim Yong Kim and Paul Farmer are co-founders of Partners in Health International; both teach at Brigham and Women's Hospital and Harvard Medical School.

Keep Hope (WP)

The Washington Post, December 1, 2006

GLOBAL POVERTY stretches out across an endless plane, so the caravan of progress can sometimes appear stationary. Yet in fact there is advance: Since 1990 the proportion of the world's people living on $1 or less a day has fallen by a third, and primary school enrollment in developing countries has gone from 79 percent to 86 percent. One of the most heartening changes -- and the one for which aid donors most clearly deserve credit -- is improved access to medicines in poor countries. The number of people receiving AIDS drugs in sub-Saharan Africa has jumped tenfold in three years, and yesterday the William J. Clinton Foundation announced plans to boost AIDS treatment for children in 62 poor countries. Meanwhile, the Global Alliance for Vaccines and Immunization (GAVI), which since 2000 has prevented more than 1.7 million early deaths by supporting immunization programs, pledged Wednesday to accelerate the deployment of new vaccines for rotavirus, a diarrheal disease that kills 500,000 children a year, and pneumococcus, a major cause of pneumonia, meningitis and blood poisoning.

Over the past 50 years, vaccination campaigns have eradicated smallpox and contained polio, typhoid and measles. Because they do not require expert diagnosis or long-term treatment, vaccines are an especially formidable tool in countries with weak health systems. Some three-quarters of the world's children now receive a standard package of vaccines, saving 3 million lives a year and protecting millions more from disability. The cost of these programs per year of life saved comes to $20 in poor countries, according to the Center for Global Development. By contrast, medical interventions in the United States are considered cost-effective if they save a year of life for $50,000 or even $100,000.

Although vaccines are a bargain, they are not necessarily affordable. New ones have tended to be too expensive for poor countries, with the result that breakthroughs such as the Hib vaccine, which protects against one cause of meningitis as well as other killers, have remained virtually unknown in the poor world over a decade after their rollout in rich countries. This is the delay that GAVI promises to shrink. A pneumococcal vaccine was approved for use in the United States in 2000; it will be available in 10 countries in Africa and South Asia starting in 2008. Also in 2008, two rotavirus vaccines that were approved in the United States and Europe this year will be available in 13 low-income countries in Eastern Europe and Latin America. As the vaccines are improved and the evidence of their effectiveness strengthens, GAVI will expand its program.

We should still remember that some 800 million people go hungry and that 10 million children die each year before their fifth birthdays. But it's also important to keep hope: The wagon is advancing.

Democrats whomped Republicans in last month's midterms, but oddly enough they're still calling in the legal cavalry to contest one of the few races they narrowly lost.

That would be Florida's 13th Congressional District, which runs along the Gulf Coast from just south of Tampa to just north of Fort Myers. The certified winner is Republican Vern Buchanan, who beat Democrat Christine Jennings by fewer than 400 votes out of more than 237,000 cast. Two recounts, which were demanded by Democrats and required by law, have reconfirmed Mr. Buchanan's victory and slightly increased the margin.

Unbowed, the Dems are now suggesting that defective voting machines cost them the race. They point to Sarasota County's 18,000 "undervotes," or incidences where voters cast ballots in other races but not the Buchanan-Jennings contest. Ms. Jennings -- along with such liberal partisans as People for the American Way and the American Civil Liberties Union -- has filed a lawsuit contesting the results based on "statistical and eyewitness evidence of significant machine malfunctions" in Sarasota's iVotronic touch-screen system.

They want a court to declare Ms. Jennings the winner by -- get this -- using statistical models to extrapolate that she would have received most of the undervotes. Short of that, they'll settle for nullifying the November results and holding a new election. But among the many things that are strange here is that if anyone ought to be complaining about undervotes, it's the GOP. Sarasota is the largest and most Republican county in the district, yet the Democrat, Ms. Jennings, carried it handily. In fact, it's the only county in the district that she did carry, which makes it more likely that it was Republicans who declined to vote in the Congressional race, not Democrats.

And there are reasons so many voters might have taken a pass on this race while voting in others on the ballot. For starters, the Republican primary featured an exceptional amount of mudslinging. The primary was also a five-man race with four candidates from Sarasota County. Mr. Buchanan won the GOP nomination with just 32% of the vote, and some of his primary opponents either waited until the last minute to issue a public endorsement or never got around to it. So it's entirely possible that voters were turned off by the negative campaigning and chose neither Mr. Buchanan nor Ms. Jennings in silent protest.

By the way, undervoting isn't uncommon in the district. Two years ago, there were more than 12,000 Sarasota County undervotes in Democrat Jan Schneider's House race against Republican Representative Katherine Harris. The 2000 race for the 13th district seat, which predated the use of touch-screen voting machines, also featured a high number of undervotes.

This week, Florida election officials began auditing the voting machines, which is the very thorough and transparent process for determining whether they worked properly on Election Day. There is still no evidence that the machines malfunctioned.

But never mind. Speaker-in-waiting Nancy Pelosi allowed Ms. Jennings to vote in House leadership elections last month, and Democrats could attempt to disallow the Florida certification and vote to seat Ms. Jennings in January unless a new election is granted. Democrats did precisely that in a contested Indiana House race 20 years ago when they last held Congress.

All of this underscores how anti-Bush hatred has unhinged the political left. They still see Karl Rove lurking outside every voting booth. The Buchanan-Jennings contest has become a particular rallying point for fears about electronic voting, and liberals now want the machines to provide paper trails in the event of a recount. This might be a reasonable request if it were made in good faith. But back during the Florida debacle in 2000, before touch-screen voting was widely used, the same Democrats and liberal columnists deplored the inaccuracy of paper ballots and those "hanging chads."

All of which suggests that their real problem is the outcome of the race, not the integrity of the voting process. Some liberals are so paranoid nowadays that they aren't happy even when they win.

When The Joneses Can't Keep Up (NYT)

The New York Times, December 1, 2006

An article in yesterday's Times about obstetricians who prefer working in Botox boutiques is a reminder that the growing gap between the rich and superrich has an impact on those of us who are neither. The article, by Natasha Singer, reported that family practitioners and emergency room physicians have also jumped over into the cosmetic treatment business because the money is so much better.

As The Times has noted in a series of recent articles, the very richest earners are increasing their earnings at twice the rate of their onetime peers, and the average-rich are taking resentful note. Investment bankers are jealous of hedge-fund wunderkinds and, from the sound of it, almost every last person in Silicon Valley is envious of the founders of YouTube (with the likely exception of the Google billionaires who bought their company).

It's hard for people flying in coach to have much patience with those in first class bemoaning their lack of a personal jet. Neither policymakers nor society at large need sympathize with the longing of millionaires to become billionaires. But we do need to worry about the effects on society as a whole when members of the educated elite think they are grossly underpaid. The more they feel as if they are losing ground against their peers, the more likely they are to ditch professions in which the pay is only good — like delivering babies — in favor of less useful careers in which the compensation is off the charts — like eliminating lines from wealthy people's foreheads.

America has long had a problem attracting enough well-trained people to important but not particularly well-compensated positions, like public defender, social worker or teacher. But an era in which a cancer researcher moves over into health-care management consulting because the pay is better — as Louis Uchitelle reported in The Times this week — is something else entirely.

Part of the explanation is undoubtedly a tax code that has sent the incomes of the wealthiest sliver of the nation into hyperdrive. Another might be the spike in education costs, which send many new doctors, lawyers and scientists out into the world armed with a diploma and a six-figure debt. But the bottom line seems to be that in 21st-century America, more people can't feel successful unless they're making a killing.

Dissent Weakens Coalition Pressing Iran On Nuclear Program (NYT)

By Helene Cooper

The New York Times, December 1, 2006

DEAD SEA, Jordan, Nov. 30 — After months of missed deadlines, threats and counterproposals in the effort to rein in Iran's nuclear ambitions, the fragile coalition of six world powers that has been facing down Tehran may be about to splinter.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice sounded fed up Thursday with Russia's refusal to sign on to the list of United Nations Security Council sanctions the United States would like to see enacted against Iran.

DOJ_NMG_0100405

A senior administration official in Jordan with Ms. Rice said the United States would soon be ready to force the issue by calling for a vote.

“Unity is not an end in itself,” Ms. Rice told reporters, in answer to a question about whether the United States was willing to sacrifice a tough sanctions resolution in order to keep the Russians on board. “I’m all for maintaining unity, but I’m also all for action.”

Her comments came during a roundtable with reporters on the outskirts of a democracy meeting with Arab leaders in Jordan.

The Iran sanctions issue has been a vexing one for Ms. Rice. It has been six months since the six powers — the United States, Russia, Britain, Germany, France and China — offered Iran a list of incentives to stop enriching uranium and threatened sanctions if Iran did not. In June, at the time of the initial offer, American officials said Iran had “weeks, not months” to comply.

Since then, Iran has not complied, and since September, the six powers have been working on a Security Council resolution. But Russia has balked at the tougher sanctions sought by the United States, Britain and France.

A new draft resolution under consideration at the United Nations has dropped all mention of sanctions against Iran’s first nuclear power plant at Bushehr, American and European diplomats said. The United States had initially proposed including Bushehr on the list of programs to single out, but Russia, which has been helping build the power plant with the Iranians, objected.

On Wednesday, Agence France-Presse reported that the International Atomic Energy Agency investigation of Iran’s nuclear program was still being hampered by unanswered questions about work hidden by Tehran for almost two decades.

Tehran says its nuclear program is for peaceful purposes, an assertion that is disputed by the United States and its allies.

A senior Bush administration official said that if the six powers could not come to an agreement on the sanctions resolution before the end of the year, the United States would seek to put a resolution up for a vote in a bid to force Russia to take a public stance.

U.S. May Pursue Iran Sanctions Even If Russia Balks (WP)

By Glenn Kessler

The Washington Post, December 1, 2006

DEAD SEA, Jordan, Nov. 30 -- Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice signaled Thursday that the United States is willing to risk a breach with Russia if the Russians do not soon sign on to a U.N. Security Council resolution to punish Iran for its nuclear activities.

"I am all for maintaining unity, but I am also in favor of action," Rice told reporters traveling with her as she devoted much of her day to other Middle East crises: trying to nurture a fledgling truce between Israel and the Palestinians, and attending talks in Amman, Jordan, between President Bush and Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki.

Six months ago, the United States said it would join European-led talks on Iran's nuclear programs if Iran agreed to halt uranium enrichment. Officials said at the time that they would give Iran "weeks, not months" to comply. But since Iran rejected the offer, the administration has engaged in difficult negotiations with Russia over the terms of a U.N. resolution to impose sanctions.

Until now, a key administration goal has been to keep the five nations on the Security Council that hold veto power, plus Germany, unified on the Iran issue. But Rice's remarks suggested that the administration's patience is waning and that officials could soon offer a resolution, daring Russia to veto it. Officials say they believe Russia would abstain instead, allowing passage of a resolution under Chapter 7 of the U.N. Charter.

Russia has strong business ties with Iran and is building a nuclear reactor in Bushehr, which it has sought to shield from the sanctions resolution.

"Obviously, we'd like to keep the unity of the P5-plus-one," Rice said, referring to the five permanent Security Council members and Germany, "but unity is not an end in itself. The goal is to get a resolution that makes sense in terms of convincing the Iranians that their behavior is not acceptable in the international community. We have to do something."

Rice, who is at this Jordanian resort to attend a conference on Arab democracy, devoted much of her day to trying to revive long-stalled peace talks between Israel and the Palestinians. Palestinian factions and Israel agreed this past weekend to a tenuous cease-fire in the Gaza Strip, and Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert offered to release some Palestinian prisoners, reduce controls on the movement of people and goods in Gaza and the West Bank, and restart negotiations to create a Palestinian state.

Rice met first with the Palestinian Authority president, Mahmoud Abbas, in the West Bank city of Jericho before traveling to Jerusalem, where she met with Olmert and Israeli Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni.

In Jericho, Abbas announced that months of talks to establish a unity government had "unfortunately reached a dead end." The victory by the Islamic Resistance Movement, or Hamas, in legislative elections in January resulted in a cutoff of international aid, so Abbas, who heads the rival Fatah party, said the failure of the talks "is very painful for us because we know how badly the people have been suffering over the last nine months. All options are open, with the exception of civil war, which we will never accept."

Saeb Erekat, chief Palestinian negotiator and a Fatah legislator, said Abbas sought Rice's help on several issues. He asked her to work with Egyptian officials to support a so-far elusive exchange of hundreds of Palestinian prisoners in Israeli jails for Israeli army Cpl. Gilad Shalit, who has been held by Palestinian gunmen since late June.

Abbas also urged Rice to press Israeli officials to adhere to the terms of an agreement she helped broker last year governing the operation of the crossings between Israel and Gaza, Erekat said. Citing security concerns, Israel has kept the key cargo passages closed for much of the year.

Lebanese Sunni-dominated Security Forces Swell (LAT)

By Megan K. Stack

The Los Angeles Times, December 1, 2006

Beirut — The Lebanese government has nearly doubled the size of its security forces with some 11,000 mostly Sunni Muslim and Christian troops in recent months, and armed them with donated weapons and vehicles from the United Arab Emirates, a Sunni Gulf state.

The dramatic increase in interior ministry troops, including the creation of a controversial new intelligence unit and the rapid expansion of a commando force, is meant to counter the growing influence of Iran and its ally here, Hezbollah, Cabinet minister Ahmed Fatfat said in an interview this week.

The quiet, speedy troop build-up indicates that Lebanon's anti-Syria ruling majority, led by Premier Fouad Siniora, has been bracing itself for armed sectarian conflict since the withdrawal of Syrian forces in the spring of 2005. It also reflects growing tensions across the region between U.S.-allied Sunnis who hold power in most Arab nations and the growing influence of Shiite-ruled Iran and Hezbollah.

Over the past week, government officials have moved some 8,000 additional troops -- 5,000 from the army and 3,000 from the expanded Internal Security Force -- into Beirut in preparation for a massive, Hezbollah-led demonstration set to begin Friday, Fatfat said. Hezbollah chief Sayed Hassan Nasrallah has summoned his loyal followers to flock into the capital from all over the country -- and to stay in the streets until the government collapses.

About a month ago, the new ISF troops were outfitted with weapons and equipment donated by the United Arab Emirates, an opulent confederation of Sunni states, said Fatfat, a Sunni Cabinet member who brokered the deal while serving as Lebanon's interior minister.

Fatfat spoke this week from within the prime minister's offices, where he and other Cabinet ministers have been sleeping and working under tight guard of gunmen and armored personnel carriers. With talk of civil war weighing heavily on the capital and threats of bloodshed flying, the pro-Western ministers fear for their lives.

"In Lebanon, it is dangerous to make politics. When I went into politics in 1991, I paid off (my pension) and took out an American life insurance policy," Fatfat said. "But now it is more serious . . . (Hezbollah and its allies) are trying to make a coup d'etat."

Even now, the military capability of the ISF is inferior to both Hezbollah and the Lebanese army, analysts say. But the ISF is the only Lebanese armed force that is devoted, analysts say, to protecting the embattled, Sunni-led coalition now struggling to cling to power.

Nasrallah, who has declared Fatfat and the rest of the government illegitimate tools of American interests, controls a heavily armed, openly religious militia of Shiite guerrillas. The mixed-sect Lebanese army, which has at least 60,000 ground forces, is overseen by Christians, but is believed to have no strong political allegiances overall.

The role of the United Arab Emirates in the reinvention of the ISF illustrates the broader, regional implications of tensions between Lebanon's Sunnis and their Christian and Druze allies on one side, and Shiite Hezbollah, which has tight ties to both Iran and Syria.

"All of the Arab governments . . . are afraid of the big strength of Iran in all the Middle East," Fatfat said. "In Lebanon, it seems we are an arena between Syria and Israel, but there's a new role for Iran."

The U.S.-led toppling of Iraq's Sunni-dominated regime in 2003, along with the growing power and ambition of Shiite-led Iran, has dramatically fed tensions and fears between Islam's two major sects, analysts say. Sunnis around the region, especially the U.S.-backed Sunni governments of the oil-rich Arab Gulf, have grown increasingly fearful of Shiite power. That animosity has seeped into Lebanon, especially since the strong military performance of Hezbollah against Israel in the summer war.

"After the coming of Americans to Iraq and the revival of the Shiites, everybody is talking along confessional lines," said Elias Hanna, a military analyst and retired Christian general in the Lebanese army.

The U.S. refused earlier this year to donate weaponry to the Lebanese interior ministry, Fatfat said. Still, the U.S. administration is friendly with the United Arab Emirates, and the creation and arming of anti-Hezbollah forces in Lebanon are widely seen to be in Washington's interest.

"Part of the U.S. strategy there is predicated on building the capability of Lebanese forces," said Dan Byman, director of security studies program at Georgetown University and a former Middle East analyst at the CIA.

The U.S. government would like to see Lebanon capable of defeating Hezbollah militarily if need be, he said, "which right now, is not the reality."

Until Damascus was forced to withdraw its soldiers from Lebanon last year, the Interior Ministry was in the hands of Suleiman Franjieh, a Christian with lifelong ties to the Syrian regime. Back then, about 13,000 ISF troops were stationed in Beirut. Most of them had no guns.

In those days, about a quarter of the ISF troops were Shiite, said Amin Hoteit, a military analyst and retired Shiite general in the Lebanese army. Through contacts in military circles and the ISF, Hoteit says he has mapped the sectarian evolution of the ISF troops.

Under de facto Syrian administration, the Interior Ministry didn't have a large enough budget to arm its troops, who were deliberately marginalized in the face of a powerful, Syrian-run Lebanese army, Fatfat said.

That changed shortly after the Syrian withdrawal, when Siniora's government, heady with anti-Syria and independence slogans, was swept to power in national elections. The ministry was taken over by pro-Western Sunnis. A flurry of recruitment rapidly grew the ranks of the ISF to 24,000 troops. To the dismay of many Shiites, the government poured millions of dollars into a new intelligence agency and increased five-fold the black-clad commando unit known as the Panthers.

"The Shiites are very upset. They don't understand why there's this new intelligence agency and they're not represented in it," said Timur Goksel, a Lebanese military analyst and longtime U.N. negotiator. "They feel things are going on, but they don't know what."

At the same time, the proportion of Shiite recruits to the ISF has dropped drastically, shifting the sectarian balance to favor Sunnis and Christians, Hoteit said. Under Siniora, only about 1,000 of the 11,000 new troops were Shiites, he said. More than 4,000 were Sunnis, he said.

Although Lebanon already had three intelligence agencies, last December's assassination of anti-Syria lawmaker Gibran Tueni convinced the government that Lebanon needed a new, anti-Syria intelligence group, Fatfat said. The charge was led by Saad Hariri, head of the parliament's majority bloc and communal leader of the Sunni sect. Hariri's father, former premier Rafik Hariri, was also assassinated last year in a bombing attack widely blamed on Syria.

The move to equip the intelligence agency and to install surveillance cameras on the streets of Beirut met tremendous political resistance from Hezbollah and Amal, the two Shiite parties, Fatfat said. Fatfat acknowledged that Sunnis and Christians dominate the ISF, but said that Shiites also have a more sizable presence than Hoteit's figures indicate.

Whatever the exact proportion of Shiites, popular perception writes off the ISF an armed wing of the Sunni sect and a staunch backer of Siniora's government. Both on the street and among analysts, there is a conviction that Siniora, Hariri and Fatfat developed the ISF to protect Sunni, pro-Western interests in Lebanon.

"There is no trust of the (ISF) here, they are seen as a sectarian, Sunni force," Goksel said. "Not just the Shiites say it, but the Christians too: That it's to make up for the lack of a Sunni militia."

With Hezbollah vowing to drive the government out of office in coming days, there is growing trepidation among many Lebanese over whether the ISF will become involved in street fighting.

There are also worries over what the ISF would do in case of civil war. Lebanon has a complicated history of official, armed forces dividing along sectarian lines, or devolving into militias, during religious strife.

"The ISF is now perceived as a threat by the Shiites," said Patrick Haenni, a Beirut-based analyst for the International Crisis Group. "The fear of the ISF is because it's very close the government."

Hezbollah Sets Anti-Government Protest, Sit-In (WP)

By Anthony Shadid

The Washington Post, December 1, 2006

BEIRUT, Nov. 30 -- In a dramatic day of dueling statements, Hezbollah's leader called on his supporters and allied forces to pour into Beirut on Friday to bring down the U.S.-backed government, a move Lebanese Prime Minister Fouad Siniora compared to a coup attempt. He insisted that the government would fall only through a vote of parliament, not a show of force in the streets.

The call Thursday by Hezbollah leader Hasan Nasrallah for a protest and open-ended sit-in marks the sharpest escalation yet in a month-long crisis that may decide the direction of Lebanese politics for years ahead, and it represents a potentially precarious step along Beirut's many fault lines of politics, ideology and sect. Lebanese newspapers have described Nasrallah's call as the "zero hour"; Siniora, in a forceful nighttime speech, repeatedly characterized the coming period as "decisive days."

"Lebanon's independence is threatened and its democratic system is in danger," the prime minister said in a televised address from the government headquarters. "Threats will not deter us. Maneuvers and ultimatums will not terrorize us."

He ended with words he used during this summer's war between Israel and Hezbollah, a radical Shiite Muslim movement: "Lebanon will remain, will remain, will remain."

On one level, the crisis pits Hezbollah and its allies, backed by Iran and Syria, against a government, supported by the United States and France, that sees Hezbollah's demands for greater representation in the cabinet as excessive and destabilizing. But in the background are broader struggles over the country's foreign policy -- whether to tilt toward the United States or Iran -- and the power of the Shiite community, Lebanon's largest but long disenfranchised.

In an unusually short televised speech, Nasrallah stressed that the demonstration should be "civilized and peaceful." Sitting before flags of Lebanon and Hezbollah, he spoke slowly, seeming grimmer than he has in past statements, which have often run an hour.

"We have found that negotiations and consultations have hit a wall because the ruling group insists on monopolizing power," Nasrallah said. "We have no choice left but that of a popular movement to put pressure and to achieve this goal."

Within minutes, residents of Beirut's largely Shiite southern suburbs, Hezbollah's stronghold, set off fireworks to celebrate.

"There is no way to overthrow this government except through the parliament," Siniora answered. More fireworks followed his speech, and cars moved through the downtown streets with horns honking.

Hours after Nasrallah's call, Beirut braced for Friday's protest and sit-in. The military has put thousands of troops into the streets, placing armored personnel carriers, roadblocks and barbed wire around the government building and parliament, where Siniora and other ministers have taken up residence. After nightfall, fortifications went up at the nearby U.N. headquarters, within walking distance of the site of Friday's protest.

The crisis has paralyzed Lebanese politics, largely because hardly anyone sees how the struggle can be resolved. Hezbollah has demanded a share of the cabinet that would effectively give it a veto over political decisions, a move Siniora's government has rejected. In the speeches Thursday, neither side suggested there was a negotiable way out.

Yet some residents expressed satisfaction Thursday that protests threatened since the end of October would finally arrive. Siniora's supporters seemed confident Thursday night, with some sensing that Hezbollah was playing its last card. If the protests fail to topple the government, they said, Hezbollah will be left with few options to try to force change.

"They have the right to demonstrate, and they are more than welcome to stay in the street for as long as they want," said Marwan Hamadeh, the telecommunications minister. "The government is not going anywhere."

Rice Urges Mideast Leaders On Peace Deal (AP)

By Anne Plummer Flaherty

AP, December 1, 2006

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice tried to build momentum Thursday for a fragile cease-fire agreement between the Israelis and the Palestinians, urging both sides to expand the peace deal beyond the Gaza territory.

But U.S. options were limited, as Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas said he was finished negotiating with radical Islamic militants who assumed control of the Palestinian government in January. Abbas has been trying to create a new unity government that would lift an international aid boycott, but elected Hamas leaders have refused to meet demands by the West and Israel that they renounce violence against Israel and recognize it as a state.

After a blitz of diplomatic meetings, Rice said she was still hopeful the small window of opportunity afforded by the cease-fire could be expanded into a long-lasting peace agreement.

"You don't expect great leaps forward," Rice told reporters. "You expect just progress and I think we've seen progress."

Rice met briefly with Abbas in the West Bank town of Jericho before driving to Jerusalem to meet separately with Israeli Prime Minster Ehud Olmert and Israeli Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni.

"Hopefully we can take this moment to accelerate our efforts and intensify our efforts toward the two-state solution that we all desire," Rice said at a news conference with Abbas.

Moderate Arab leaders consider a political deal between Israel and the Palestinians a necessity to quieting violence throughout the region, including Iraq and Lebanon.

U.S. and Iraqi officials briefed President Bush Thursday on a plan to accelerate the capability of the Iraqi security forces so U.S. troops can come home sooner. Rice said Bush is considering the recommendations and other proposals and recognizes the Iraq war is not making as much progress as hoped.

Rice said the U.S. would address Iraq and the Israeli-Palestinian conflict on their own merits, but that they were linked.

"What is clear is that in all of those places, you have the obvious contest between moderate forces and extremist forces, and I think that's what common to all of them," Rice said. "And you do have in all of those cases as well an Iranian factor that is undeniable."

Regarding Iran, Rice said the U.S. would continue to press Tehran to stop its nuclear program, even without a detailed international agreement.

"Unity is not an end to itself," she said. "The goal is to get a resolution that makes sense in terms of convincing the Iranians that their behavior is not acceptable in the international community."

The recent cease-fire ended a five-month Israeli military offensive in the Gaza Strip and the firing of rockets by Palestinian militants from Gaza into Israel. Olmert on Monday announced he was prepared to grant Palestinians a state, release desperately needed funds and free prisoners if they choose the path of peace.

But prospects for real progress were dimmed by the political roadblock facing Abbas on Hamas' hardline position.

"Unfortunately now we have reached an impasse," Abbas said.

Asked about Abbas' options now, Rice declined to get involved.

"That's for the president to decide — he's the elected official, not me," she said.

Rice accompanied Bush during morning sessions concerning Iraq in nearby Amman before breaking away for her meetings later with the Palestinian and Israeli leaders.

DOJ_NMG_0100410

"Our government strongly believes in the two-state solution," Bush said Thursday at a news conference attended by Rice. "I believe it's in the Palestinian people's interest that they have their own state and I believe it's in Israel's interest that there be a democracy on her border and therefore we're working to that end."

The United States is under pressure from moderate Arab states to urge Israeli restraint and help Palestinians trying to cross the borders. Egyptian Foreign Minister Ahmad Abou al-Gheit told reporters the U.S. must "encourage Israel to soften the measures that they have been applying, at least in the West Bank."

Rice said she hoped a lasting cease-fire would help alleviate those concerns. She also said the Bush administration wants to ask Congress for money to aid the development of a tougher Palestinian security force.

"It goes without saying that if you want the Palestinians to take more responsibility for security, then they have to have adequate security forces to do it and I think the Israelis understand that," Rice said in a media round-table following a summit meeting.

Foreign Ministry spokesman Mark Regev told reporters that Olmert wants to extend the cease-fire to the West Bank once it has proven effective in the Gaza Strip.

Afterward, Rice attended a U.S.-backed Mideast democracy and development summit in Jordan, where she met with foreign ministers from the Gulf Cooperation Council, as well as Egypt and Jordan. The council is composed of Bahrain, Kuwait, Oman, Qatar, Saudi Arabia and the United Arab Emirates.

Rice Presses Palestinians, Israelis To Extend Ceasefire (AFP)

By David Millikin

AFP, December 1, 2006

US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice pressed Israeli and Palestinian leaders to expand a fledgling ceasefire as a step toward reviving their moribund peace process and easing conditions for millions of Palestinians.

Rice met with moderate Palestinian president Mahmud Abbas in the West Bank town of Jericho and then with Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert in Jerusalem as the fragile truce covering the troubled Gaza Strip enclave entered its fifth day.

"We hope (the truce) will be consolidated so that it can be extended because we would hope in time for a comprehensive ceasefire," Rice said during a joint news conference with Abbas -- a message she repeated after her Jerusalem talks.

The ceasefire has become a main focus of peacemaking efforts after Abbas acknowledged the failure of a months-long bid to create a new Palestinian government amenable to Israel and the West.

He said the negotiations with the radical Islamist movement Hamas, which won control of the self-rule government in elections earlier this year but has been blacklisted by Israel and most Western governments as a terrorist organisation, had "unfortunately reached a dead end".

Abbas aide Yasser Abed Rabbo said "unprecedented political measures" would soon be announced following the collapse of the power-sharing talks.

Israel, the US and the European Union have imposed a devastating aid boycott on the Hamas-led government because it refuses international demands to renounce violence or recognise Israel's right to exist.

The boycott has caused severe hardship for the Palestinians and fed pressure, notably from moderate Arab states, for the US to make a more concerted effort to end the stalemate.

After her talks in Israel, Rice met at a Dead Sea resort in neighboring Jordan with foreign ministers from the six Gulf states, Jordan and Egypt, who renewed the appeal, Egyptian Foreign Minister Ahmed Abul Gheit said.

Gheit told reporters the Arab ministers urged Rice "to encourage Israel to soften the measures that they have been applying, at least in the West Bank".

He said the foreign ministers also backed the demands for a widening of the ceasefire.

Under the current terms of the truce, Palestinian armed groups in Gaza agreed to halt rocket attacks against the Jewish state in exchange for an Israeli troop withdrawal from the territory.

Despite isolated rocket fire the truce has held, ending five months of bloodshed in the Gaza Strip which has left some 400 Palestinians and three Israeli soldiers dead in the territory.

DOJ_NMG_0100411

Israeli officials said that if the Gaza ceasefire succeeded, they would be willing to extend it to cover the West Bank and take steps to ease onerous travel restrictions on Palestinians in both areas -- something Rice has been urging for months.

"If the ceasefire works in Gaza, you can duplicate in the West Bank," said foreign ministry spokesman Mark Regev shortly before Rice met with her Israeli counterpart, Tzipi Livni, who is also deputy prime minister.

Regev reaffirmed an offer first made in a speech by Olmert on Monday -- to open key crossing points into the Gaza strip, cut back checkpoints and roadblocks and restrict army operations in the West Bank if security forces loyal to Abbas enforce the ceasefire.

Israel's benchmarks for the ceasefire are a halt to rocket attacks from Gaza, an absence of suicide bombings and an end to the smuggling of arms and explosives through tunnels under the frontier between Gaza and Egypt, he said.

"We don't want the ceasefire to be used by some as a time-out for upgrading the strategic capabilities" of terrorists, Regev said.

To bolster the truce, Abbas asked Rice to help gain quick Israeli approval for the deployment to Gaza of 1,500 fighters from Jordan-based Palestinian militia the Badr Brigade which is loyal to the moderate leader, a Palestinian official said.

Abbas also wants Israel to permit the provision of funds and arms to his own security force, the official added.

Rice, on her seventh trip to Israel and the Palestinian territories in two years, did not go into specifics about what kind of steps she had asked the Israelis to take.

There was no indication that her latest effort will produce any significant breakthrough in a peace process which has been frozen since the outbreak of a popular Palestinian uprising in 2000.

Abbas Says Palestinian Unity Talks Have Reached An Impasse (NYT)

By Helene Cooper

The New York Times, December 1, 2006

DEAD SEA, Jordan, Nov. 30 — Talks to form a Palestinian unity government are at a dead end, the Palestinian Authority's president, Mahmoud Abbas, said Thursday, ensuring that the Bush administration's plan to start pushing hard for a Middle East peace initiative will stay in a deep freeze for now.

Mr. Abbas gave his grim assessment about the state of talks between his Fatah faction and Hamas, the militant faction that controls the Palestinian government, after a one-hour meeting with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice in Jericho, in the West Bank. And while this is the second time Mr. Abbas has declared the unity talks dead — he did so in October, and talks resumed this month — there was a sense of defeat at the press briefing, which Mr. Abbas conducted with Ms. Rice.

"We wanted a cabinet capable of easing the suffering of our people," Mr. Abbas said. "This is very painful for us because we know how badly the people have been suffering over the last nine months."

The United States and European governments have said they will continue to boycott the Palestinian government and withhold aid from it until there is a change to a government with which they can do business. That would mean the resignation of the current Hamas administration, which came to power nine months ago in an election, and an agreement on a political program that at least could be interpreted to mean an acceptance of the West's three conditions: recognition of the right of Israel to exist, the rejection of violence and an acceptance of previous Israeli-Palestinian initiatives.

Ms. Rice, who is in Jordan for a democracy forum, took a six-hour side trip to Jericho and Jerusalem as part of the administration's new effort to address repeated requests from its Sunni Arab allies that the United States do more to push forward a peace initiative in the Middle East.

She spent more time shuttling between Jordan, Jericho and Jerusalem than in her lightning-quick meetings with Mr. Abbas and with Prime Minister Ehud Olmert and Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni of Israel.

American officials said they had hoped to use this trip to build on the fragile Gaza cease-fire reached Saturday between the Israelis and the Palestinians, and perhaps to start a Middle East peace initiative. That hope was bolstered Monday after Mr. Olmert offered to release Palestinian prisoners in exchange for a captured Israeli soldier and said he was reaching out "for peace."

DOJ_NMG_0100412

But chances for a new initiative evaporated Wednesday after the Hamas leader, Prime Minister Ismail Haniya, took off on a monthlong trip to visit Arab allies, a clear indication that the unity talks between Hamas and Fatah had reached an impasse.

On Thursday, Israeli soldiers in the West Bank shot and killed a 16-year-old Palestinian, who they said had thrown explosives at them.

Mr. Abbas said he was considering new options to get around the unity-government impasse, but he declined to elaborate. “In the past few days we have come to the conclusion that the doors are locked,” he said. An Abbas aide, Yasir Abed Rabbo, said Mr. Abbas would take “unprecedented political steps.”

Referring to Mr. Abbas, Ms. Rice told reporters, “He gave Hamas its chance.” She added, “I think you’re going to see forward movement now on a number of fronts.”

American, Israeli and Palestinian officials said options included dissolving the Palestinian government and calling for elections. But it is unclear whether the Palestinian constitution allows for such a step and how it could be brought about.

The United States and Israel would welcome the dissolution of the Hamas-led government, particularly if new elections showed that Palestinians had become fed up with Hamas and voted out its representatives. But Hamas unexpectedly won the previous parliamentary elections, ousting Mr. Abbas’s Fatah party.

President Bush offered his support to Mr. Abbas. The Palestinian leader, he said, “deserves the support of the world and he deserves support in peeling his government away from those who do not recognize Israel’s right to exist.”

Rice Urges Widening Of Gaza Cease-fire (WT)

By Joshua Mitnik

The Washington Times, December 1, 2006

TEL AVIV -- On a quick swing of shuttle diplomacy in the West Bank and Jerusalem, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice yesterday praised Israelis and Palestinians for efforts to restart peace negotiations while urging both sides to widen a five-day-old truce in the Gaza Strip.

With President Bush in Amman, Jordan, for strategy talks with Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, Miss Rice stopped first in Jericho to meet with Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas, who informed her that talks with Hamas to set up a unity government had reached an impasse.

In Jerusalem, the secretary of state held separate meetings with Israeli Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni and Prime Minister Ehud Olmert.

The detour into Israel and the West Bank was set up this week after Mr. Olmert delivered a conciliatory speech to the Palestinians offering a state with contiguity and sovereignty, in addition to a list of gestures aimed at relieving economic pressure on the Palestinian public.

"I also appreciate the statement of restraint that the Israeli government has issued concerning the cease-fire because it is quite fragile, but we would like to see it consolidated and extended," Miss Rice said alongside Mrs. Livni.

Officials said no breakthrough was expected to come out of the talks and that the primary purpose was to demonstrate U.S. involvement despite only a faint glimmer of optimism for an end to the hostilities.

The Gaza cease-fire has ended five months of violence in which 375 Palestinians were killed and which brought Israel to the brink of ordering an all-out invasion into Gaza.

The Palestinians want to expand the cease-fire to the West Bank, but the Israeli security establishment probably will recommend against that in the short term.

Mrs. Livni said the truce and Mr. Olmert's speech made for "a special week."

"I'm seeking the implementation of the cease-fire," she added.

The Israeli foreign minister also updated Miss Rice on the Egyptian-mediated negotiations to release Cpl. Gilad Shalit, whose abduction in June spurred a major Israeli push into the Gaza Strip.

In Jericho, Miss Rice heard Palestinian pleas to lift roadblocks in the West Bank and stop the growth of Jewish settlements in the region.

DOJ_NMG_0100413

Few observers expect Mr. Abbas to be able to rein in scores of gunmen responsible for firing rockets, but the photo opportunity with Miss Rice and the potential for a renewed negotiations are helping to bolster his standing at a time of increasing anarchy among Palestinians.

The breakdown of the Palestinian unity government talks between Mr. Abbas and Hamas could doom chances of a wider deal on a prisoner swap for Cpl. Shalit.

A U.S. official said that the secretary of state's "last-minute" trip was designed as a briefing on Israeli and Palestinian thoughts about the latest cease-fire -- the third major truce between the sides since the start of the uprising in 2000. The official acknowledged that Mr. Olmert's speech contained few new ideas, but added that it didn't matter.

"It's true this wasn't something new and novel, but you don't need something new and novel when you can move back on the track," the official said.

In Somalia, Rare Suicide Attack Kills 5 (WP/AP)

The Washington Post, December 1, 2006

MOGADISHU, Somalia, Nov. 30 -- Three bombers exploded cars outside the base of Somalia's interim government Thursday, killing themselves and five other people, officials said. The government blamed foreign al-Qaeda fighters for the attack, which was believed to be only the second suicide bombing ever in the country.

Deputy Defense Minister Salad Ali Jelle said the bombers detonated the explosives as police tried to inspect their vehicles at a government checkpoint outside Baidoa, the only town the government controls. One of the bombers reportedly was a woman.

Jelle said the dead included two policemen and three accomplices of the bombers. Four civilians were wounded.

A policeman at the scene, Mohammed Ahmed Mohamud, said three non-Somali men were captured at the checkpoint. There have been numerous reports of foreign Islamic radicals coming to Somalia to join the fighting.

The Islamic movement that controls most of southern Somalia denied that it was behind the bombing. "Terrorism is not our principle, and we have nothing to do with what has happened," said Mohamed Ibrahim Bilal, a spokesman for the movement.

Tensions are high in Somalia, where the Islamic movement and the interim government are vying for control. The Islamic group has steadily gained ground since seizing the capital, Mogadishu, in June. A confidential U.N. report obtained last month said that as many as 8,000 Ethiopian troops are in the country supporting the government.

Ethiopia has acknowledged sending military advisers to help the Somali government. Earlier Thursday, the Ethiopian Parliament authorized military action if Ethiopia was attacked by the Islamic movement.

Somalia has not had an effective government since 1991, when warlords overthrew dictator Mohamed Siad Barre and then turned on one another.

Rice Prods Congress On India Nuke Bill (AP)

By Foster Klug

AP, December 1, 2006

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice says relations with India could suffer if Congress fails to satisfy White House objections to legislation that would allow shipments of U.S. civilian nuclear fuel to India.

Critics of the plan say the Bush administration wants to remove what they say are the few remaining restraints against the spread of nuclear weapons. The plan, which President Bush considers a priority, would reverse decades of U.S. anti-proliferation policy.

Rice's misgivings were expressed in a letter to leading lawmakers that The Associated Press obtained Thursday.

Her intervention could complicate prospects for approval of the legislation. Lawmakers are trying to finish work on a final version of the bill before they leave for the year. They must reconcile competing bills passed by the House and Senate.

Rice's letter attempts to deal with objections from both the administration and India.

For example, before the U.S. could begin nuclear cooperation with India, the president would have to determine that India was "fully and actively" helping U.S.-led efforts to confront Iran's nuclear program, according to the Senate's version.

DOJ_NMG_0100414

Rice said this would be viewed by India "as adding additional conditions" to the original agreement and "could reopen the terms of the initiative to renegotiating."

Rice also cited a section in the Senate bill that would ban the transfer of nuclear enrichment and reprocessing equipment or facilities to India. "It is not appropriate to single out India, which has been a responsible steward of its nuclear technology," she wrote.

Supporters say the accord strengthens an important relationship with a friendly Asian power that long has maintained what the United States considers a responsible nuclear program.

"There's been a consistent sense by the Indian side that there's been a movement of the goal posts" as Congress considers an agreement reached in July 2005 by Bush and Indian Prime Minister Manmohan Singh, said Rep. Joseph Crowley, D-N.Y.

"The failure to follow through on the reached agreement between the two countries would send a very negative message to India," Crowley said.

Critics say the plan could boost India's nuclear arsenal and spark an arms race in South Asia.

"It's not a good day for nuclear nonproliferation," said Rep. Edward Markey, D-Mass. "Apparently, Secretary Rice is allergic to even these few nonproliferation fig leaves which have allowed the flawed agreement to proceed."

Bush Calls Latin American Presidents (AP)

AP, December 1, 2006

President Bush called two Latin American presidents Thursday whose countries are in the middle of leadership changes.

Bush's calls to outgoing Mexican President Vicente Fox and Ecuador's President-elect Rafael Correa came as the U.S. leader was flying back to Washington after a four-day trip overseas.

Bush called Fox to wish him well as he ends his presidency Friday with the inauguration of President-elect Felipe Calderon, said National Security Council spokeswoman Kate Starr. Starr said the call and the other to congratulate Correa each lasted a few minutes.

The left-leaning Correa has worried Washington with calls to limit foreign debt payments. He is friends with anti-U.S. President Hugo Chavez of Venezuela. Correa has called President Bush "dimwitted" and wants to limit U.S. military activities in Ecuador.

Starr said Bush congratulated Correa personally and the Ecuadorian people more broadly for their commitment to democracy. "The two leaders expressed their interest in working together to solve common problems," Starr said.

Mexico's Besieged New Leader Faces Tough Challenges (NYT)

By James C. McKinley Jr.

The New York Times, December 1, 2006

MEXICO CITY, Nov. 30 — It is a measure of the problems Felipe Calderón will confront as president when he is sworn in on Friday that both his conservative supporters and leftist opponents have camped out on the dais in Congress where the ceremony is to take place.

The leftists swear they will stop Mr. Calderón from taking the oath of office. The conservatives vow to ensure that he does. The standoff has become comic, as legislators from both sides have stayed up all night singing ranchero songs in between hurling fists and insults.

But the antics in Congress reflect a real gulf between people throughout this country that opened during the hotly contested national elections in July. They also reveal the paralysis that Mr. Calderón will have to overcome to deal with a range of pressing issues from job creation and poverty relief to a worsening war between drug cartels and violent social strife.

Mr. Calderón won by a bare 240,000 votes, and his main opponent, Andrés Manuel López Obrador, a populist former mayor of Mexico City, has never conceded defeat, charging that the presidential election was rigged against him by a powerful alliance of businessmen and President Vicente Fox, who belongs to Mr. Calderón's conservative National Action Party.

That Mr. López Obrador's supporters do not recognize him as the winner is only one of Mr. Calderón's woes. More than 2,000 people have died this year in an underworld war between drug cartels, among them scores of police officers and other law enforcement officials.

DOJ_NMG_0100415

The United States, meanwhile, has hardened its position against illegal immigration, a traditional escape valve for the unemployed. And the southern state of Oaxaca continues to be crippled as leftist protesters seeking the ouster of the governor have clashed repeatedly with government paramilitary groups, leaving more than a dozen people dead and scores wounded.

What is more, Mr. López Obrador, the candidate of the leftist Democratic Revolutionary Party, has declared himself "the legitimate president" of Mexico. He has set up a shadow government and has promised to call mass protests any time Mr. Calderón makes decisions on policy that the leftist party does not agree with.

While Mr. López Obrador is clearly running the risk of becoming a professional political gadfly, he also threatens to be a permanent thorn in the side of Mr. Calderón's presidency.

Mr. Calderón, 44, the man who must take on these challenges, possesses little charisma, even his admirers admit. But he is a stubborn and pragmatic politician.

"He lacks worldliness, he lacks vision, but it is nothing that cannot be learned, and there comes into play his tenacity," said Germán Dehesa, a writer and columnist.

Political analysts say it would be a mistake to underestimate Mr. Calderón, who holds advanced degrees in law, economics and public administration. The son of one of the Nation Action Party's founders, he has been active in politics since he was a youth and became the party's youngest leader in its history in 1993.

Most recently, he served for 13 months in the Fox administration, first as the head of a development bank and then as energy minister. He served two terms in Congress and proved to be a tough negotiator when he was the head of the party's delegation from 2000 to 2003, good at forming coalitions and bridging partisan differences. That is a skill he will need to navigate the rough waters ahead — and one Mr. Fox never seemed to possess.

"Felipe Calderón is a very young man, an intelligent man, who is clear about the relations he must have with political forces, relations that President Fox never had," said Jaime Sánchez Susarrey, a conservative columnist.

Mr. Calderón's campaign revealed his ability to surprise. He soundly beat Mr. Fox's chosen candidate for the party's nomination last year and then went on to narrowly defeat Mr. López Obrador with a well-oiled negative campaign. Only six months earlier, the leftist candidate had been predicted to win by at least 10 percentage points.

Since the nation's highest electoral court declared him the winner in early September, Mr. Calderón has done his best to call for unity and reconciliation. He has said his top priorities will be fighting poverty and reducing crime. He has promised tax incentives to spur investment and vows to reorganize Mexico's fractured and ineffective police forces to take on drug cartels.

"In the light of all the problems and national challenges, now is the time for unity and not futile divisions," he said in a recent speech.

His choices for cabinet members have suggested that he may take a hard line against the sort of civil disobedience that has disrupted Mexico for the last few months. For instance, he appointed Francisco Ramírez Acuña, a former governor of Jalisco, to the all-important post of interior minister. As governor, Mr. Acuña gained notoriety for brutally quashing leftist protesters in May 2004.

Mr. Calderón has also tapped a former high-ranking official of the International Monetary Fund, Agustín Carstens, to lead his budget office, sending a signal that he intends to follow a tight monetary policy, keep inflation low and avoid overspending on public programs.

The country Mr. Calderón inherits on Friday has changed in many ways since 2000, when Mr. Fox's election ended the 71-year monopoly on power held by the Institutional Revolutionary Party. Under Mr. Fox, Mexico has become a country with stronger democratic institutions, vociferous public debate and the end of an imperial-style presidency.

Mr. Fox managed to put an end to decades of economic mismanagement. He also made some headway with social programs, particularly a vast public housing initiative that provided low-cost mortgages to millions of households. The number of families living in desperate poverty has dropped.

But Mr. Fox's tenure was a disappointment in many other ways.

As the election made clear, social divisions and a lack of opportunity still define the country. At least a quarter of working-age Mexicans labor in an underground economy, selling contraband in street markets or washing cars in parking lots. Some 400,000 emigrate to the United States every year in search of work.

DOJ_NMG_0100416

Mr. Fox also failed to get key energy and tax reforms through a divided Congress. Oil production at the government-owned oil monopoly has begun to fall, even as the government continues to depend on oil revenues rather than tax collection, a barrier to deeper political reform.

Nor did Mr. Fox take on the public and private monopolies, like those in energy and telecommunications. Changes in labor laws never made it to Congress, and Mr. Fox was unwilling to curb public employee unions, particularly the teachers' union.

Mr. Calderón will now have to address the leftover slate of issues. One of his greatest challenges will be to create jobs that could finally begin to reduce Mexico's vast income gap, one of the widest in the world. But to do that he will need to form alliances in the divided Congress to push through the changes that Mr. Fox could not.

He will face opposition from some of Mexico's business leaders, who have fought attempts to break the dominance of a few big companies. It will be hard, since many of them also backed his campaign. He must also take on powerful unions that oppose competition in the energy industry and changes to the education system.

In a speech earlier this month, Mr. Calderón said his goal was "a clean Mexico, a Mexico, in short, that has the conditions our children deserve to live in, a truly winning Mexico in a world that competes ferociously."

"To do this, it is necessary to put aside our differences, to reach agreements and define a strategy for the country that we want, that Mexican's dream of and that should be reality for the next generation."

It Was Not A Happy Dais, So Push Came To Shove (LAT)

By Hector Tobar

The Los Angeles Times, December 1, 2006

Mexico City — When you cover politics in Latin America, you get used to odd happenings.

Once I was traveling with a campaign through rural Bolivia when a presidential candidate stopped his caravan to go to the bathroom -- on a tree by the side of the road.

I've seen a president who lasted a day in office (in Argentina), a president who owned a stolen car (in Paraguay), and met another who offered to disrobe to prove he hadn't been beaten during a failed coup.

"No, Senor Presidente," reporters shouted back as Hugo Chavez of Venezuela unbuttoned his shirt at a Caracas news conference. "That won't be necessary!"

Even by those lofty standards, the occurrences this week in Mexico's Legislative Palace score high on the strangeness meter.

On Tuesday, the elected representatives of the Mexican people began assaulting each other with soft-drink cans and pizza boxes, and then bedded down between aisles in the Legislative Palace, staying up late into the night singing ballads like "El Rey."

Congress has been locked for months in a battle over the presidential election in July. Supporters of the losing leftist candidate, Andres Manuel Lopez Obrador, have said they won't allow conservative President-elect Felipe Calderon to take the oath of office Friday before a joint session of Congress, as required by Mexican law. Already, leftists had kept outgoing President Vicente Fox from delivering his final State of the Nation speech on Sept. 1.

So on Tuesday, lawmakers of Calderon's National Action Party (PAN in Spanish) took over the stage in a pre-emptive strike that set off a shoving match.

I arrived in time to see a leftist lawmaker from Veracruz with a heavily bandaged ankle being carried out of the chambers.

"They threw me off the stage," Congressman Juan Dario Lemarroy Martinez told me with a grimace of pain.

On the stage, lawmakers of the left and right were massed in an elbow-to-elbow scrum, each guarding a precious piece of the rostrum. When I asked them questions, I inadvertently started their argument all over again.

"This mess began when one of the PRD people pulled the tie of one of our deputies," said Congressman Obdulio Avila Mayo of the PAN. "It was clear the PRD was going to take the stage, so we assumed a defensive posture."

"That's a lie," interjected Alliet Bautista of the PRD, who was standing a few bodies away. "Play back the video and you'll see what happened."

A few minutes later, the passions cooled: sandwiches and cookies arrived for the leftists. Later the conservatives would receive sleeping bags as their occupation of the stage dragged on for hours, then for a day, then for two days.

DOJ_NMG_0100417

"We're all stuck here and there's no way out," said Congressman Carlos Madrazo of the PAN.

Two days of negotiations failed to undo the scrum. As of late Thursday, it remained unclear if Calderon would be inaugurated there, even though Calderon insisted he would.

The PAN occupied a greater portion of the dais. At one point, Congressman Victor Varela of the PRD tried to climb on a table, in a bid to conquer more "territory" for his party. A conservative congresswoman pelted him with soda cans.

The fighting lawmakers were widely reviled at home and abroad. But, like other strange political happenings I've seen in Latin America, the melee was less strange when you took a closer look.

Mexico is a relatively young democracy. Only once in its long history has power transferred peacefully from one political party to another. The U.S. has longer democratic traditions, but fisticuffs were once a feature of life in its Capitol, with a South Carolina senator nearly beating to death an abolitionist lawmaker in 1856.

For the moment, nothing indicates the dispute in Mexico's Congress will become more violent than your average "lucha libre" wrestling match (in which, of course, most of the blows are fake).

On Thursday morning there was a sign of peace. Congressmen from both sides were still massed on the stage, unwilling to surrender an inch to their rivals. But that didn't stop them from sharing a tamale breakfast.

It's High Noon In Mexico (WSJ)

By Mary Anastasia O'Grady

The Wall Street Journal, December 1, 2006

Felipe Calderón is scheduled to travel to the national legislative hall of San Lázaro in downtown Mexico City this morning, ascend the dais before Congress and take the presidential oath.

The current Mexican executive -- Vicente Fox -- will remove the tricolored presidential sash he is wearing and place it across the shoulder of the president-elect, ushering in a new six-year term for their country's young and fragile democracy. President Calderón of the National Action Party (PAN) will then give his inauguration speech.

That's how the script reads anyway. But it won't happen if supporters of losing presidential candidate Andrés Manuel López Obrador from the Revolutionary Democratic Party (PRD) have their way. They are refusing to accept Mr. Calderón's narrow victory in the July election and have warned that they intend to sabotage today's event.

In this, the PRD has some experience: When Mr. Fox was scheduled to deliver his final state of the union address on Sept. 1, PRD legislators crowded around the podium ahead of time and refused to let the president approach. Observing the human barricade, Mr. Fox left a copy of his talk with Congress and went away. On Tuesday a brawl broke out on the floor of the congress when the PRD tried to get control of the rostrum ahead of Friday so they could do to Mr. Calderón what they had done to Mr. Fox in September.

That effort failed and Mr. Calderón is confidently promising to take the oath in San Lázaro, as Mexican law dictates. This suggests there could be violence and Mexican law enforcement has been rehearsing for weeks to ensure his safety. Yet despite the tension, many Mexicans seem genuinely relieved that their new president has taken a decisive and unambiguous stand in the matter. His approach differs starkly from the often waffling and accommodating Mr. Fox, who, throughout his presidency, tended to seek peace in our time at the expense of the rule of law, and ended up with neither.

The inauguration is but a ceremony. Yet the future of the Calderón presidency will depend heavily on whether the rule of law can be re-established and defended, and that means that what happens today matters a lot. A successful inauguration will be one step in the direction that Mr. Calderón must lead the country.

Mexican lawlessness is reaching epidemic proportions. It is true that AMLO -- as the Mexican press calls the defeated PRD candidate -- is now mostly an unpopular annoyance even to those who voted for him. It is also true that if the PRD wants to remain a serious political party it has to show that it is willing to work within the system. But other violent actors who prefer the path of terror and extortion to gain power and resources are threatening national security. Some of the blame lies with Mr. Fox and his weak response to extreme political groups. Some of it lies with the U.S. demand for illegal drugs, which is fueling an ever more powerful organized-crime problem in a country ill-equipped to fight back.

DOJ_NMG_0100418

The most immediate challenge for the new president will be establishing order in the southern city of Oaxaca. What started there in May as a teachers' strike by the most militant local chapter of the national teachers union has deteriorated into a low-grade war between armed activists and the Mexican police. Mr. Fox tried, back in July, to settle things peacefully by negotiating a ridiculously generous settlement for the teachers -- something the country cannot afford and, if national test scores are any guide, the union does not deserve.

But never mind that. Far from ending the protests, Mr. Fox's acquiescence to the teachers' blackmail acted like blood in shark-infested water. Most teachers went back to work; but having witnessed their success, local militants schooled in the methods of mob threats against the state stepped up their own demands. Led by the Popular Association of Oaxacan People (APPO), they began agitating for the resignation of the state governor.

To his credit, Mr. Fox has refused that ultimatum and in October he sent in federal troops to quell the violence. But that hasn't worked. Now it seems that the most extreme elements of Mexico's left are joining the fray. Earlier this month APPO sympathizers set off three bombs in Mexico City and last weekend, APPO and others stormed Oaxaca with Molotov cocktails, stones and rocket launchers. The nearby photo is evidence of their handiwork. According to the Mexican daily Reforma, militants burned down or damaged 19 properties, including a hospital and a theater, and wrecked five cars and 15 buses. The destruction was so vast that even APPO leaders have tried to distance themselves from the violence, blaming it on outsiders.

What is clear is that these groups are well-organized and well-funded criminal networks. Their existence is all the more troubling because of the Mexican organized-crime rackets that are trafficking drugs from Guatemala into the U.S. Last week Reforma reported that despite the fact that the number of operations against drug traffickers increased 27 times under Mr. Fox, the drug trade has grown by 20% in recent years. Meanwhile, the death toll among police and journalists is skyrocketing and law enforcement is increasingly outgunned.

Particularly frightening is the thought that organized crime groups like those operating in Oaxaca might team up with those running drugs. This is what has happened in Colombia, with devastating results to stability, personal security and growth.

Given the strong U.S. demand for drugs it is not clear that Mexico can overcome narcotrafficking any more than the U.S. could defeat the underworld during Prohibition. What is clear is that the problem is not just Mexico's, and if the U.S. doesn't accept that fact, it too will suffer the consequences.

Bush To Host Mbeki Dec 8 (AFP)

AFP, December 1, 2006

US President George W. Bush will welcome South African President Thabo Mbeki on December 8 for talks on issues like the violence in Sudan's Darfur province, the White House announced.

The two leaders "will discuss African regional issues, especially Darfur, the Democratic Republic of Congo, and Zimbabwe," Bush spokesman Tony Snow said in a statement.

"The two leaders will also review joint efforts to combat HIV/AIDS in South Africa, where US government-supported programs reach over 200,000 with anti-retroviral treatment and many more with HIV prevention and care," he said.

"They will exchange views on United Nations issues in light of South Africa's recent election to a non-permanent seat on the UN Security Council for 2007-2008. President Bush looks forward to the opportunity to recognize South Africa's contributions to peace and stability on the African continent," said Snow.

U.S. Repudiates Analyst's Jab At Britain (AP)

By George Gedda

AP, December 1, 2006

The State Department repudiated on Thursday comments by a veteran department analyst who said that British Prime Minister Tony Blair's relationship with the United States was "totally one-sided" in Washington's favor.

Deputy spokesman Tom Casey said that Kendall Myers, the official who made the off-message remarks, was summoned by his superiors at the Bureau of Intelligence and Research to a meeting to explain his remarks.

"The comments, frankly, I think could be described as ill-informed, and I think, from our perspective, just plain wrong," Casey said.

DOJ_NMG_0100419

Myers is a 30-year member of the Civil Service and is an expert in U.S. British relations. He spoke Tuesday to a gathering at the Johns Hopkins School for Advanced International Studies, where is an adjunct professor. Casey said Myers thought his appearance was at a closed academic forum.

The Times of London reported Thursday that Myers said Britain's role as a bridge between the United States and Europe was "disappearing before our eyes."

Myers said that despite British attempts to influence U.S. policy, "we typically ignore them and take no notice — it's a sad business."

Casey said department officials meeting with Myers were attempting to determine the facts of the events on Tuesday. He did not rule out the possibility of disciplinary action, stressing that Myers does not have a policymaking role.

Efforts to reach Myers by telephone at his office were unsuccessful.

In October, State Department official Alberto Fernandez ran afoul of his superiors when he told Al-Jazeera television that the United States had displayed "arrogance" and "stupidity" in Iraq.

Fernandez is an Arab-speaker assigned to tell the U.S. side of the Iraq story to Middle East audiences.

He issued a written apology, saying he "seriously misspoke." Soon thereafter, the State Department said Fernandez was still on the payroll and that the matter was closed.

Myers' misstep appears to be more serious than that of Fernandez. In contrast to Fernandez, whose mistake involved a brief lapse, Myers' speech was sprinkled with comments that do not reflect official thinking.

Casey said the United States and Britain "have worked together to successfully deal with some of the most difficult issues before the international community." The two countries, he said, have a special relationship.

U.S. Authorities Probe How Smartmatic Won Venezuela Election Pact (WSJ)

By Bob Davis And Glenn Simpson

The Wall Street Journal, December 1, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Federal investigators are looking into whether Smartmatic Corp., a voting-machine company whose equipment is used widely in the U.S. and abroad, paid bribes to win a Venezuela election contract in 2004.

Smartmatic's actions already are under a separate investigation by the Committee on Foreign Investment in the U.S., which reviews foreign acquisitions to see if they pose national-security concerns. In 2005, Smartmatic, which is owned by Venezuelan investors who split their time between Caracas and Boca Raton, Fla., purchased a U.S. voting-machine company, Sequoia Voting Systems Inc. Cfius is looking at whether that acquisition should be reversed on national-security grounds.

At the same time, the Justice Department has been conducting a probe of Smartmatic for possible violations of the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act and recently started looking at possible tax evasion as well, said two individuals familiar with the case. The Justice Department has informed Cfius representatives from U.S. agencies about their inquiry, these people said.

Jeffrey Bialos, an attorney for Smartmatic, said yesterday the Justice Department told the company it was looking into its actions, but that Smartmatic wasn't a target of an investigation. Smartmatic employees haven't been subpoenaed in the inquiry, Mr. Bialos added. That suggests that the probe is at an early stage.

"The company believes it conducted itself properly and within the law," Mr. Bialos said. A Justice Department spokeswoman declined to comment.

Smartmatic has drawn attention because of concerns that the government of Venezuelan President Hugo Chávez, an opponent of U.S. policies, has a stake in the company. That is a focus of the Cfius review. In 2004, Smartmatic's machines were used in an election to recall President Chávez, which Mr. Chávez won handily -- and which members of the Venezuelan opposition say was riddled with fraud. Smartmatic machines will be used Sunday in Venezuela's presidential election.

The company said it is the victim of false allegations made by two former executives, whom the company declined to name. Smartmatic said it would shortly send the two former employees a letter to "cease and desist their activities," which Smartmatic said violated agreements they made with the company. News of the Justice Department probe was reported earlier by el Nuevo Herald, a Spanish-language newspaper in Miami.

DOJ_NMG_0100420

Essentially, the Justice Department is looking into whether Smartmatic got its start in Venezuela by bribing officials and then improperly avoiding its tax liability in the U.S. The company says it paid $1.5 million to a Venezuelan consultant who is close to the Chávez government and helped to win Smartmatic business.

The allegation being investigated is that Smartmatic actually paid as much as $4 million to the consultant, then deleted a substantial portion of those payments from its corporate records to hide the extent of its payments to a friend of the Chávez regime. Antonio Mugica, Smartmatic's chief executive, said the company had budgeted a larger amount for the consultant than it ended up paying him, thus explaining the difference between the two amounts.

The tax question dates to late 2004 when Smartmatic scrapped a simple corporate structure, under which it was based in the U.S. with a Venezuelan subsidiary. It adopted a complex offshore structure, with headquarters in the Netherlands Antilles; a main subsidiary in the Netherlands; and a variety of subsidiaries in the U.S., Barbados, Venezuela and Mexico.

That raised the question of where to pay taxes on $25 million in revenue from a contract to supply voting machines for Venezuelan regional elections: the U.S. or a lower-tax jurisdiction. Smartmatic paid taxes in Barbados, which the company said was proper because one of its international companies signed the deal. "The taxes due and owed are to Barbados authorities," said Mr. Mugica, who added that the company had consulted legal counsel and accounting firms on the issue.

Mr. Mugica said the company hasn't thus far been harmed by publicity about the probes. Customers "welcome the fact" that the company is trying to clear up allegations concerning its actions, he said.

Chávez Says Police Foiled Sniper Attack On Opponent (USAT/AP)

By Frank Bajak

USA Today, December 1, 2006

CARACAS, Venezuela — President Hugo Chávez said Thursday that authorities had foiled a planned sniper attack against his main opponent in this weekend's elections.

As campaigning ended ahead of Sunday's vote, Chávez said “fascist” militants had planned to use a rifle with a telescopic sight to shoot Manuel Rosales during a speech and then blame it on Chávez's government in hopes of derailing the balloting.

“It was to say that Chávez sent them to kill him, and generate chaos,” Chávez told reporters at the presidential palace.

The Venezuelan leader used the 3½-hour news conference to laud achievements of his “people's revolution” — claiming to have lowered unemployment and poverty and created petroleum-fueled economic growth. He said analysts from major foreign banks say the most dangerous scenario for this politically polarized country would be a Chávez election loss.

On the alleged assassination plot, Chávez said authorities had seized the rifle from a vehicle and that a military officer had been arrested. He did not offer further details.

Rosales' campaign said it had no knowledge of the plan.

“This is a smoke screen. It's to manipulate the people, but nobody believes that,” said Timoteo Zambrano, one of Rosales' campaign managers.

“The government is obliged to safeguard the lives of all Venezuelans, and that includes the presidential candidate,” Zambrano said. “If something were to happen to our candidate, the government would be responsible.”

Campaigning ended Thursday. Rosales supporters cite polls showing Sunday's balloting will be tight, although an independent AP-Ipsos survey and other recent polls found Chávez with a large lead.

Rosales has called the vote a choice between democracy and an increasingly authoritarian Cuban-style system. Chávez, who won election in 1998, calls Rosales a lackey for the United States.

Chávez has taken advantage of Venezuela's oil wealth to lavish the poor with programs that provide everything from subsidized food to free health care and education. And he persistently accuses the U.S. government of trying to topple him, saying on Thursday that the “U.S. empire” had done more damage to Latin America than colonial Spain.

He urged his enemies to respect the result of the vote, calling an upset impossible and suggesting that some opposition activists are planning post-election violence.

DOJ_NMG_0100421

"There are two options here — ours and that of the U.S. empire and its flunkeys here, who were the ones who staged the coup," Chávez said, referring to a two-day coup in 2002. Chávez was returned to power by street protests and loyalists in the military.

Rosales said his supporters would be on alert for possible vote fraud. "It has to be a clean game. … If that happens, all of us will be calm," Rosales, a political veteran who is ex-governor of Zulia state, told The Associated Press shortly before closing his campaign with a rally of hundreds of thousands in Maracaibo, Venezuela's second-largest city.

He has managed to unite Venezuela's opposition movement for the first time since a crushing defeat in a 2004 recall referendum against Chávez.

Chávez insisted that his proposal for changing Venezuela's constitution to do away with presidential term limits "is not a dictatorship, it's democracy."

He noted that presidents of France have served long periods in power.

Venezuela has become increasingly polarized along class lines, with the wealthier supporting Rosales, the poor backing Chávez and a fractured middle class.

Shoppers are packing supermarkets to stock up on supplies, fearful that Sunday's outcome could prompt street demonstrations and violence.

Venezuelan High Life: Bulletproof BMW And A Vote For Chávez (WSJ)

By José De Córdoba

The Wall Street Journal, December 1, 2006

CARACAS, Venezuela -- Most of Hugo Chávez's supporters live in shantytowns and count on subsidies from the government. Most of his opponents live in middle-class apartment buildings and mansions in leafy neighborhoods and are horrified by the likelihood of a Chávez victory in Sunday's presidential election.

Then there are people like shipping tycoon Wilmer Ruperti, who tools around town in a chauffeur-driven bulletproof BMW and who owes much of his fortune to the Chávez government. Along with other, well-connected businessmen, known as Boliburgueses -- Bolivarian bourgeoisie -- Mr. Ruperti is rooting for Chávez's re-election.

At his office a few days ago, the 46-year-old Mr. Ruperti, a gregarious, bearlike man with thinning, red-tinted hair and a thick gold chain, pored over a poll he says he commissioned for about $60,000 that showed Mr. Chávez winning comfortably. "I agree with the president," said Mr. Ruperti. "He is the only person who has identified himself with the poor."

As an oil trader, Mr. Ruperti hit the big time in 2003 when he came to the rescue of Mr. Chávez's government, which was then fighting to survive a strike that had shut down the state-owned oil company, Petróleos de Venezuela SA. With the country running out of gasoline, Mr. Ruperti used his fleet of tankers to unload fuel oil in Venezuelan ports, showing frightened insurers that they were secure. That opened the way for other tankers to bring in gasoline, which Mr. Ruperti bought and then resold to PDVSA, breaking the back of the strike. A grateful Mr. Chávez decorated Mr. Ruperti with the army's Star of Carabobo medal.

Now Mr. Ruperti embodies the contradictions of Chávez-era Venezuela -- a country that is dedicated to socialist redistribution of wealth, but which is also enjoying an oil-backed capitalist boom that is further dividing rich and poor. Eighteen-year-old whiskeys are the rage, and Hummers and top-of-the-line SUVs clog the streets of Caracas, while four out of 10 Venezuelans survive on $2 a day or less.

These days, Mr. Ruperti, whose father, an Italian immigrant who worked as a chef in restaurants here, cuts a wide swath in Caracas society. Last year, he sponsored the event of the season -- a charity concert by tenor Luciano Pavarotti, which succeeded in bringing together the Boliburgueses and the anti-Chávez grand dames of Caracas society. A year earlier, he paid $1.7 million at a New York auction for a pair of ornate French pistols made by Napoleon's gunsmith in 1804 for Simón Bolívar, Venezuela's independence hero. Caracas gossip had it that Mr. Ruperti planned to present the pistols to Mr. Chávez, who is so enamored of Bolívar that he changed Venezuela's name to the Bolivarian Republic of Venezuela to honor his hero.

"Those pistols had to be in the hands of Venezuelans," says Mr. Ruperti, who says he plans to leave them to his children. "We have to rescue the Venezuelan-ness of our people."

DOJ_NMG_0100422

His critics hold up Mr. Ruperti's business practices as an example of what has gone wrong in the country. This year, Transparency International, the anticorruption watchdog, lists Venezuela as No. 141 out of 163 countries it surveys in its ranking of "perceived levels of corruption."

Last year, a congressional commission dominated by members of Mr. Chávez's party looked into allegations that Mr. Ruperti made millions from double-billing the state oil company for gasoline shipments during the strike at PDVSA when the company's accounting system broke down. The commission also investigated whether Mr. Ruperti received sweetheart contracts to ship asphalt with PDVSA's Citgo subsidiary in the U.S. The commission cleared the oil trader. "Ruperti performed vital services for PDVSA, and he was paid for them," says Jesús Alberto García, the panel's president.

But the saga continues. Earlier this year, Mr. Chávez's office sent a letter to Congress asking lawmakers to take another look at the controversy. Among the issues the president's office wants investigated: whether PDVSA lost $30 million due to double billing and bogus invoices by Mr. Ruperti, and whether he used "company names without their knowledge for the fraudulent acquisition of fuel." Mr. Ruperti denies any wrongdoing.

So far, the controversy hasn't had much effect on his business. He now runs a 19-ship tanker fleet and says he plans to start a maritime bank. Mr. Ruperti is also investing $26 million in a cable-television station he wants to turn into a 24-hour news operation. "I'm going to call it Channel I, I for intelligence, impartiality and information," he says, as the small TV screen in his BMW, tuned to the government station, silently shows President Chávez exuberantly speaking to followers.

But earlier this year, Venezuela's revolutionary contradictions took a bad bounce for Mr. Ruperti, an avid golfer, when Caracas's Chavista mayor started legal procedures to seize the Caracas Country Club's golf course and replace it with public housing. The matter is still in court. "My heart tells me I don't agree with that," says Mr. Ruperti, who has founded a golf school for children from the city's barrios.

For many Venezuelans, Caracas's Dolce Vita of premium wines, premium whiskeys and premium cars brings to mind Venezuela's first big oil boom during the 1970s, a time remembered as the years of "Saudi Venezuela."

Then, President Carlos Andrés Pérez, who nationalized foreign oil companies to create PDVSA in 1976, favored a clique of friends, known as the "12 Apostles," who made enormous fortunes through government contracts. Now, says Ben Amí Fihman, the editor of a magazine called "Exceso," or Excess, "the 12 Apostles have become the 40 thieves."

Today Caracas is as divided as it was during the days of the oil strike. Mr. Ruperti's name heads the list of "collaborators of the regime" posted on the Internet by "Democratic Soldiers," an organization of anti-Chávez officers purged from the armed forces. "Keep the names ... and remember them for when it becomes necessary," the list says, adding information about Mr. Ruperti's residence, friends, business dealings, and where his private jet is parked.

"A lot of people think I'm a devil, but it's not true," says Mr. Ruperti. "I sleep easily at night and morally I'm satisfied." Nevertheless, Mr. Ruperti takes no chances. He rides in Caracas's traffic-choked streets in his armor-plated car, accompanied by two South Korean bodyguards, Yong Lee and Rim Paek. Mr. Ruperti says the Koreans are tae kwon do masters who can brain an assailant with a butter knife at a distance of 20 meters.

"If one of my enemies comes in here tonight, I'll have them show you," he joked before sitting down to dinner at the best Italian restaurant in Caracas. After dinner, he left the restaurant through a back door. "For safety's sake," he said.

Venezuela's Ch?vez Nears A Victory Fed By Free Stew (CSM)

By Sara Miller Llana

The Christian Science Monitor, December 1, 2006

CARACAS, VENEZUELA

Odalys Ibarra has lived in the same home - a decrepit, two-bedroom brick house that she shares with 10 others - her entire life.

Yet these days, on her walk home up the steep slope of El Valle, one of the poorest neighborhoods in this capital city, she passes a free medical clinic staffed with Cuban doctors, a supermarket that sells discounted rice and tomato sauce, and a state-funded kitchen that prepares and gives out free meat stew and cookies - programs called "missions" that are the cornerstone of President Hugo Chávez's domestic policy.

DOJ_NMG_0100423

While Mr. Chávez's strident anti-Americanism has caused ripples abroad - calling President Bush the devil and supporting leftist candidates and leaders throughout Latin America, as well as befriending Iran and North Korea - those with the power to vote him into another six-year term this Sunday care more about his social missions than his international mediations.

After eight years at the helm of Venezuela - having withstood a coup attempt, a national oil strike led by his opponents, and a recall referendum in 2004 that he easily won - Mr. Chávez is poised to prevail in the 2006 presidential election on Sunday. The latest state-funded poll by the US firm Evans/ McDonough puts him 19 points ahead of his only opponent, Manuel Rosales, a career politician and governor of the oil-rich western state of Zulia.

Venezuelans are bitterly divided over Chávez's ideology, but they can agree on one thing: Many will vote for him Sunday because the billions he has poured into literacy programs, free food, and doctor visits have proved a potent enticement.

"They love Chávez because Chávez is including them; he is giving them opportunity," says Luis Vicente Leon, director of the polling firm Datanalisis in Caracas. Rosales the Retroactive?

But is Chávez solving their problems? Mr. Leon says "no" - that his missions are a tool to gain popularity, not an answer to the root problems of healthcare or poverty in the country. Others say Chávez is the only leader who cares about a new social order and that Mr. Rosales would, as so many other politicians before him, leave the majority behind.

Venezuela had been governed for decades by a political class that excluded the majority, says Rodolfo Magallanes, a political science professor at the Central University of Venezuela in Caracas. "But Chávez offered something new; his popularity was immediate," he says.

Today, what he is offering indeed feels new in places like El Valle. Ms. Ibarra now takes her two children to the medical clinic down the street, where slogans such as "Long live the revolution!" hang on posters between breast feeding instructions.

The bags of rice Ibarra buys depict indigenous people kicking a devil-like figure dressed in a business suit; her milk and pasta contain excerpts from the Constitution. But what she really cares about is the price: In her local store, as in 15,000 such state-run supermarkets across the country, prices are about 30 percent less than in private grocery stores. "He is helping us; the president is with us," says Ibarra.

While the missions make a difference in individual lives, measuring Chávez's macro impact is difficult, since experts say indicators vary widely. Government numbers from the National Statistics Institute show poverty decreasing to 34 percent from 44 percent in 1998, yet opposition leaders put the number of poor Venezuelans as high as 70 percent. Government numbers show a 10-percent unemployment rate, but others say that figure does not include those working in the informal economy who don't make enough to support themselves.

Chávez's international policies have been more ambiguous. He has made important international gains - spearheading a meeting to revive OPEC in 2000 with price-setting mechanisms. He has focused on regional integration, joining Mercosur, the South American trade bloc, and focusing on energy policies in the Caribbean, says Jennifer McCoy, a Venezuela expert at Georgia State University.

But many associate his foreign policy with anti-Americanism, despite the fact that, according to the US State Department, the US is Venezuela's most important trading partner and Venezuela is one of the US's top four suppliers of oil. Indeed, a major Rosales platform is that Chávez has squandered the country's enormous oil wealth.

"He is ignoring security and employment in this country that is the fifth-largest oil producer on the planet, under this ground," says William Ojeda, a Rosales campaign leader and former opposition candidate, as he stomps his foot angrily on the floor. He says Chávez's oil programs abroad, including 90,000 barrels of oil sent daily to Cuba, have trumped a focus on crime and corruption at home.

"He is garbage," says Hector Pereira outside a shopping mall in the ritzy Las Mercedes neighborhood in Caracas. Mr. Pereira, who owns an insurance company, says he voted for Chávez initially, but says that since he aligned with Cuba, especially importing doctors into the country, his views have shifted. "I thought he was the best option, that we needed change," he says. "Chávez has shown us that he is worse."

Some say they worry that Rosales represents a return to the past - with traditional leaders who only care about the upper class - but Mr. Ojeda whips out a card with the words "Mi Negra" on it to illustrate Rosales's plan for the poor. It's a debit-card program that would direct about a fifth of Venezuela's oil income to 2.5 million of the poorest families in the country, or between $300 and $400 per family a month. "It's a crisis of ideologies"

Yet among the biggest challenges the opposition faces is an inability to define itself beyond a group that opposes the government. Through the national oil strike in 2002 and 2003, and a referendum two years later, their ideologies have not been clear, analysts say, except for their desire to defeat Chávez. They boycotted legislative elections last year, which handed Chávez control of every seat in the National Assembly.

Angelo Rivero-Santos, a Latin America expert at Georgetown University in Washington, says the opposition's unity behind Rosales is a sign of progress for their movement. Still, he says, "as a cohesive force, it is very difficult to decipher what they stand for. It's a crisis of ideologies," he says. "If you want to defeat a charismatic leader [who] has 100-percent support in the National Assembly, 20 governorships out of 22, and the military behind him, as well as the oil industry, you have to come up with a plan other than just trying to get rid of him."

For Chavez, Firm Rule And Favors (WP)

By Juan Forero

The Washington Post, December 1, 2006

CARACAS, Venezuela, Nov. 30 -- This country's populist president, Hugo ChÃ¡vez, beloved by his followers, has achieved a cultlike status by mixing his considerable charisma with a free-spending policy of funneling billions into social programs. But that hasn't stopped his oil-rich government from using every tool at its disposal to ensure that voters flock to its side in Sunday's presidential election.

Ramon Antonio Perez, 41, found that out the hard way. Never shy about expressing his dislike for the government, Perez said he was fired from his job in the publicly run Caracas subway system after ignoring repeated warnings about his political activities. "From night to day," he said, "I've been left with nothing."

At the state oil company, a young lawyer -- also opposed to the government -- described how the red T-shirts government supporters wear are handed out in bulk to workers, who are then expected to don them for pro-ChÃ¡vez rallies.

"When everyone is in red and going to rallies and you don't go along, then you begin to worry," said the lawyer, who asked that she not be identified for fear of being fired.

A secretly taped video disseminated by the opposition in early November shows Rafael RamÃ-rez, the president of the company, telling workers in a packed auditorium that there could not be "the tiniest doubt that the new Pdvsa is with ChÃ¡vez," using the abbreviation for PetrÃ³leos de Venezuela. RamÃ-rez also says a manager was fired for permitting a plane carrying ChÃ¡vez's main opponent in the election, Manuel Rosales, to land on a company-operated airstrip.

"What's that about?" RamÃ-rez says in the video. "Is it that people are getting crazy? Is it true then that we have infiltration from the squalid ones here, the enemies of the revolution?"

ChÃ¡vez is poised to easily win a second six-year term in which his government will seek to solidify its control over the private sector and accelerate its redistribution of wealth to the country's poor. Aside from two pollsters closely tied to the opposition, a dozen polls -- including some by anti-ChÃ¡vez analysts -- show ChÃ¡vez winning by a wide margin.

Government officials say the polls underscore the wellspring of support that comes from the poor barrios where ChÃ¡vez has drawn much of his strength since his emergence as a restless army colonel whose first attempt at taking power, in a 1992 coup, failed. Since then, he has won a string of elections: the 1998 landslide that put him in office; referendums that led to a new constitution and a new National Assembly; and a 2004 vote that dealt a stunning blow to an opposition effort to recall him.

"This is not a dictatorship," ChÃ¡vez told reporters Thursday. "This is a democracy."

Few outside of the most radical opposition leaders argue that ChÃ¡vez's magnetic persona and the state's focus on social programs haven't helped propel him from one victory to the next. But political analysts here and in the United States say the Venezuelan government has also grown in influence and power through a system that mixes the trappings of democracy with old-fashioned patronage, a touch of intimidation and the theatrical warnings ChÃ¡vez frequently makes about the United States, pronouncements that keep his supporters in a state of agitation.

DOJ_NMG_0100425

And though Venezuela's press remains one of Latin America's feistiest, and its anti-government leaders rail against ChÃ¡vez, limits have been imposed. A 2004 law aimed at broadcast media has prompted self-censorship, journalists here say. Another law makes it illegal for anyone to show disrespect for public officials. Some opposition leaders, notably in the stridently anti-ChÃ¡vez group Sumate, have been threatened with jail.

With few checks and balances, the president has overwhelming control of every state institution and makes virtually all key decisions. The 167-member National Assembly, which has not had an opposition politician in its ranks since the president's foes boycotted last year's elections, and the courts are little more than adornments. The military is represented in ministries and departments across the government, from city halls to the apparatus that runs elections.

Perhaps most important, billions of dollars flow directly from PetrÃ³leos de Venezuela to the executive branch.

"All presidents try to maximize their power," said Javier Corrales, an Amherst College political science professor who writes about Latin America. "They don't succeed as much. This is what happens when you have strong institutions. But in Venezuela, ChÃ¡vez has succeeded."

The opposition's tactics have strengthened the president's hand, giving him a seemingly endless supply of verbal ammunition to hurl at his foes. A 2002 coup, which the White House tacitly supported, and a national strike months later, which nearly shuttered PetrÃ³leos de Venezuela, infuriated poor Venezuelans.

The leaders of the opposition, drawn mainly from Venezuela's upper classes, have also failed to comprehend ChÃ¡vez's appeal among the poor.

Rosales, ChÃ¡vez's electoral opponent, has fashioned an alternative message, talking about crime and promising populist giveaways. But he has recently stepped up the timeworn accusations that ChÃ¡vez is taking Venezuela on the road to "Castro Communism."

"He wants to take Venezuela to a system that has a democratic facade," Rosales said in an interview. "But it's one that uses the model of Cuba, with an eternal presidency, with one party, where there is no private property, where there is no liberty of expression."

In a country where insults are traded freely and capitalist consumer culture reigns as perhaps nowhere else in Latin America, such comments have failed to reverberate with the masses.

ChÃ¡vez seems to relish the attacks.

"Here they talk of Castro Communism," he said at a news conference. "It's like they're frozen in the 1960s."

At the Carmen Maiso de Bello School, where students ages 10 to 80 learn how to read and handle simple math problems, ChÃ¡vez means progress. Teacher Elizabeth Rodriguez, 21, owes her job to the government, which is also putting her through college.

"The people are very happy with what President ChÃ¡vez is doing," she said. "He's the one who's taking us out of the darkness."

ChÃ¡vez's most committed backers, poor people who felt forgotten until his arrival, do not raise an eyebrow when the president remarks that his presidency may last another generation.

"How long will ChÃ¡vez rule? Until 2000-forever, because we're all with him," said Maria Nava, 56. "He's the only leader of everyone. We love him to death."

Political analysts say that kind of fervent support may be heartfelt, but it is also part of a carefully cultivated strategy by the government. ChÃ¡vez has demonized his opponents, radicalizing his more numerous supporters and instilling in them a deep-seated fear that if he is voted out, they will lose all that they have gained. The government here says that if ChÃ¡vez loses, the winners would be oligarchs and opportunists allied with the Bush administration, which is highly unpopular in Latin America.

"Let's not forget that we are facing the very devil," the president told hundreds of thousands of supporters at a rally Sunday. "On December 3, we face at the ballot box the imperialist government of the United States of America."

To ensure what ChÃ¡vez promises will be a "crushing" victory that will turn his opponents into "dust," the government appears to be employing its considerable influence to marshal votes. State resources are used freely in campaigns, and for workers in Venezuela's burgeoning bureaucracy, it is perfectly clear where their sympathies should lie.

DOJ_NMG_0100426

"They get a kit, and the kit is a red cap and a red T-shirt," said Froilan Barrios, a leader in the country's main labor confederation.

With more than 2 million workers, the public bureaucracy is important to both candidates. Electoral observers said the pressure has ranged from soft -- an early Christmas bonus -- to hard, with workers at the tax collection agency allegedly pressured to sell bonds to help fund the ChÃ¡vez campaign.

"There has been an excessive use of state resources to favor the president," said Pedro Nikken, one of five directors of Electoral Eye, a watchdog group that has otherwise found an audit of voting machines adequate.

Gabriela RamÃ-rez, a congresswoman closely allied with ChÃ¡vez, defended the government's efforts to ensure that workers at state entities, especially the oil company, are "red, very red." She recalled how employees at PetrÃ³leos de Venezuela had revolted against the government in a failed bid to bring down ChÃ¡vez.

"When we talk of being red, very red, we're talking of being committed to the revolution," she said. "We're talking about a government for the majority."

Those who have been found to support the opposition have learned the hard way that they're not wanted.

Lawyer Rocio San Miguel, 40, lost her job in 2004 after she signed a petition that led to the presidential recall vote ChÃ¡vez later won. Her name had been among 3.4 million signatures leaked to a pro-government congressman who later posted them on his Web site.

San Miguel said she knows what state workers who oppose the government are going through. "It is a climate of fear," she said, "and fear works, especially when it's related to your work."

Radioactive Trail Is Found In Case Of Poisoned Spy (NYT)

By Sarah Lyall And Steven Lee Myers

The New York Times, December 1, 2006

LONDON, Nov. 30 — In the latest turn in the mystery surrounding Alexander Litvinenko, the former Russian spy who died of radiation poisoning here a week ago, the British government said Thursday that radiation had been detected in 12 locations around London, and that it was likely to be found in more.

The radioactive trail, which might help establish Mr. Litvinenko's movements around the time he fell ill, includes the two hospitals where he was treated and places he visited on Nov. 1, the day he became sick. It also includes two British Airways Boeing 767s that routinely fly between London and Moscow and are now grounded at Heathrow Airport.

Speaking in Parliament, the home secretary, John Reid, said the authorities were examining two other airplanes — a third British Airways Boeing 767, which is on the ground in Moscow, and a Boeing 737, which is leased by the Russian company Transaero and arrived at Heathrow on Thursday. He said that the risk to the public was very low and that no one else had yet tested positive for radiation poisoning.

Mr. Litvinenko, 43, an outspoken critic of the government of the Russian president, Vladimir V. Putin, died on Nov. 23 after an agonizing illness that caused his hair to fall out, his immune system to shut down and his organs to fail. As he lay dying from what turned out to be radiation poisoning caused by the radioactive isotope polonium 210, Mr. Litvinenko accused Mr. Putin's government of killing him. The Kremlin has dismissed the notion as nonsense.

But Alex Goldfarb, a friend of Mr. Litvinenko's who is acting as a spokesman for his family, said the discovery of radiation on the jets pointed squarely at the Russian intelligence services and "reinforces the theory that the origin of this material that killed Alexander was in Moscow."

If that is the case — and it is by no means clear that it is — then it would follow that whoever brought the polonium 210 into Britain was himself unknowingly contaminated with minute traces of it, enough to leave a trail that sensitive equipment could pick up later.

Dr. Mark Hill, a physicist at the Medical Research Council's Radiation and Genome Stability Unit, said that while scientists in a lab would take the utmost care to prevent radiation from leaking out, it was possible that someone paying less scrupulous attention might end up with traces of the material on, for instance, his hands or clothing.

DOJ_NMG_0100427

Investigators still have not said for sure whether the trail of radiation around London was left by Mr. Litvinenko alone, by someone else who handled the polonium 210 he ingested or by someone who came into contact with him after he became contaminated.

Dr. Philip Walker, a professor of physics at the University of Surrey, said in an interview that a substance like polonium 210 was most likely to be excreted in urine or feces and that it could conceivably have been spread in minuscule doses as Mr. Litvinenko traveled around London. But he was hard-pressed to conjure a surefire scenario. "There isn't a lot of experience in giving people doses of polonium 210," he said.

The incident has cast somewhat of a pall on British relations with Russia, an ally whose human rights record Britain has publicly criticized. The foreign secretary, Margaret Beckett, met with Russia's foreign minister on Wednesday and formally requested "all necessary cooperation with the ongoing investigation," Mr. Reid said. "The Russian foreign minister assured her this cooperation would be forthcoming."

In Moscow, the newspaper Kommersant reported that Andrei Lugovi, one of the two Russians who met with Mr. Litvinenko at the Millennium hotel on the day he became sick, said he had flown on one of the contaminated British Airways jets on Nov. 3.

Mr. Lugovi has denied poisoning Mr. Litvinenko.

Doctors treating Yegor T. Gaidar, a former prime minister and academic who fell ill in Ireland the day after Mr. Litvinenko died, concluded that he had been poisoned, though the substance remained unknown, a spokesman for Mr. Gaidar said.

"They can say he was poisoned, but they cannot say what the substance was," the spokesman, Valery A. Natarov, said by telephone. "It was not natural. It was not some sort of food or drink."

Yekaterina Y. Genieva, director general of Russia's State Foreign Literature Library, traveled with Mr. Gaidar to Ireland and shared breakfast with him on the morning he became ill.

She said he had fruit salad and tea, served by an elderly woman at the site of the conference, the National University of Ireland, Maynooth. "I say this because this was the only other person he encountered" who was not part of the group, she said in an interview on the telephone.

Ms. Genieva said Mr. Gaidar had complained that he felt ill and made arrangements to return to Moscow, but proceeded to give a lecture, then excused himself from the discussion.

Ms. Genieva said she found him in a corridor, vomiting and bleeding from his nose, and waited with him until an ambulance came. He was hospitalized and returned to Moscow two days later on Nov. 26. She declined to speculate on his illness, but added: "It was not normal at all. There were no obvious signs" of anything untoward.

British Find Radiation At 12 Locations (WP)

By Kevin Sullivan And Peter Finn

The Washington Post, December 1, 2006

LONDON, Nov. 30 -- The trail of radiation found in London expanded to 12 sites Thursday, and British authorities turned their attention to two Russian aircraft in their efforts to track the poison that killed a former Russian intelligence officer, a British government minister told Parliament on Thursday.

The four newly disclosed sites include two hospitals where former spy Alexander Litvinenko was treated, the Sheraton Park Lane Hotel in central London and a car found in north London, according to Scotland Yard. Police released no further details about the car; Litvinenko lived in north London, and radiation was also discovered in his home.

On Thursday, a plane belonging to the Russian airline Transaero was checked for radiation and cleared after it landed at London's Heathrow Airport. British Home Secretary John Reid told Parliament that "there is one other Russian plane that we know of that we think we may be interested in."

Reid said that about 24 venues had been examined and that it was probable that additional sites would be tested for radiation as police "continue to trace possible witnesses and examine Mr. Litvinenko's movements."

The former officer in the Federal Security Service, or FSB, the domestic successor to the KGB, died Nov. 23 of exposure to the radioactive substance polonium-210. He was a fierce critic of Russian President Vladimir Putin and in a deathbed statement accused the Kremlin of ordering his assassination. Russian authorities have labeled that charge as absurd.

Former Russian prime minister Yegor Gaidar, who suddenly fell ill in Dublin last Friday, continued to recuperate in a Moscow clinic Thursday, according to his spokesman and an Irish diplomat. His daughter repeated earlier statements that her father could have been poisoned. But doctors have not confirmed that, and Irish authorities, who are conducting an inquiry in to the illness, said they had no evidence of it.

Gaidar discharged himself from a Dublin hospital and then spent Saturday at the Russian Embassy in Dublin before returning to Moscow.

British police have released little information about the locations where the radiation has been detected in London. But the expansion of the probe to the examination of aircraft that flew between London and Moscow, among other destinations, and a hotel that Litvinenko apparently did not visit take the inquiry beyond the movements of the former spy.

Litvinenko became sick Nov. 1 after several meetings in London's upscale Mayfair neighborhood. Contamination had already been discovered in a Japanese restaurant where he met an Italian academic, a hotel bar where he met three Russian men, and three office buildings.

Among the office buildings was one at 7 Down St. used by Boris Berezovsky, the exiled Russian tycoon who fell out with Putin in 2000 and has waged a long-distance campaign against him since then. Litvinenko was close to Berezovsky, who is wanted in Russia on numerous charges, among them calling for the violent overthrow of the government. He denies the allegations.

Another building, at 25 Grosvenor St., is the office of an international security company. Litvinenko visited both sites Nov. 1.

Police have not disclosed what connection, if any, Litvinenko had with a building at 58 Grosvenor St., where radiation was also detected. Traces of radiation from polonium-210 were found in a ground-floor office there, according to a two-page flier the British Health Protection Agency gave to employees.

Dated last Friday, it says the office "has now been closed and is the subject of a police investigation." It also notes that "very small amounts of polonium 210" were found in the reception area on a sofa, which has been removed, as well as "two other sites" in the building.

"It is not yet clear how it entered the premises," says the flier, a copy of which was obtained by The Washington Post.

Andrei Lugovoy, one of three Russian businessmen who met Litvinenko at the Millennium Hotel bar, told the Russian newspaper Kommersant that he had flown home to Moscow Nov. 3 on one of the three British Airways aircraft now grounded. Lugovoy, another former Russian intelligence officer, met Litvinenko with Dmitry Kovtun, who told Echo Moskvy radio last week that he was a business consultant in Moscow. Lugovoy once worked for Berezovsky in Moscow.

A third man, Vyacheslav Sikolenko, who runs an association of security companies in Moscow, said in a broadcast by the radio station that he exchanged a brief greeting with Litvinenko at the Millennium Hotel.

The Russian visitors, who had studied together in the 1980s at a Moscow military college, attended a soccer match here between teams from Moscow and London in the European championship league.

Lugovoy said that the meeting lasted 20 or 30 minutes and that no one ate. He also said Litvinenko did not drink anything. Kovtun said he was interested in meeting Litvinenko because "he had serious contacts with serious British companies which wanted to get into the Russian market but had experienced difficulty with this."

Lugovoy, who met with British investigators at the British Embassy in Moscow, has denied any involvement in Litvinenko's death. He has checked into a Moscow clinic, according to news reports there.

Lugovoy was an official bodyguard in the early 1990s to Gaidar, the former prime minister.

Mario Scaramella, an Italian who was on the staff of an Italian parliamentary investigation that looked into the KGB, also met with Litvinenko that day. He has denied any involvement in the poisoning and said he has been tested and shows no signs of radiation contamination.

A British coroner opened an inquest into Litvinenko's death Thursday. It was adjourned after a few minutes to allow police to continue their investigation.

Andrew Reid, who presided at the coroner's court, said three pathologists would take part in an autopsy Friday at the Royal London Hospital -- one representing the government, another for Litvinenko's wife and the third as an independent specialist in case there is a later criminal prosecution.

DOJ_NMG_0100429

The FBI has agreed to participate in the poisoning probe at the request of British investigators, a spokesman in Washington said. FBI experts in weapons of mass destruction will provide "technical assistance only," Special Agent Richard Kolko said.

At the moment, the case has no apparent connection to the United States or to U.S. citizens, officials said.

British health officials have repeatedly stressed that the radiation's threat to public health is low and that radiation from polonium-210 must be inhaled or ingested to be dangerous. But more than 1,700 people have called a special National Health Service hotline established to handle questions about the issue. And 5,500 people have called a British Airways hotline.

Radioactive Traces Found At 12 Sites In Spy Probe (USAT)

By Ellen Tumposky Special For

USA Today, December 1, 2006

LONDON — An autopsy today could shed light on the mysterious death of former KGB agent Alexander Litvinenko, whose last movements have left behind a radiation trail that officials say now includes 12 contaminated sites.

Litvinenko, 43, died Nov. 23 from poisoning blamed on a massive dose of the rare radioactive isotope polonium-210. At an inquest Thursday, coroner Andrew Reid said a forensic pathologist will conduct the autopsy at Royal London Hospital today with radiation protection in place.

Before he died, Litvinenko accused Russian President Vladimir Putin and his government of arranging his assassination. The Kremlin has denied the accusation.

The mystery of Litvinenko's death intensified Thursday as:

•More than 5,500 airline passengers called hotlines set up to assist travelers who flew recently on three British Airways jets. Traces of radioactive substances have been found on two BA 767s by investigators looking into Litvinenko's death.

The airline estimates that 33,000 passengers and 3,000 crew and airport personnel had contact with the 221 flights being scrutinized. All of the planes had flown between London and Moscow.

BA said it got 60,000 hits on its website since Wednesday. The site lists the flights by the planes in question.

•Speaking to Parliament, Home Secretary John Reid referred to “one other Russian plane of interest” and said there might be others.

•Reid told Parliament that police found radioactive traces at 12 of 24 locations checked in connection with the death of the former spy, who had become a fierce critic of Putin after moving to Britain.

Britain's Health Protection Agency said there was “no significant risk to public health” at seven other sites, including the two hospitals where Litvinenko was treated and the Millennium Hotel, where he met Russian contacts on Nov. 1, the day he fell ill.

Before he died, Litvinenko said those Russian contacts had traveled to London from Moscow, a revelation that prompted the searches of planes.

•The FBI said it had been asked to assist with the Litvinenko probe. FBI spokesman Richard Kolko said the bureau's experts on weapons of mass destruction would provide scientific analysis.

British Airways is contacting customers who flew on the planes as far back as Oct. 25. The health risk “has been deemed very low level,” spokeswoman Nicola Newman said. The three 767s — two at Heathrow, one in Moscow — remained on the ground.

Reid did not say whether radioactivity found at sites around London was polonium-210, which was found at the hotel and sushi bar where Litvinenko had meetings on Nov. 1. It was also found at four other Mayfair locations, including the office of exiled Russian tycoon Boris Berezovsky, also a Putin critic.

Litvinenko's friend and fellow Russian exile Alex Goldfarb told reporters the discovery of radiation on the aircraft confirmed Litvinenko's own view of how he was poisoned. “This reinforces the theory that the origins of the material that killed Alexander is in Moscow,” Goldfarb said.

DOJ_NMG_0100430

Goldfarb discounted any connection between the former KGB agent's death and the illness of Yegor Gaidar, 50, a former Russian prime minister who now is in the liberal opposition to Putin. Gaidar vomited and fainted in Dublin last week and now is under care in Moscow. “I don't think it's related,” Goldfarb said.

It was not clear how radiation got into the planes. Terry Kemp, professor of chemistry at the University of Warwick, said scientists working with radioactive isotopes normally wear protective clothing to avoid contamination. Couriers or agents might be far less careful, he said. “Suppose a small number of tiny droplets drifted onto your shirt cuffs and then you went on a plane. You would simply transfer it,” he said.

Polonium 210 (WSJ)

By Peter D. Zimmerman

The Wall Street Journal, December 1, 2006

LONDON -- The gruesome death of former KGB Lt. Col. Alexander Litvinenko will make history. Litvinenko is undoubtedly the first person murdered by the administration of an alpha-particle emitting radioactive isotope; that makes him the first known fatality resulting from a radiological assassination. The isotope, polonium 210, is largely unknown to the public.

Litvinenko's death was as ghastly as it is possible to imagine. The radioactive material went to his gastrointestinal tract, where it rapidly killed the cells lining his gut. They sloughed off, causing nausea, severe internal bleeding and enormous pain. It was as if his internal organs received a severe sunburn, and peeled. If the dose was high enough, it was a death sentence, no matter what the doctors tried to do. At best they could have tried to make Litvinenko comfortable until the end.

Radiation poisoning was not detected immediately, even though the symptoms were at least consistent with that cause. At a moderately early stage, according to visitors to the bedside, radiation was suspected, and a simple monitor was passed over Litvinenko's body. It failed to register significant radiation. That is not surprising because of the perverse genius of the choice of poison.

Alpha rays, emitted from certain very heavy atomic nuclei, are nothing but the nuclei of helium atoms. They pack a lot of energy, but because they are heavy and slow moving, they do not penetrate the way that gamma rays -- the most common radioactive emission -- do. Alphas are stopped in no more than a sheet of paper or a piece of aluminum foil, while gammas of the same energy will go through inches of lead. The alphas from the polonium 210 coursing through Litvinenko's body were stopped by his flesh, his skin and his clothing. There was nothing to be detected from outside.

Polonium is 5,000 times as radioactive per gram as radium; it takes very little to kill when it is ingested. There isn't much data, given that only two people are known to have died from acute polonium poisoning, one of whom was Madame Curie's assistant almost 100 years ago.

The Health Physics Society suggests that only three millicuries of polonium will do the trick; a fellow physicist estimated seven millicuries; and using data from a tragic episode in Goiania, Brazil, where five people died after eating a different isotope, I calculated the lethal dose at five millicuries. A "curie" is the amount of radiation given off by one gram of radium in one second; a millicurie is that given off by one-thousandth of a gram of radium. Because polonium's radioactivity is so high, one millicurie of polonium would weigh only 0.2 millionths of a gram, or about seven billionths of an ounce. Given the paucity of the data, three, five and seven are all "the same number," and it might be best to say the lethal dose is "around 10 millicuries." That is probably no bigger than a few grains of salt.

As this newspaper goes to press, the British authorities are investigating polonium contamination in at least a dozen locations in the West End of London, and British Airways has taken three Boeing 767 aircraft out of service for forensic examination. Many people who have been at or even near those locations fear for their own safely -- not surprising given the way Litvinenko died. In all likelihood there is no cause for any worry: The contamination must be at a very low level, particularly if it came from Litvinenko's body. The British government is partly to blame for the panic. It has announced "contamination," but has not indicated the amounts. It has sent a few people for follow-up screening, but has not explained that they are unlikely to be in any danger, and that the screening is probably only to gather forensic evidence.

Po-210 is a strange beast of a metal. The energy of each radioactive disintegration is so great that small chunks, perhaps a few hundred atoms in size, are blasted out of the surface and then drift around the room. Like dust they settle, but unlike dust they are radioactive themselves. And so, if one looks for alpha radiation with a sensitive detector, the micro-specks will announce themselves. But if such specks are all the contamination that exists, they are far too small to be dangerous.

When the use of polonium to kill Litvinenko was revealed, most scientists said that preparing the poison required the resources of a government, or at least the use of a nuclear research reactor. The only economical way to make the material is in a reactor where a target is bombarded with neutrons; the resulting tiny amounts of polonium are then carefully separated in a radiochemistry laboratory. The basic techniques date back to Pierre and Marie Curie's 1898 discoveries.

But it turns out that polonium 210 is a fairly common industrial isotope, one for which there are few substitutes. The radiation from a Po-210 source is used to ionize air, so that static electricity can be dissipated from textiles being pulled along rollers, from rapidly moving bands of paper, such as newsprint, and from photographic film. Alpha radiation makes it possible to brush off dust from film without having it immediately yanked back by a static charge.

Indeed, the U.S. Nuclear Regulatory Commission does not even require much in the way of licensing or paperwork to buy polonium sources smaller than two curies. Antistatic brushes, when fresh, can contain up to 10% of a lethal dose of Po-210; air ionizers for use in industry can contain up to the limit without coming under serious regulation, but larger and more useful sources are controlled. Such brushes, and somewhat larger ones, remain on the market.

As the threat of "dirty bombs," or radiological dispersion devices (RDDs), became well known a few years ago, thought was given to controlling alpha sources almost as tightly as gamma sources. However, it was recognized that alpha-emitters were not useful in RDDs because the radioactive material was only dangerous if you could persuade the victim to eat, drink or inhale it, something which seemed improbable. The allowed sealed radioactive sources are extremely hard to open, and extracting the microscopic speck of polonium is even more difficult.

Does the Litvinenko murder change things drastically? Not immediately, in my opinion. Polonium sources are still valuable in industry, and substituting small x-ray devices would be expensive and would take years to accomplish. The lesson from the Litvinenko murder is not that radioactive sources should be banned, not even alpha sources. It is that radiological weapons have the power to frighten us and to disrupt our lives, even when they cannot be used to cause widespread death and injury, and that an inarticulate government can make things much worse.

Puffing On Polonium (NYT)

By Robert N. Proctor

The New York Times, December 1, 2006

Stanford, Calif.

WHEN the former K.G.B. agent Alexander V. Litvinenko was found to have been poisoned by radioactive polonium 210 last week, there was one group that must have been particularly horrified: the tobacco industry.

The industry has been aware at least since the 1960s that cigarettes contain significant levels of polonium. Exactly how it gets into tobacco is not entirely understood, but uranium “daughter products” naturally present in soils seem to be selectively absorbed by the tobacco plant, where they decay into radioactive polonium. High-phosphate fertilizers may worsen the problem, since uranium tends to associate with phosphates. In 1975, Philip Morris scientists wondered whether the secret to tobacco growers’ longevity in the Caucasus might be that farmers there avoided phosphate fertilizers.

How much polonium is in tobacco? In 1968, the American Tobacco Company began a secret research effort to find out. Using precision analytic techniques, the researchers found that smokers inhale an average of about .04 picocuries of polonium 210 per cigarette. The company also found, no doubt to its dismay, that the filters being considered to help trap the isotope were not terribly effective. (Disclosure: I’ve served as a witness in litigation against the tobacco industry.)

A fraction of a trillionth of a curie (a unit of radiation named for polonium’s discoverers, Marie and Pierre Curie) may not sound like much, but remember that we’re talking about a powerful radionuclide disgorging alpha particles — the most dangerous kind when it comes to lung cancer — at a much higher rate even than the plutonium used in the bomb dropped on

Nagasaki. Polonium 210 has a half life of about 138 days, making it thousands of times more radioactive than the nuclear fuels used in early atomic bombs.

We should also recall that people smoke a lot of cigarettes — about 5.7 trillion worldwide every year, enough to make a continuous chain from the earth to the sun and back, with enough left over for a few side-trips to Mars. If .04 picocuries of polonium are inhaled with every cigarette, about a quarter of a curie of one of the world's most radioactive poisons is inhaled along with the tar, nicotine and cyanide of all the world's cigarettes smoked each year. Pack-and-a-half smokers are dosed to the tune of about 300 chest X-rays.

Is it therefore really correct to say, as Britain's Health Protection Agency did this week, that the risk of having been exposed to this substance remains low? That statement might be true for whatever particular supplies were used to poison Mr. Litvinenko, but consider also this: London's smokers (and those Londoners exposed to secondhand smoke), taken as a group, probably inhale more polonium 210 on any given day than the former spy ingested with his sushi.

No one knows how many people may be dying from the polonium part of tobacco. There are hundreds of toxic chemicals in cigarette smoke, and it's hard to sort out how much one contributes compared to another — and interactive effects can be diabolical.

In a sense, it doesn't really matter. Taking one toxin out usually means increasing another — one reason "lights" don't appear to be much safer. What few experts will dispute is the magnitude of the hazard: the World Health Organization estimates that 10 million people will be dying annually from cigarettes by the year 2020 — a third of these in China. Cigarettes, which claimed about 100 million lives in the 20th century, could claim close to a billion in the present century.

The tobacco industry of course doesn't like to have attention drawn to the more exotic poisons in tobacco smoke. Arsenic, cyanide and nicotine, bad enough. But radiation? As more people learn more about the secrets hidden in the golden leaf, it may become harder for the industry to align itself with candy and coffee — and harder to maintain, as we often hear in litigation, that the dangers of tobacco have long been "common knowledge." I suspect that even some of our more enlightened smokers will be surprised to learn that cigarette smoke is radioactive, and that these odd fears spilling from a poisoned K.G.B. man may be molehills compared with our really big cancer mountains.

Pope Prays In Turkey With Muslim And Orthodox Leaders (NYT)

By Ian Fisher

The New York Times, December 1, 2006

ISTANBUL, Nov. 30 — Pope Benedict XVI, who spurred waves of anger among Muslims just two months ago, stood Thursday in silent prayer, facing Mecca, beside a Muslim prelate in one of the world's most important mosques.

The image of two men in white — the 79-year-old pope and Mustafa Cagrici, the chief of religious affairs for Istanbul — under the ornate domes of the Blue Mosque sealed a trip in which Pope Benedict repeatedly underscored his desire to reconcile Christians and Muslims.

How much of that goal he achieved here is unclear, after the deep anger over a speech criticized as equating Islam with violence. But Mr. Cagrici proclaimed the start good, with Benedict becoming only the second pope in 2,000 years known to have visited a mosque.

"Spring will not arrive by a single swallow," he told the pope. "But more swallows will arrive, and we're going to enjoy spring in the world all together."

The two men exchanged nearly identical gifts of paintings of doves as signs of peace, a coincidence that seemed to amuse the pope. In turn, he told Mr. Cagrici, "With the help of God, we must find the way of peace together, for the good of humanity."

But even with the symbolism of the mosque visit and a more diplomatic style, Pope Benedict showed Thursday that many of his basic concerns about the relationship between Christianity and Islam, as well as between West and East, had not vanished.

Twice on Thursday, the last day of his visit to Turkey, he referred to the "Christian roots of Europe" — long one of his themes, and one that has provoked some anger as seeming to minimize the contributions of others who now live there, especially the growing Muslim population.

DOJ_NMG_0100433

He went further in a joint declaration with Bartholomew, the Orthodox Patriarch of Constantinople, of referring also to the Christian roots of Turkey — a historical fact, with the Byzantine church based here for more than a millennium, but a declaration that seemed to run the risk of offending his Muslim hosts.

On Thursday he again seemed to endorse Turkey's entering the European Union — repeating the good-will gesture he made on Tuesday, his first day here — but he linked the step to a hope for specific progress in respecting the rights of minorities here. Turkey's small population of Orthodox Christians complains of official harassment and bureaucratic obstacles that have prevented its members from operating freely.

Of the European Union, the pope wrote in his joint declaration with Patriarch Bartholomew, "Those engaged in this great project should not fail to take into consideration all aspects affecting the inalienable rights of the human person, especially religious freedom, a witness and guarantor of respect for all other freedoms."

"In every step toward unification," they wrote, "minorities must be protected, with their cultural traditions and the distinguishing features of their religion."

Finally, he repeated a theme from the speech that caused the negative reaction in September in Regensburg, Germany, about his worry about violence in the cause of religion, though this time without mentioning any religion by name.

"Above all, we wish to affirm that killing innocent people in God's name is an offense against him and against human dignity," he and the patriarch wrote in their statement.

In all, the pope has seemed to toe a careful line of not backing down in substance — with the exception of cautiously blessing the progress of Turkey toward membership in the European Union — while presenting a more open, warmer face to an Islamic world that now deeply distrusts him.

The pope's spokesman, the Rev. Federico Lombardi, said the September speech, however painful, had helped open a new vein of dialogue between Christians and Muslims. "Regensburg bore a positive fruit, in a certain sense," he told reporters after the pope's visit to the mosque.

Before Benedict's visit, John Paul II became the first pope known to visit a mosque. It is usually reported that he did so first in Damascus in 2001, though a Jesuit priest active in interfaith dialogue said recently that the first such visit was actually in Senegal in 1992.

Benedict's relations with Muslims were only one facet of the trip, and for the Vatican not the most important one in the long run. On Thursday, Benedict continued what he considered his main task here, to help heal the 1,000-year rift with the world's 220 million Orthodox Christians.

For 40 years the two churches have been engaged in halting talks toward reuniting, and on Thursday the pope attended an Orthodox Divine Liturgy, and he and Bartholomew traded speeches that expressed hope for future negotiations toward unity.

Bartholomew is the spiritual head of the world's Orthodox Christians, though not with the same power the pope holds over the world's billion Catholics. The patriarch called the pope's presence in Turkey part of the "unwavering journey toward the restoration of full communion among our churches," which he said was God's will and command.

"May it be so," Bartholomew said.

Benedict's twin goals of overcoming enmities, old and new, between Christians and Muslims and among Christians themselves, could not find a more apt or complicated stage than Istanbul, a fact that seemed particularly vivid in the final day before he travels back to Rome.

Here the dramas of two millenniums of conflict, distant but very real, play out perhaps as in no other place, endowing the pope's visit with deep symbolic value — and presenting endless dangers for offense.

Before the pope visited the Blue Mosque, he toured Hagia Sophia, the present structure of which was built in the sixth century. It was the seat of the Byzantine church, which split from Roman Catholicism in 1054. After the Ottoman Turks defeated the Byzantines in 1453, the church was turned into a mosque. Ataturk, founder of the modern, secular Turkish state, turned it into a museum in 1935, making it neither Christian nor Muslim.

Hagia Sophia was closed to the general public during the pope's tour, and quiet except for a handful of stray cats that scampered across the ancient marble. Many Turks were watching Benedict carefully to see if he would pray. Pope Paul VI got down on his knees when he visited in 1967. Though Pope Paul had permission, he outraged many Turks, who felt he was subtly claiming the building back for Christianity.

But Benedict played very much the tourist, merely nodding and asking questions as he stopped at an alcove that displayed the church's split identity. Images of the Virgin Mary and the Christ child, in a ninth-century fresco, looked down from a dome to walls covered with Arabic calligraphy citing the names of God and the Prophet Muhammad.

After his tour the pope walked across the plaza — under the tightest security, with helicopters overhead and riot-equipped police officers with shields and tear gas — to the Blue Mosque, built in the early 17th century by Sultan Ahmed. The sultan's goal was also part of the competition between religions, to prove that Muslims could outdo Christians, even in the majesty of their buildings.

Silent Prayer, Words Of Hope As Pope Visits Mosque (WP)

By Molly Moore

The Washington Post, December 1, 2006

ISTANBUL, Nov. 30 -- Pope Benedict XVI slipped out of his red Prada loafers and padded in white slippered feet across the carpeted floor of Istanbul's revered Blue Mosque on Thursday, in only the second papal visit ever to a Muslim house of worship.

Near the end of the tour, the pope's host, Istanbul's chief cleric, Mustafa Cagrici, said quietly, "Now, I'm going to pray." The Christian world's most powerful leader lowered his eyes and appeared to mouth his own brief, silent prayer as the lights of the mosque glinted off the heavy gold cross nestled against his white frock.

For just under a minute, Benedict stood facing Mecca alongside the Islamic cleric beneath the exquisite blue-tiled dome of one of the world's most famous mosques, a visual gesture of reverence to a Muslim world he angered in September by quoting a Byzantine emperor who accused Islam of embracing violence.

"Thank you for this moment of prayer," the pope told Cagrici as they shuffled out of the cavernous 17th-century structure, known formally as Sultan Ahmet Mosque, with Benedict's white stocking slippers peeking from beneath his floor-length robes. In Islam, it is forbidden to wear shoes inside a mosque.

"This visit will help us find together the way of peace for the good of all humanity," the pope said.

"A single swallow can't bring spring," Cagrici told the pope. "But many swallows will follow, and we will enjoy a spring in this world."

Some Turks were angry that the Roman Catholic leader, on his first trip to a Muslim country in the 19 months he has been pope, entered a mosque. Police dispersed a few dozen demonstrators who protested outside the Blue Mosque several hours before Benedict's arrival.

Others welcomed the pope's gestures of goodwill. "Each message the pope gives in Turkey is important," said Ali Adakoglu, editor of Gercek Hayat, a weekly magazine popular among conservative Muslim university students. "It's important not only for Turkey, but for the world, which could have a clash of civilizations."

Adakoglu added, "But is he saying nice things only for the sake of being polite, or is he really behind his warm messages?"

Snipers stood guard in the mosque's minarets. Just before the pope arrived, the wail of the call to prayer competed with the rumble of helicopters policing the area from above, part of the stringent security precautions Turkey has taken for the pontiff's four-day trip, which ends Friday.

Benedict's predecessor, John Paul II, made the first papal visit to a mosque, in Damascus in 2001. Benedict added the Blue Mosque to his itinerary as an overture to Muslims and Turkish nationalists suspicious of his visits here with leaders of Orthodox and Armenian Christian churches, who have complained of discrimination and repression in Turkey.

Benedict's tour has tested his diplomatic skills as he treads carefully across the fault lines of religious conflict both modern and ancient. He has used the trip not only to try to mend his relations with the Muslim world, but also to try to improve the Vatican's ties with the Orthodox and Armenian Christian churches, which split with Rome centuries ago.

Ecumenical Patriarch Bartholomew I, who from his seat in Istanbul acts of spiritual head of Orthodox Christianity's 250 million members worldwide, invited the pontiff to Turkey a year ago, long before the pope's speech that incited Muslims.

DOJ_NMG_0100435

After nearly a millennium of conflict between Rome and the Orthodox church, the pope and the patriarch called Thursday for a combined effort to salvage the declining membership and stature of both churches in Europe, where Christians are increasingly abandoning religion as Islam gains followers and influence.

"In Europe, while remaining open to other religions and to their cultural contributions, we must unite our efforts to preserve Christian roots, traditions and values," the leaders said in a joint statement after an elaborate, two-hour St. Andrew's Day service in the Orthodox Church of St. George near the banks of the Bosporus Strait.

And while the pope was willing to pray in the Blue Mosque, he avoided any overt show of prayer when he visited the Haghia Sophia -- once considered Christendom's grandest house of worship. In 1453, Ottoman Turks captured Constantinople, now Istanbul, and turned the church into a mosque. It was declared a museum in 1935 after Turkey became a secular republic.

Press and television commentators here had speculated about whether the pope would attempt a prayer in Haghia Sophia or make a comment urging the government to return it to its status as a place of worship.

He did neither. He did, however, raise folded hands for a few seconds toward the recently refurbished ceiling mosaic of the Virgin Mary, and as he entered the soaring spaces of the onetime cathedral, his face seemed more animated than in any other public appearance of his trip.

Pope Prays In Turkish Mosque (WT)

By John Phillips

The Washington Times, December 1, 2006

ISTANBUL -- Pope Benedict XVI prayed alongside a top Muslim cleric yesterday in Istanbul's dazzling Blue Mosque, climaxing a four-day visit in which the pontiff emphasized protecting the rights of religious minorities.

Hours earlier, Benedict stood beside the spiritual leader of the world's Orthodox Christians, Ecumenical Patriarch Bartholomew I, and they encouraged Turkey in its bid to join the European Union.

"In every step towards unification, minorities must be protected, with their cultural traditions and the distinguishing features of their religion," Benedict and Bartholomew said in a joint declaration after a morning service.

The service at St. George's Patriarchal Church marked the feast of St. Andrew, the patron saint of the Ecumenical Patriarchate and brother of St. Peter.

In the afternoon, Benedict visited the mosque, replacing his shoes with white slippers and walking beside Istanbul's top Muslim cleric, Grand Mufti Mustafa Cagrici.

"This visit will help us find together the way of peace for the good of all humanity," the German pope told Mufti Cagrici inside the 17th-century structure.

The Rev. Federico Lombardi, the Vatican spokesman, said the pope had stopped for "a moment of reflection and meditation that one can also call personal prayer" in the mosque, which officially is named after Sultan Ahmet I and opened in 1616.

A major attraction for tourists, its popular name derives from the fine blue Iznik tiles in the main prayer room.

Receiving a gift of a glazed tile decorated with a dove and a painting showing a view of the Sea of Marmara, the pope gave the imam in return a painting showing four doves. "Let us pray for brotherhood and for all humanity," the 79-year-old pontiff said in Italian.

The mosque visit was "truly a great step forward" in relations between Muslims and Christians, Father Lombardi said. "The welcome the pope received certainly was very cordial without any coldness or reserve."

Benedict also toured the 1,500-year-old Hagia Sophia complex, now a museum but for centuries a Christian church. In 1453, it was converted to a mosque during the Muslim conquest of Constantinople.

The site was converted to a museum under the secular Turkish republic proclaimed in 1923.

"In our diversity, we find ourselves before faith in the unique God," Benedict wrote in the museum visitors' book. "May God enlighten us and allow us to find the path of love and peace."

The pope's inscription was released on a Turkish newspaper's Web site and Father Lombardi confirmed it as authentic.

DOJ_NMG_0100436

Several dozen protesters linked to the far-right Grey Wolves party gathered outside the building yesterday morning waving banners saying, "Pope get out of Turkey."

However, the pope's message of reconciliation resonated throughout the trip, winning widespread praise that contrasted sharply with worldwide Muslim anger in Turkey and elsewhere over remarks on violence and the prophet Muhammad.

Benedict's predecessor, Pope John Paul II, made the first papal visit to a mosque during a visit to Damascus, the Syrian capital, in 2001.

Meeting Bartholomew was the original aim of the pope's visit in an effort to end the nearly 1,000-year schism between the Catholic and Orthodox churches, which Benedict yesterday described as a "scandal to the world."

The pope is slated to return to the Vatican today.

Conviction Of Researcher For New York Times In China Is Upheld (WP)

By Maureen Fan

The Washington Post, December 1, 2006

BEIJING, Dec. 1 -- The three-year fraud sentence of a Beijing-based researcher for the New York Times was upheld by Beijing's High Court on Friday, the only remaining charge against him after a more serious accusation of leaking state secrets was dismissed in August.

"The fraud charge itself is not fair because they didn't give our witness any chance to speak in court," said Zhao's attorney, Guan Anping, who was kept waiting outside the courthouse with reporters and did not appear with his client. "The fraud charge depended heavily on evidence, and this evidence was not presented in court. Both the prosecutors and the defense only submitted written statements."

For Zhao Yan, 44, it was the end of a lengthy legal process that could have meant 10 years in prison. It was not clear Friday whether he could appeal to the central government's Supreme People's Court for reconsideration through a "supervisory process," Guan said, which is technically outside normal legal procedures.

Zhao was detained in September 2004, 10 days after a Times article accurately predicted that former president Jiang Zemin would resign his last official position as head of China's Central Military Commission. Zhao and the Times have consistently denied that he was the source for news about Jiang's retirement, which was not unexpected but viewed as a state secret.

Zhao's case was originally dismissed in March, weeks before current President Hu Jintao visited the United States. But Zhao remained in detention, and prosecutors renewed their charges in May. His case has been the subject of lobbying by President Bush.

After the more serious charge was dropped, Zhao was sentenced in August to three years for the unrelated fraud charge, in connection with his job as a Chinese newspaper reporter before he worked for the Times. Prosecutors say that Zhao promised to help a man in Jilin province in exchange for $2,500 but that he did not deliver the help.

Zhao maintains his innocence. The man did not complain to police or file a legal complaint, and the fraud charge was leveled only after authorities began investigating the state secrets charge, Zhao's attorneys have said.

Zhao has served more than two years of his sentence and has 10 months remaining. He could be released in September.

His daughter, aunt and uncle appeared in court Friday. It was Zhao's relatives who came outside about 9:15 a.m. and informed Zhao's attorney and the media of the result.

"Zhao told the court: 'You even made a mistake with my birthplace and my age. How can you give me a trial?' " said the uncle, Zhao Hongfeng, 56. "It's not what I expected. I believe he's innocent."

Sex Abuse Of Girls Is Stubborn Scourge In Africa (NYT)

By Sharon Lafraniere

The New York Times, December 1, 2006

SAMBAVA, Madagascar — Thirty miles outside this down-at-the-heels seaside town, Justin Betombo tends his vanilla plants and cheers the local soccer team as if he had not a care in the world. And in fact, what was once his greatest worry has been almost magically lifted from his shoulders.

DOJ_NMG_0100437

In the local prosecutor's office, a file filled with accusations that he had sodomized his 9-year-old niece has vanished.

Mr. Betombo was arrested in 2003 after the girl, Kenia, said he had savagely assaulted her. The police obtained his confession, which he later recanted, and a doctor's certificate that Kenia had been sexually violated, rendering her incontinent and anorexic. Twice they sent the case file to the prosecutor.

There matters ended. Mr. Betombo attended one hearing in the prosecutor's office, but Kenia's parents say they were not told about it. The records are nowhere to be found. And Mr. Betombo walked away a free man. Kenia's parents, distressed by what they saw as a travesty of justice, asked that her name be published, hoping that her case would set an example.

Among sub-Saharan Africa's children, such stories are disturbingly common. Even as this region races to adopt many of the developed world's norms for children, including universal education and limits on child labor, one problem — child sexual abuse — remains stubbornly resistant to change.

In much of the continent, child advocates say, perpetrators are shielded by the traditionally low status of girls, a lingering view that sexual abuse should be dealt with privately, and justice systems that constitute obstacle courses for victims. Data is sparse and sexual violence is notoriously underreported. But South African police reports give an inkling of the sweep of child victimization. In the 12 months ending in March 2005, the police reported more than 22,000 cases of child rape. In contrast, England and Wales, with nine million more people than South Africa, reported just 13,300 rapes of women and girls in the most recent 12-month period.

"The prevalence of child rape in South Africa goes from really, really high to astronomically high," said Dr. Rachel Jewkes, a specialist on sexual violence with South Africa's Medical Research Council.

Africa is not unique in its high rates of abuse. While a survey of nine countries last year by the World Health Organization found the highest incidence of child sexual abuse in Namibia — more than one in five women there reported being sexually abused before age 15 — it also found frequent abuse in Peru, Japan and Brazil, among other nations. Relatives are frequent perpetrators in Africa, as in much of the world. But this continent's children face added risks, especially at school. Half of Malawian schoolgirls surveyed in 2006 said male teachers or classmates had touched them in a sexual manner without their permission.

The number of abuse cases is rising in South Africa, Zimbabwe, Zambia, Uganda, Kenya, Sierra Leone and other African countries, statistics show. Whether that means more children are being victimized or more are coming forward — or both — is impossible to determine, experts say.

Researchers cite various reasons that abuse is so common: poverty, which makes it harder for parents to keep children safe; a legacy of violent, oppressed societies, and cultural mores that allow offenders to escape criminal punishment, often by marrying their victims or compensating their victims' families.

But, ultimately, said Dr. Jewkes, of the Medical Research Council, the vast gap between the status of men and boys and that of women and girls explains much of the climate of relative tolerance. "If I had to put my finger on one overriding issue, it would be gender inequality," she said.

Increasingly, African nations are openly acknowledging the problem, partly because AIDS has made children more likely to fall ill or die from sexual abuse. Campaigns against abuse are under way in Zimbabwe, Lesotho, Swaziland, Kenya, Sierra Leone and elsewhere.

The impact is apparent in Zimbabwe, where a child rights group estimates that at least 2,000 child rape victims have died of AIDS since 1998. "Literally for the first time in Zimbabwe's history, child abuse is no longer a taboo subject," said James Elder, a Unicef spokesman.

That said, the response is minuscule compared with the extent of abuse, said Pamela Shifman, a child protection specialist at Unicef headquarters in New York. "We see huge numbers of girls affected," she said. "These crimes are still treated as the fault or the problem of the victim."

South Africa is perhaps furthest along in developing the specialized courts, medical treatment and counseling that have long been standard fare in the West. But even there, Dr. Jewkes said, appalling police work — for example, not verifying the addresses of suspects and accusers — routinely dooms prosecutions.

DOJ_NMG_0100438

Beyond that, said Joan van Niekerk, national coordinator of Childline, which runs South Africa's child crisis hot lines, children regularly complain that coping with the criminal justice system is worse than the sexual abuse itself.

Like much of the region, Madagascar, an island of 18 million off Africa's southeastern coast, is making headway, but still falls short of even South Africa's low standard.

Since 2000, Unicef has set up 11 child-protection teams of doctors, educators and judges to inform the public about sex abuse and assist victims. Hassan Mouigni, who leads vice investigations at the main police station in Antananarivo, Madagascar's capital of 1.4 million, sees some results. This year, he said, the station has investigated 95 cases, compared with 40 in all of 2003.

But medical and legal authorities say the vast majority of families still hew to a tradition of accepting payment from perpetrators. The few who press charges are plunged into a criminal justice process that Mr. Mouigni calls deeply frustrating.

He can offer victims who arrive at his station little more than an officer behind a typewriter — no counselors, no video cameras to record testimony, no toy-filled rooms or friendly intermediaries. Instead, girls as young as 5 are expected to confront their tormentors face to face. Perhaps most daunting, poor families must produce at least $15 to cover investigation costs like gloves and paper for medical exams.

That was nearly enough to deter Claudine Ravoniarisoa, who appeared at Mr. Mouigni's station one recent Thursday with her 15-year-old daughter. Wringing her hands nonstop, the girl told officers that a neighbor had raped her while her mother was hospitalized. "He destroyed my life and my body," she said.

But once her mother learned of the costs, she decided to identify the perpetrator only as "Mr. X."

"I have no money to pursue this," she protested, while an officer tried to persuade her to do so.

In another room, Domoima Rahamtanirima pressed a case against her brother-in-law in the molestation of her 5-year-old, Menja. For two weeks afterward, Mrs. Rahamtanirima said, the girl cried when she urinated.

Mrs. Rahamtanirima borrowed money for the required medical exam. Nothing was left to buy the medicine the doctor had prescribed for Menja. Her file complete, the little girl traipsed in her frilly white dress to a courthouse as packed with accusers, accused and their supporters as a New York subway station at rush hour. She waited four hours, then sat down at a table before them all and, in a tiny voice, identified her uncle, seated across from her, as her assailant.

"We had to do it," said her mother, who said that everyone in her village knew about the case and asked that her daughter's name and picture be used. "Everybody should be aware that things like this should not happen to children."

A Quest for Redress

Kenia's parents, Antoine and Joazandry Moravelo, are equally passionate about the need for justice for their daughter. But after four fruitless years, they have all but given up hope. Though her photograph and name have appeared in local newspapers, they say, no one has been held accountable.

Kenia, the sixth of eight children, moved in with her aunt and uncle Lydia and Justin Betombo at the age of 8 after they promised to educate her. Sharing child care is common in Africa, and the Betombos, who lived 45 minutes away, had more than the Moravelos: a car and a two-room, tree-shaded house with sheet metal walls instead of the Moravelos' thatched-roof reed hut.

But Kenia said the house was no haven. She said, "my uncle showed me his penis whenever he had a chance, and I always ran away." Her aunt's stock response, she said, was, "Don't talk about that."

One night in mid-2002, when her aunt was out, Kenia said, her uncle summoned her to his bed. "Because I refused, he came over to my bed," she said. Afterward, she said, he told her, "If you talk about what happened, I will kill you." She said she told her aunt anyway, and was instructed to keep quiet. The physical consequences of the attack, however, were hard to hide.

Kenia lost control of her bowels, had to quit school and was increasingly homebound. For six months or more, her only treatment was from a traditional healer who told her to boil herbs and wash with them. Finally, emaciated and weak, Kenia approached a neighbor. "She said, 'I am sick; I am sick,' and she was crying," said the neighbor, Suzanne Mboty, who knew Kenia's parents.

Hours after the neighbor reached his village, Mr. Moravelo retrieved Kenia. "She was so thin, so thin, I couldn't believe it," he said. Her mother said Kenia could not even sit down. "I opened her bag, and I saw all her underwear full of feces," she said. "I said, 'My God, what is this?' "

Kenia refused to say. But at the local health clinic, the nurse held up scissors and threatened to operate if Kenia did not talk.

That began nearly four years of medical procedures for Kenia, including a colostomy, two operations to close it, and repeated hospitalizations for wasting, incontinence and anorexia. Her mother said she sometimes refuses to eat because defecation is painful. Medical reports indicate that the muscle controlling defecation has been largely destroyed and her anal canal is heavily scarred.

The family is rent: Kenia's parents had to sell their rice field and move to Diego-Suarez in the north for her treatment. Most of their other children remained behind, in the care of elder siblings. Kenia, now 13, is temporarily in Antananarivo, where a doctor is trying to treat her with a special diet.

A surgeon who recently examined her said a full recovery was unlikely. The uncertainty preys on Kenia, her mother said. "Sometimes she tells me, 'My body is hurting. I have so many problems. I don't go to school. I just feel this sickness all around me,' " she said.

The family's legal efforts have met even less success. Mr. Moravelo lodged a complaint with the cash-short police, but the officers had no car; he hired a taxi so they could pick up Mr. Betombo for questioning. Frightened and sobbing, Kenia confronted her uncle at the chaotic station.

Justice Subverted

Mr. Betombo and his wife denied Kenia's account. But ultimately — after the police beat him, Mr. Betombo said — he signed a confession, was arrested and carted off to the prosecutor's office in nearby Antalaha.

Kenia's father said that was the last he heard until a few days later, when friends told him that Justin Betombo was "free and happy" back in his village.

Mr. Betombo said he had convinced the prosecutor that his confession was false. Kenia's parents say they were never summoned to contradict him.

"I took this girl in as my daughter," Mr. Betombo said. "I really can't understand why they say that I could have done such an awful thing to her. I think they were jealous of me and they wanted to ruin my life."

Sambava's police department again sent the file to the prosecutor's office months later. But Sophie Ramahakaraha, the prosecutor in charge, now says that she has no record or memory of it. Real instances of child rape are rare, she said. "Very often the parents are poor and they use this procedure to get money," she said.

But to Daul Randriamalaza, a Sambava police inspector, there is no question about who was the victim here.

"I don't want to talk about corruption here, but that is what could have happened in this case," he said as prisoners watched from the station's tiny cell.

"I have children myself. How can I be happy about this?"

Mexico's New Day (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, December 1, 2006

VICENTE FOX exits the stage today in Mexico, handing over the presidency to 44-year-old Felipe Calderon. The two men hail from the same conservative party (the National Action Party, or PAN), but Calderon's inauguration takes place against a backdrop radically different from Fox's swearing-in six years ago. Calderon seems immeasurably weaker than Fox was when he vanquished the long-dominant Institutional Revolutionary Party, or PRI, in 2000. But that may be as much an opportunity as a hindrance.

Fox, though still personally popular, has been an ineffective, lame-duck president for so long it is easy to forget his rock-star status — not just at home but around the globe — on first taking office. Expectations in Mexico were so high then that even leftist intellectuals flocked to his side.

His successor takes office under far less auspicious circumstances. Indeed, there is some question about whether he will be able to be sworn in as customary in the Congress. Leftist legislators still grousing (absurdly) that fraud accounts for Calderon's narrow victory at the polls are vowing to block the path to the podium.

DOJ_NMG_0100440

Calderon has nowhere to go but up, just as Fox had nowhere to go but down. There is a recent precedent in Mexico of a president who needed to legitimize himself in office — Carlos Salinas de Gortari — taking bold risks. Salinas, a member of the PRI, shocked Mexico by taking on the powerful oil workers' union and making peace with the Roman Catholic Church.

Calderon could show his boldness by taking on his backers in the business community. There has been a lot of nonsensical talk since the July 2 election about the need for the new president to borrow some of the ideas of Andres Manuel Lopez Obrador, the leftist former mayor of Mexico City who lost the election by less than a percentage point. That would be a mistake.

Mexico needs to spend more on welfare programs, sure, but overall it needs freer markets, not a return to the days of heavy-handed government control of the economy (Lopez Obrador's vision). And in order to create more economic freedom and stimulate growth, Calderon needs to break up the monopolies and duopolies that enrich the elites (the Telmex behemoth in telecommunications is Exhibit A) and act as a brake on growth.

Calderon will have to become an avid trust-buster if he is to succeed in office. He'd be taking on powerful interests, but the move could also help him broaden his base of support. A technocratic political insider who surrounds himself with hard-core conservative advisors, Calderon has plenty of other challenges, including rising drug-trafficking violence nationwide. But if he makes progress in standing up to big business and in restoring the rule of law, he could someday attain rock-star status of his own.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Ruling Due On Moussaoui Evidence (AP)

By LARRY O'DELL, THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

AP, December 1, 2006

Sept. 11 plaintiffs' lawsuit goes to court based in Richmond

A federal appeals court in Richmond will decide in coming weeks whether some families of the Sept. 11 victims should be given evidence from the trial of confessed al-Qaida conspirator Zacarias Moussaoui for civil lawsuits filed in New York.

U.S. District Judge Leonie Brinkema of Alexandria has ordered the government to give the plaintiffs nonsensitive information that prosecutors turned over to Moussaoui's attorneys but was never introduced at his trial.

Justice Department lawyer Steven Lane yesterday urged a three-judge panel of the 4th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Richmond to overturn that ruling. He argued that Brinkema lacked authority in the New York cases and that there is no precedent for allowing civil plaintiffs to intervene in a criminal case.

Lane said the case isn't about whether the plaintiffs are entitled to the evidence; it's about the proper procedures for obtaining it.

"We're prepared to respond in good faith to discovery requests made in New York under settled civil-discovery procedures," Lane said, adding that "there was no need for the district court to create from whole cloth a novel procedure" in this case.

Nathan Lewin, attorney for the plaintiffs, argued that Brinkema properly exercised her discretion to allow access to the evidence in "an unusual case involving victims of the worst terrorist act in the history of mankind."

Appeals court Judge Roger Gregory asked if Brinkema's order amounts to an open door for any citizen to intervene in a criminal case.

It does not, Lewin said, because Brinkema made it clear that this is a rare case in which the plaintiffs have demonstrated a compelling need for the evidence.

"This group of civil litigants, their rights should be viewed as importantly as the criminal prosecution of someone who allegedly participated in the terrorist act," Lewin said.

About 6,600 plaintiffs are listed in three negligence lawsuits against parts of the airline industry and those alleged to have financed the terror group that hijacked airplanes and crashed them into New York's World Trade Center, the Pentagon and a Pennsylvania field.

In her April 7 order, Brinkema said the Sept. 11 plaintiffs enjoy special privileges as a result of legislation passed by Congress. Lane argued that the legislation says nothing about allowing civil discovery in a criminal case.

Moussaoui, the only person in this country charged in the attacks, was sentenced to life in prison in May after a jury found him responsible for at least one death on Sept. 11.
